JOGBEHAH (יִגְבְּהָהּ), perhaps i. q. יִגְבָּהּ, 'lofty,' from יָגַב, 'to be high'; יִגְבָּהּ; Alex. Ζεβέε; Jegbaa, a town in the territory given to the tribe of Gad, east of the Jordan. It appears to have been situated high up (as the name implies) on the brow of the mountain ridge which overlooks the Jordan valley east of Jericho, for it is placed between Bethnimrah in the valley, and Jaazer, which stood on the plateau near Heshbon (Num. xxxii. 35). The only other reference to it is in the account of Gideon's victory over the host of Zebah and Zalmunna, which was encamped 'on the east of Nobah and Jogbeha' (Judg. viii. 11). The site is unknown.

The Septuagint in Num. xxxii. 35 renders the word יִגְבְּהָהּ, καὶ ἐβύσσα αὐτὸς, as if it were a verb and pronoun, instead of a proper name.—J. L. P.

JOHANAN (יֹחָנָן), Gift of Jehovah; the contracted form of Jehohanan; Sept. Ἰωάναν and Ἰωάνναν, one of the officers who came and recognised Gedaliah as governor of Judæa after the destruction of Jerusalem, and who appears to have been the chief in authority and influence among them. He penetrated the designs of Ishmael against the governor, whom he endeavoured, without success, to put upon his guard. When Ishmael had accomplished his design by the murder of Gedaliah, and was carrying away the principal persons at the seat of government as captives to the Ammonites, Johanan pursued him, and released them. Being fearful, however, that the Chaldeans might misunderstand the affair, and make him and those who were with him responsible for it, he resolved to withdraw for safety into Egypt, with the principal persons of the remnant left in the land. Jeremiah remonstrated against this decision; but Johanan would not be moved, and even constrained the prophet himself to go with them. They proceeded to Tahpanhes, but nothing further is recorded of Johanan, B.C. 588 (2 Kings xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8-16; xli.; xlii.; xliii.).—J. K.

Nine other persons of this name are mentioned in the O. T. 1. (Sept. Ἰωάνης). The son of Azariah I. and father of Azariah II. (1 Chron. v. 15, 16 [A. V. vi. 9, 10]) [AZARIAH]; 2. The son of Elioenai (1 Chron. iii. 24); 3. The eldest son of Josiah, king of Judah (1 Chron. iii. 15); 4. A Benjamite, one of David's captains, who joined him at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4); 5. Another of David's followers, one of the Gadites, whose faces were like the faces of lions, and whose feet were swift as roes upon the mountains (1 Chron. xii. 12); 6. The father of Azariah, an Ephraimite in the time of Ahaz; in the Heb. the full form of the name יְהוֹנָתָן Jehonatan (Sept. Ἰωάνης) is given (2 Chron. xxviii. 12); 7. The chief of the sons of Azgad, who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii. 12); 8. (יְהוֹנָתָן) The son of Eliashib, into whose chamber Ezra retired to mourn the transgression of those who had been seduced to marry strange wives (Ezra x. 6); he was one of the chief of the fathers of the tribe of Levi (Neh. xii. 23); 9. (יְהוֹנָתָן) The son of Tobiah the Ammonite, and the husband of the daughter of Meshullam the priest (Neh. vi. 18).—W. L. A.

JOHLSOHN, J. JOSEPH, was born in Fulda, 1777. Being the son of a rabbi, he was instructed from his early youth in the original language of the O. T., in which he afterwards greatly distinguished himself. He left his native place early in life, and went to Frankfort-on-the-Maine, where he was engaged in private tuition; he afterwards went to Kreuznach and became Professor of Hebrew, etc., in a public academy, but was called back, in 1813, by the Grand Duke to the professorial chair of Hebrew and religion in the Jewish academy at Frankfort. Here he at once began his public literary career, and published (1) a valuable work on the fundamentals of the Jewish religion, entitled שְׁרָשְׁרֵי הָהָרָה, with an appendix describing the manners and customs of the Hebrews, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1814; second ed. 1819. (2) A chronological history of the Bible, in Hebrew, with the moral sayings of the Scriptures, seven Psalms with Kimchi's Commentary, a Hebrew Chrestomathy with notes, and a glossary called תְּלִיטֵי אֲבוֹת, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1820; second ed. 1837. (3) The Pentateuch translated into German, with annotations, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1831. (4) The Sacred Scriptures of the Jews, translated into German, with annotations, vol. ii. containing Joshua, Samuel, and Kings, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1836. (5) A Hebrew Grammar for schools, entitled סִימְנֵי הַלֶּשֶׁן, forming a second part to the new ed. of the Chrestomathy, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1838. (6) A Hebrew Lexicon, giving also the synonyms, with an appendix containing an explanation of the abbreviations used in the Rabbinical writings, entitled עֵד מִלִּים, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1840. (7) A historical and dogmatic treatise on circumcision, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1843. Johlsohn died in Frankfort-on-the-Maine in 1851. Comp. Stein, Der Israelitische Volkslehrer, vol. i.,

JOHN (Ἰωάννης), the same name as Johanan. It occurs in the Apocrypha and the N. T.

1. The father of Mattathias, and grandfather of the Maccabees (1 Maccab. ii. 1); 2. The son of Mattathias, surnamed Caddis (1 Maccab. ii. 2; ix. 36, 38); 3. The father of Eupolemos, one of the envoys sent to Rome by Judas Maccabæus (1 Maccab. viii. 17; 2 Maccab. iv. 11); 4. The son of Simon, surnamed Hyrcanus (1 Maccab. xiii. 53; xvi. 1); 5. An envoy from the Jews to Lysias (2 Maccab. xi. 17); [For details respecting most of the above, see article MACCABEES]; 6. The son of Zecharias [JOHN THE BAPTIST]; 7. The son of Zebedee [JOHN THE APOSTLE]; 8. One of the kindred of the high-priest who, along with Annas, Caiaphas, and Alexander, sat in judgment on Peter and John when summoned to answer for what they had done in curing the lame man and preaching to the people (Acts. iv. 6). This John Lightfoot supposes to be the Johanan ben Zaccai mentioned by Talmudic writers, and who was one of the most famous men of that time (Hor. Heb. in loc.); 9. John Mark [MARK].—W. L. A.

JOHN THE APOSTLE. He was the son of Zebedee, a fisherman, and of Salome. It is probable that he was born at Bethsaida, on the lake of Galilee. His parents appear to have been in easy circumstances; at least, we find that Zebedee employed hired servants (Mark i. 20), and that Salome was among the number of those women who contributed to the maintenance of Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 56). We also find that John received Mary into his house after the death of Jesus. Since this house seems to have been situated at Jerusalem (ἀν' ἐκτὸς τῆς ὥρας, John xix. 27), it would appear that he was the owner of two houses. John's acquaintance, also, with the high-priest (xviii. 15) seems to indicate that he lived at Jerusalem, and belonged to the wealthier class. We may suppose that from a tender age he nourished religious feelings, since Salome, who evinced so much love for Jesus, probably fostered at an earlier period those hopes of a Messiah which she expresses in Matt. xx. 20; and we find that he entered into communion with the Baptist from pure motives. The occupation, also, of a fisherman was adapted to promote holy meditations, since it would frequently lead him to pass whole nights in stillness upon the water, amid a charming country similar to the environs of the lake of Locarno. On the banks of the Jordan the Baptist directed John to Jesus, and he immediately became the Lord's disciple, and accompanied him on his return to Galilee. Having arrived there, he at first resumed his trade, but was afterwards called to remain permanently with the Redeemer (Luke v. 5-10). Jesus was particularly attached to John (John xiii. 23; xix. 26; xx. 2; xxi. 7), who was one of the three who were distinguished above the other apostles (Matt. xvii. 1; xxvi. 37; Mark v. 37). After the ascension, John abode at Jerusalem, where Paul met him on his third journey, about the year 52 (Gal. ii. 3-9). Since he had undertaken the care of the mother of Jesus, we cannot well suppose that he left Jerusalem before Mary's death; and, indeed, we find that about the year 58, when Paul was at Ephesus, John was not yet living there. If we consider the great importance of Ephesus among the various churches of Asia Minor, and the dangers arising from false teachers, who were prevalent there as early as the days of Paul (Acts xx. 29), it will appear likely that John was sent to Ephesus after Paul had left that scene, about the year 65. During the time of his activity in Asia Minor, he was exiled by the Roman emperor to Patmos, one of the Sporadic isles in the Ægean Sea, where, according to Revelations i. 9, he wrote the Apocalypse. Irenæus (Adv. Hær. v. 30), and, following him, Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 18), state that John beheld the visions of the Apocalypse about the close of the reign of Domitian. If this statement can be depended upon, the exile to Patmos also took place under Domitian, who died A. D. 96. Tertullian (Præscr. adv. Hær., c. 30) relates that in the reign of Domitian John was forcibly conveyed to Rome, where he was thrown into a cask of oil; that he was miraculously released, and then brought to Patmos. But since none of the ancient writers besides the rather indiscriminating Tertullian relate this circumstance, and since this mode of capital punishment was unheard of at Rome, we ought not to lay much stress upon it (compare Mosheim, Dissertationes ad Historiam Ecclesiasticam, i. p. 497, sq.). It is, however, likely that John was called to suffer for his faith, since Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, writing about A. D. 200, calls him μάρτυρ (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 24). According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., iii. 20, 23), he returned from exile during the reign of Nerva. The three epistles of John, as also the affecting account concerning his fidelity as a spiritual pastor, given by Clemens Alexandrinus (Quis Dives Salvus? c. 52), testify that he was the pastor of a large diocese. John's second epistle, ver. 12, and third epistle, ver. 14, indicate that he made journeys of pastoral visitation. John died at Ephesus past the age of ninety, in the reign of the Emperor Trajan. According to Jerome, he was a hundred years old, and according to Suidas, a hundred and twenty.

If we endeavour to picture to ourselves an image of John as drawn from his Gospel and his Epistles, aided by a few traits of his life preserved by the fathers,* he appears to have been of a wise, affectionate, and rather feminine character.

It seems that originally this softness of disposition would sometimes blaze up in wrath, as feminine characters in general feel themselves as strongly repelled as attracted. An instance of his wrath we find in Luke ix. 54, sq. We trace also a degree of selfishness in Mark ix. 38; x. 35. Hence it appears that love, humility, and mildness, were in John the works of transforming grace. At a later period his writings indicate not only mildness, but also a strict moral earnestness (1 John i. 6; iii. 9-20; v. 16; 2 John 10, 11).—A. T.

JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO. 1. Genuine.

* Jerome (Comm. ad Gal., iii. p. 314, mart.) relates that when John had attained a great age he was so feeble that he could not walk to the assemblies of the church; he therefore caused himself to be carried in by young men. He was no longer able to say much, but he constantly repeated the words, 'Little children, love one another.' On being asked why he constantly repeated this one saying, he replied, 'Because it is the command of the Lord; and enough is done if this is done.'

ness.—There is no reason to doubt that the fourth gospel was from the beginning received in the church as the production of the apostle whose name it bears. We may decline to accept as a testimony for this the statement at the close of the Gospel itself (xxi. 24), for this can have the force of an independent testimony only on the supposition that the passage was added by another hand; and though there is an evident allusion in 2 Pet. i. 14 to what is recorded in John xxi. 18, 19, yet as that saying of the Lord was one which tradition would be sure to send forth among the brethren (comp. ver. 23), it cannot be inferred from Peter's allusion to it that it was then put on record as we have it in the Gospel. We may also admit that the passages in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers which have been adduced as evidencing, on their part, acquaintance with this Gospel are not decisive; as all of them may owe their accordance with John's statements to the influence of true tradition, or to the necessary resemblance of the just utterance of Christian thought and feeling by different men; though in three of the passages cited from Ignatius (Ad Rom. vii.; Ad Trall. viii.; and Ad Philad. vii.) the coincidence of the two first with John vi. 32, ff., and of the last with John iii. 8, is almost too close to be accounted for in this way* (Ebrard, Evangel. Joh., p. 102; Rothe, Anfänge der Christl. Kirche, p. 715). But Eusebius attests that this Gospel was among the books universally received in the church (Hist. Eccl. iii. 25); and it cannot be doubted that it formed part of the canon of the churches, both of the East and West, before the end of the 2d century [CANON]. It is in the Peshito, and in the Muratori Fragment. It is quoted or referred to by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 52, 61; ii. 6; c. Tryph. 105, etc.; comp. Olshausen, Echtheit der Kan. Evv., p. 304, ff.); by Tatian (Orat. ad Græcos, 4, 13, 19), who, indeed, composed a Diatessaron (Euseb., H. E., iv. 29; Theod., Hard. Fab., i. 20), in preparing which he must have had this Gospel before him; in the Epistle of the Church at Vienne and Lyons (Euseb. v. 1); by Melito of Sardes (see Pitra, Specileg. Solimense, i., Prolegom. p. 5, Paris 1852); by Athenagoras (Leg. pro Christ. 10); by Apollinarius (Frag. Chron. Pasch., p. 14, ed. Dindorf); by Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus (Euseb. H. E. v. 24); and in the Clementine Homilies (xix. 22, ed. Dressel, 1853), in such a way that not only its existence proved, but evidence is afforded of the esteem in which it was held as canonical from the middle of the 2d century. Still more precise is the testimony of Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, who not only composed a Harmony of the four evangelists (Hieron., De viris illust. 25; Ep. 151, ad Algasiam), but in an extant work (Ad Autol. ii. 22) expressly quotes John i. 1 as part of Holy Scripture, and as the production of the apostle, whom he ranks among the πνευματοφόροι. More important still is the testimony of Irenæus (Hær.

* The other passages usually cited from the Apostolic Fathers are, Barnab. Ep. v. vi. xii. (comp. John iii. 14); Herm., Past., Sim. ix. 12 (comp. John x. 7, 9; xiv. 6); Ignat. Ad Trall. viii. (comp. John vi. 51); Ad Magnes. vii. (comp. John xii. 49; x. 30; xiv. 11). See Lardner, Works, vol. ii.

iii. 11. 3, p. 218, ed. Grabe), both because of his acquaintance in early youth with Polycarp, and because of the distinctness and unhesitating confidence with which he asserts the Johannine origin of this Gospel. To these testimonies may be added that of Celsus, the enemy of the Christians, who, in preparing his attack upon them, evidently had the four canonical gospels before him, and of whose citations from them some are undoubtedly from that of John (comp. Olshausen, bk. cited, p. 349, 355; Lücke, Comment. i. 68, ff., 3d ed.); which shews that, at the time when he wrote, this Gospel must have been in general acceptance by the Christians as canonical. The heretic Marcion, also, in rejecting this gospel on dogmatical grounds, is a witness to the fact, that its canonical authority was generally held by the Christians (Tertull. c. Marcion, iv. 5; de Carne Christi). That the Gospel was recognised as canonical by the Valentinians, one of the most important sects of the 2d century, is placed beyond doubt by the statement of Irenæus (Her. iii. 11), and by the fact that it is quoted by Ptolemæus, a disciple of Valentinus (Epiphani., Her. xxxiii. 3), and was commented on by Heracleon, another of his disciples, both of whom lived about the middle of the 2d century. That Valentinus himself knew and used the book is rendered probable by this, and by the statement of Tertullian (De Præscr. Her. 38), that Valentinus accepted the Biblical canon entire, though he perverted its meaning; and this probability is raised to certainty by the fact that, in the recently discovered work of Hippolytus, Valentinus is found twice (Philosoph. vi. 33, 34, ed. Miller) citing the phrase ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, as applied to the devil, which occurs only in John's Gospel, and repeatedly there (xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11); and also quoting the saying, John x. 8, as the word of Christ. From the same source, also (vii. 22, 27, p. 232, 242), we learn that Basilides was acquainted with John's Gospel, and cited it; and this brings us up to the beginning of the 2d century, within a short time of the apostle's death.

This concurrence of external testimony is the more noticeable, as there are certain peculiarities in the fourth gospel which would have thrown suspicion on its genuineness had not that been placed beyond doubt by the knowledge which the Christians had of its having proceeded from the pen of John. Of these are the prominence given to the extra-Galilean ministry of our Lord; the record of remarkable miracles, such as the healing of the impotent man (ch. v.), of the blind man (ch. ix.), the raising from the dead of Lazarus, and others, omitted by the other evangelists; the insertion of so many discourses of Jesus, of which no hint is found in the other gospels, as well as the omission of remarkable facts in the evangelic history, especially the institution of the supper and the agony in the garden; and certain important apparent discrepancies between this and the synoptic gospels. In perfect keeping with this assumption, also, is the entire tone, spirit, and character of the Gospel; it is emphatically, as Clement of Alexandria calls it, the πνευματικὸν εὐαγγέλιον, and breathes throughout the spirit which was characteristic of 'the disciple whom Jesus loved.' The work is evidently the production of one who was, as the writer professes to be (i. 14 [comp. i. John i. i; iv. 14]; xix. 35; xxi. 24), an eye-witness of what he narrates; and there is a simplicity, a naturalness, and a vividness in the whole narrative which no forger of a later age could have attained—which the very consciousness of composing what was intended to be an imposition, would have precluded. The remarkable manner, also, in which the writer avoids introducing John by name (ch. xiii. 23; xix. 26; xx. 2, 3, 4; xxi. 7, 24), affords additional evidence that John himself was the writer. It has been urged also by some (Bleek, Ebrard, Credner), that the use of the simple Ἰωάννης, without in any case the addition of the usual ὁ Βαπτιστής, to designate the Baptist, in this Gospel, is an evidence of its being the production of John the apostle, on the ground that, 'supposing the apostle not to be the writer, one would expect that he should, like the Synoptists, discriminate the Baptist from the Apostle by this epithet, whereas, supposing the apostle himself to be the writer, he would feel less prompted to do so' (Bleek, Einleit. in d. N. T., p. 148); but to this much weight cannot be attached, for though it is probable that a writer taking his materials from the other evangelists would have designated John as they do, and though, as Meyer suggests (Krit. Exeg. Comm. über N. T., Ein. ins Ev. des Johannes, p. 23), it is probable that John, who had been a disciple of the Baptist, might prefer speaking of him by the name by which he had been accustomed to designate him during their personal intercourse, rather than by his historical name; yet as we cannot tell what considerations might have occurred to a forger writing in the apostle's name to induce him to drop the distinctive epithet, it is hardly competent for us to accept this omission as a proof that the work is not the production of a forger. It is needless to press every minute particular into the service of the argument for the genuineness of this Gospel; it is impossible to read it without feeling that it is Johannine in all its parts, and that, had it been the production of any other than the apostle, that other must, in mind, spirit, affection, circumstances, and character, have been a second John.

It is only comparatively recently that any attempt has been made to impugn the genuineness of this gospel. The work of Bretschneider, entitled Probabilia de Evangelii et Epp. Johannis apost. indole et origine, Lips. 1820, is the earliest formal attack of any importance made upon it; and this the author has himself assured us, was made by him with a view of anew exciting and extending inquiry into the genuineness of the Johannine writings, an end which, he adds, has been gained, so that the doubts he suggested may be regarded as discharged (Dogmatik, i. p. 268, 3d ed. [BRETSCHEIDER]). Since this work appeared, the claims of the Gospel have been opposed by Strauss in his Leben Jesu; by Weisse, in his Evangelische Geschichte; by Lützelberger (Die Kirchliche Tradition üb. d. Apost. Joh.); by Baur (Krit. Unters. üb. d. Kanonischen Evang.); by Hilgenfeld (Das Evang. u. die Briefe Joh. nach ihrem Lehrbegr. dargestellt), and by others. But the reasons advanced by these writers have so little force, and have been so thoroughly replied to, that even in Germany the general opinion has reverted to the ancient and catholic belief in respect of the authorship of the fourth gospel. The reader who wishes to go into the controversy may consult with advantage the following works in reply to those above noted: Stein, Authentia Ev. Joh. vindicata, Bran-denb. 1822; Crome, Probabilia haud probabilia. oder Widerlegung der von Dr. Bretschneider gegen d. aechtheit des Ev. u. d. Br. Joh. erhobenen Zweifel. 2. Integrity.—Certain portions of this Gospel have been regarded as interpolations or later additions, even by those who accept the Gospel as a whole as the work of St. John. One of these is the closing part of v. 2, from ἐκδεχόμενον, and the whole of ver. 4, in regard to which the critical authorities fluctuate, and which contain statements that give a legendary aspect to the narrative, such as belongs to no other of the miracles related in the gospels. Both are rejected by Tischendorf but retained by Lachmann; and the same diversity of judgment appears among interpreters, some rejecting both passages (Lücke, Tholuck, Olshausen), others retaining both (Bruckner), others rejecting ver. 4, but retaining ver. 2 (Ewald), while some leave the whole in doubt (De Wette). Another doubtful portion is the section relating to the woman taken in adultery (vii. 53; viii. 11). This is regarded as an interpolation, because of the deficiency of critical evidence in its favour (see Tischendorf or Alford, in loc.), and because of reasons founded on the passage itself, viz., the apparently forced way in which it is connected with what precedes by means of vii. 53; the interruption caused by it to the course of the narrative, the words in viii. 12 being evidently in continuation of what precedes this section; the alleged going of Jesus to the Mount of Olives and return to Jerusalem, which would place this occurrence in the last residence of our Lord in Jerusalem (Luke xxi. 37); the absence of the characteristic usage of the οὖν, which John so constantly introduces into his narratives, and for which we have in this section δὲ used as John generally uses οὖν; and the presence of the expressions ὁρθρον, πᾶς ὁ λαός, καθίσας ἐδίδασκεν αὐτοὺς, οἱ γραμματεῖς καὶ οἱ φαρισαῖοι, ἐπιμένειν, ἀναμάρτητος, καταλείπεσθαι, and κατακρίνειν, which are foreign to John's style. On the other side it is urged that the section contains, as Calvin says, 'nihil apostolico spiritu indignum,' that it has no appearance of a later legend, but bears every trace of an original account of a very probable fact, and that it has a considerable amount of diplomatic evidence in its favour. The question is one which hardly admits of a decided answer. The preponderance of evidence is undoubtedly against the Johannine origin of the section, and it has consequently been regarded as an interpolation by the great majority of critics and interpreters, including among the latter Calvin, Beza, Tittmann, Tholuck, Olshausen, Lücke, and Luthardt, as well as Grotius, De Wette, Paulus, and Ewald. At the same time, if it did not form part of the original Gospel, it is difficult to account for its being at so early a period inserted in it. From a passage in Eusebius (H. E. iii. 39) some have concluded that Papias inserted it from the Gospel according to the Hebrews; but it is not certain that it is to this section that the words of Eusebius refer. nor is it certain that he meant to say that Papias inserted the story he refers to in the Gospel. More important than either of these portions is chap. xxi., which is by many regarded as the addition of a later hand after the apostle's death. This opinion rests wholly on internal grounds, for there is no evidence that the Gospel was ever known in the church without this chapter. At first sight it certainly appears as if the original work ended with ch. xx., and that ch. xxi. was a later addition; but whether by the apostle himself or by some other is open to question. The absence of any trace of the Gospel having ever existed without it must be allowed to afford strong prima facie evidence of its having been added by the author himself; still this is not conclusive, for the addition may have been made by one of his friends or disciples before the work was in circulation. Grotius, who thinks it was made by the elders at Ephesus, argues against its genuineness, especially from ver. 24; but though the language there has certainly the appearance of being rather that of others than that of the party himself to whom: it refers, still it is not impossible that John may have referred to himself in the third person, as he does for instance in xix. 35, and as for the use of the pl. οὐbauer, that may be accounted for by his tacitly joining his readers with himself, just as he assumes their presence in xix. 35. There is more difficulty in accepting ver. 25 as genuine, for such a hyperbolic mode of expression does not seem to comport with the simplicity and sincerity of John; but there seems no valid reason for calling into doubt any other part of the chapter.

3. Design.—At the close of the Gospel the apostle has himself stated his design in writing it thus: 'These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name' (xx. 31). Taken in the general this may be said to be the design of all the evangelical narratives, for all of them are intended to produce the conviction that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah promised to the Fathers, and so to exhibit Him in his saving power, that men believing on Him might enjoy that life which He had come to bestow. We must seek, therefore, John's specific design either in some special occasion which he sought to meet, or in some peculiarity in his mode of presenting the claims of Jesus, by which not merely his Messiahship should be evinced, but the higher aspect of his Person, and the spiritual effects of his working, should be prominently exhibited. Probably both of these concurred in the apostle's design; and we shall best conceive his purpose by neither, on the one hand, ascribing to him a merely historical, nor on the other a purely dogmatical design. It is an old and still prevalent opinion that John wrote his Gospel to supply the omissions of the other three; but no such impression is conveyed by the Gospel itself, which is as far as possible from having the appearance of a mere series of supplemental notes to previously existing writings; indeed, if this had been the apostle's purpose, it cannot be said that he has in any adequate way fulfilled it. Nor is there any ground for believing that it was a polemical object which chiefly prompted him to write this Gospel, though such has often been suggested. Thus Irenaeus (Hæc. iii. 11. 1) says that the Gospel was written against the errors of Cerinthus. Jerome

(De vir. ill. 9) adds the Ebionites; and later writers have maintained that the Gnostics or the Doketae are the parties against whom the polemic of the apostle is here directed. All this, however, is mere supposition, for which there is no real basis. Doubtless in what John has written there is that which furnishes a full refutation of all Ebionite, Gnostic, and Doketic heresy; but that to confute these was the design of the apostle, as these writers affirm, cannot be proved. [GNOSTIC.] At the same time, though he may have had no intention of formally confuting any existing heresy, it is more than probable that he was stimulated to seek by means of this record to counteract certain tendencies which he saw rising in the church, and by which the followers of Christ might be seduced from that simple faith in Him by which alone the true Life could be enjoyed. Still this must be regarded, at the utmost, as furnishing only the occasion, not the design, of his writing. The latter is to be sought in the effect which this Gospel is fitted to produce on the mind of the reader in regard to the claims of Jesus as the Divine Redeemer, the source of light and life to darkened and perishing humanity. With this view St. John presents Him to us as He tabernacled among men, and especially as He taught when occasion called forth the deeper revelations which He, as the word who had come forth from the invisible God to reveal unto men the Father, had to communicate. John's main design is a theological one; a consciousness of which doubtless led to his receiving in the primitive church the title καρ' ἐξόχην of Θεόλογος. But the historical character of his writing must also be acknowledged. As one who had been privileged to 'company' with Jesus, he seeks to present Him to us as He really appeared among men, in very deed a partaker of their nature, yet, under that nature, veiling a higher, which ever and anon broke forth into manifestation, so that those around Him 'beheld his glory as the glory of the Only Begotten of the Father' (i. 14). 'There is here no history of Jesus and his teaching after the manner of the other evangelists; but there is, in historical form, a representation of the Christian faith, in relation to the Person of Christ, as its central point, and in this representation there is a picture, on the one hand, of the antagonism of the world to the truth revealed in Him, and on the other of the spiritual blessedness of the few who yield themselves to Him as the Light of Life' (Reuss, Gesch. der Heil. Sch. d. N. T., p. 204).

4. Contents.—The Gospel begins with a prologue, in which the author presents the great theme of which his subsequent narrative is to furnish the detailed illustration—the theological programme of his history,' as one has called it, and which another has compared to the overture of a musical composition in which the leading idea of the piece is expressed (i. 1-5). The historical exposition begins with ver. 6, and the rest of the book may be divided into two parts. Of these the former (i. 6-xii.) contains the account of our Lord's public ministry from his introduction to it by John the Baptist and his solemn consecration to it by God, to its close in the Passion week. In this portion we have the Saviour presented to us chiefly in his manifestation to the world as a teacher sent from God, whose mission is authenticated by signs and wonders, and whose doctrines, truly divine, transcend in their spiritual import the narrow limits of human speculation, and can be comprehended only by a spiritual discernment. The second portion (xiii.-xxi.) may be divided into two parts, the one of which is introductory to the other. The former (xiii.-xvii.) presents to us our Lord in the retirement of private life, in his intercourse with his immediate followers, to whom he pours out his soul in loving counsel, warning, and promise, in the prospect of his departure from them; and in communion with his heavenly Father, with whom, as one who had finished the work he had received to do, He intercedes for those whose redemption from sin and evil is the coveted recompense of his obedience. To this succeeds the account of the Passion, and the appearances of Christ to his disciples after his resurrection (xviii.-xxi.), which forms the other part of the second portion of the book.

The greater part of the book is occupied with the discourses of our Lord; the plan of the evangelist being obviously to bring the reader as much as possible into personal contact with Jesus, and to make the latter his own expositor. Regarding the discourses thus reported, the question has arisen, How far are they to be accepted as an exact report of what Jesus uttered? and in reply to this three opinions have been advanced:—1. That both in substance and in form we have them as they came from the lips of Christ; 2. That in substance they present what Christ uttered, but that the form in which they appear is due to the evangelist; and 3. That they are not the discourses of Christ in any proper sense, but only speeches put in his mouth by the evangelist to express what the latter conceived to be a just representation of his doctrine. Of these views the last has found adherents only among a few of the sceptical school; it is without the slightest authority from the book itself, is irreconcilable with the simplicity and earnestness of the writer, is foreign to the habits and notions of the class to which the evangelist belongs, and is contradicted by the frequent explanations which he introduces of the sense in which he understood what he reports (comp. ii. 19, 21; vii. 38, 39; xii. 32, 33, etc.) by the brief notices, which evince an actual reminiscence of the scenes and circumstances amid which the discourse was delivered (ex. gr., xiv. 31), and by the prophetic announcements of his impending sufferings and death ascribed to the Saviour, and which are couched in language such as he might naturally use, such as accounts for those to whom he spoke, even his disciples, not understanding his meaning, but such as it is utterly incredible that one not desirous of reporting his very words should, writing after the fulfilment of these predictions impute to Him (comp. vii. 33-36; viii. 21, 22; x. 17-20; xii. 23-36; xiv. 1-4, 18, 28; xvi. 16, 19, etc.) Some of these considerations are of weight also as against the second of the opinions above stated; for if John sought merely to give the substance of the Saviour's teaching in his own words, why clothe predictions, the meaning of which at the time of his writing he perfectly understood, in obscure and difficult phraseology? Why especially impute to the speaker language of which he feels it necessary to give an explanation, instead of at once putting the intelligible statement in his discourse? Undoubtedly the impression which one gets from the narrative is that John means the discourses he ascribes to Jesus to be received as faithful reports of what He actually uttered; and this is confirmed when one compares his report of John the Baptist's sayings with those of our Lord, the character of the one being totally different from that of the other. To this view it has been objected that there is such an identity of style in the discourses which John ascribes to Christ with his own style, both in this Gospel and in his Epistles, as betrays in the former the hand, not of a faithful reporter, but of one who gives in the manner natural to himself the substance of what his Master taught. In this there is some force; but it seems fully met by the suggestion that John was so imbued with the very mind and soul of Christ, so informed by his doctrine, and so filled by his spirit, that his own manner of thought and utterance became the same as that of Christ, and he insensibly wrote and spoke in the style of his Lord. Reuss objects to this, that on this supposition the style of Jesus 'must have been a very uniform and sharply defined one, and such as excludes the very different style ascribed to Him by the Synoptists' (Gesch. der H. S. des N. T., p. 203). But the facts here are overstated; the style of our Lord's discourses in John is by no means perfectly uniform; nor is it further removed from that ascribed to Him by the Synoptists, than the difference of subject and circumstance will suffice to account for. As for the objection that it is inconceivable that the evangelist could have retained for so many years a faithful recollection of discourses heard by him only once, we need not, in order to meet it, resort to the foolish suggestion of Bertholdt, that he had taken notes of them at the time for his own behoof; nor need we to lay stress on the assurance of Christ which John records, that the Holy Ghost whom the Father should send to them would teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance whatsoever he had said unto them (John xiv. 26), though to the believer this is a fact of the utmost importance: it will suffice to meet the objection if we suggest that, as the apostle went forth to the world as a witness for Christ, he did not wait till he sat down to write his Gospel to give forth his recollections of his Master's words and deeds; what he narrates here in writing is only what he must have been repeating constantly during his whole apostolic career.

5. Characteristics.—There is something peculiar in the Evangelist's manner of writing. His language betrays traces of that Hebraistic character which belongs generally to the N. T. writers, and the author shews his Jewish descent by various incidental indications. But he writes purer Greek than most of the others, and his freedom from Judaic narrowness is so marked that some have founded on this an argument against the genuineness of the book, forgetting that the experiences of the apostle in his more advanced years would materially tend to correct the prejudices and party leanings of his earlier career. The apostle's style is marked by ease, simplicity, and vividness; his sentences are linked together rather by inner affinity in the thoughts than by outward forms of composition or dialectic concatenation; they move on one after the other, generally with the help of an οὐν, sometimes of a καί, and occasionally of a δέ; and favourite terms or phrases are repeated without regard to rhetorical art. The author wrote evidently for Hellenist readers; but he makes no attempt at Greek elegance or that wisdom of words which with many in his day constituted the perfection of Greek art.

6. Time and place of writing.—Ecclesiastical tradition is constant and uniform in affirming that this Gospel was written in the later part of the apostle's life, and at Ephesus; and with this the internal evidence fully accords. The Gospel bears traces of having been written at a distance from Palestine, and by one who had been a considerable time out of it; and as John probably did not take up his residence at Ephesus till the destruction of Jerusalem, if we accept the tradition which makes Ephesus the place of his writing, we cannot fix the time earlier than in the last decade of the 1st century. A later tradition makes Patmos the place where the Gospel was written, but to this no regard is due. The date and place assigned by the earlier tradition fall in with the fact above noticed as characteristic of this Gospel, viz., the purer Greek in which it is written and the freedom from Jewish narrowness which the author exhibits.

7. Commentaries.—Of patristic commentaries the most valuable are the Exposition of Augustine and the Homilies of Chrysostom; and next to these the compilations of Theophylact and Euthymius Zigabenus. Among the reformers those of Calvin and Beza are chiefly deserving of notice. That of the Roman Catholic Maldonatus is distinguished by originality, accuracy, and penetration. The most copious is that of Lampe, 1637, 3 vols. 4to, which in respect of learning leaves little to be desiderated. More recent works are those of Semler, 1771; Mosheim, 1777; Morus, 2d ed. 1808; Tittmann, 1816, translated in the Edinburgh Biblical Cabinet; Lücke, 1820, 3d ed. 1840; Tholuck, 1827, 6th ed. 1844, translated by Krauth; Klee, 1829; Matthæi, 1837; Baumgarten-Crusius, 1843; Luthardt, 1853; Ewald, 1862; Hengstenberg, 1863; and the commentaries in the more general works of Grotius, Whitby, De Wette, Olshausen, Lange, Alford, Bloomfield, and Wordsworth. Much may be gained also for the due understanding of John's writings from Schmid, De theologia Joan. Apost., Jen. 1800; Frommann, Der Johan. Lehrbegriff, Leipz. 1839; Koestlin, Der Lehrb. der Evang. und der Br. Joh., Berl. 1843; Neander, Apost. Zeit., Th. ii., E. T. ii.; Reuss, Histoire de la Theol. Chrit., ii. 273-466.—W. L. A.

JOHN, FIRST EPISTLE OF. 1. Genuineness.—That this is the production of the same author as wrote the fourth gospel, is so manifest, that it has been universally admitted (comp. Hauff, Die Authentie u. der hohe werth des Evang. Johan., p. 137, ff.). The establishment of the genuineness of the one, therefore, involves the admission of that of the other. The evidence, however, in favour of the epistle is sufficient to establish its claims, apart from its relation to the Gospel. Eusebius informs us that Papias knew and made use of it (H. E. iii. 39); Polycarp quotes a passage (iv. 3) from it in his Epistle to the Philippians, ch. vii.; Irenæus uses it (comp. Adv. Har. iii. 15; v. 8, with 1 John ii. 18; iv. 1, 3; v. 1); it is quoted or referred to by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 389) and Tertullian (Scorpiac. c. 22; Adv. Prax. c. 15); and Eusebius assures us that it was universally and always acknowledged in the church (H. E. iii. 25-26). It is found in the Peshito and in all the ancient versions; and is included in every catalogue of the canonical books which has come down to us (Lardner, Works, vol.

vi. p. 584). With this the internal evidence fully accords. The work is anonymous, but the Apostle John is plainly indicated throughout as the writer. The author asserts himself to have been an immediate disciple of Jesus, who testifies that he himself had seen and heard (i. 1-4; iv. 14); and this assumption is sustained throughout in a way so natural and unaffected, that it would be doing violence to all probability to suppose that it could have been attained by one who felt that he was practising in this a deliberate imposition. The circumstances also of the writer to which he alludes, the themes on which he chiefly dwells, and the spirit his writing breathes, are all such as fall in with what we know of the Apostle John, and suggest him as the writer. If this be the work of a pretender, he has, as De Wette remarks (Exeget. Hdb.), 'shewn incredible subtlety in concealing the name of the Apostle, whilst he has indirectly, and in the most simple natural way, indicated him as the writer.'

2. Integrity.—The genuineness of only two small portions of this writing have been called in question, viz., the words ὁ ὁμολογῶν τὸν υἱὸν καὶ τὸν πατέρα ἔχει (ii. 23); and the words ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ ὁ Πατὴρ, ὁ Λόγος καὶ τὸ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα: καὶ οὗτοι οἱ τρεῖς ἐν εἰσι. Καὶ τρεῖς εἰσιν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐν τῇ γῇ (v. 7, 8). The former of these is omitted in the Text. Rec., and is printed in italics in the A. V. It is, however, supported by sufficient authority, and is inserted by Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Scholz, etc. The latter of these passages has given rise to a world-famous controversy, which can hardly be said to have yet ended (Orme, Memoir of the Controversy respecting the Heavenly Witnesses, Lond. 1830). The prevailing judgment, however, of all critics and interpreters is, that the passage is spurious (see Griesbach, Append. ad N. T., ii. 1-25; Tischendorf on the passage; Lucke, Comment. on the Ep. of John in Biblical Cabinet, No. xv. etc.)

3. For whom written.—The writer evidently had in his eye a circle of readers with whom he stood in close personal relation, Christians apparently who were living in the midst of idolaters (v. 21), and who were exposed to danger from false speculation and wrong methods of presenting the truths of Christianity (ii. 22-26; iv. 1-3; v. 1-6, etc.) If the epistle was written by John at Ephesus, we may, from these circumstances, with much probability conclude that the Christians in that region were the parties for whose behoof it was first designed. Augustine (Quest. Evangel. ii. 39) says it was addressed 'ad Parthos,' and this inscription appears in several MSS. of the Vulg., and has been defended by Grotius, Paulus, and others, as giving the real destination of the epistle. John, however, had no relations with the Parthians that we know of; nor does a single ancient testimony confirm the statement of Augustine, except on the part of later writers of the Latin Church, who probably simply followed him. It has been suggested that, as the second epistle is by some of the ancients described as πρὸς παρθένους (Clem. Alex., Frags., ed. Potter, p. 1011), this may have been changed into πρὸς Ἰδάρθους, and by mistake applied to the first epistle (Whiston, Comment. on the Cath. Ep.; Hug, Introd., p. 464, Fosdick's transl.) This is possible, but not very probable. The suggestion of Wegscheider, that 'Ad Parthos' is an error for 'Ad Sparsos,' an inscription which actually is found in several MSS. (Scholz, Bibl. Krit. Reise, p. 67), is ingenious, and may be correct.

4. Characteristics.—Though ranked among the Catholic epistles, this writing has nothing of the character of an epistle; it more resembles a free homily. The general strain is admonitory, and the author seems to have written as he would have spoken had those whom he addresses been present before him. There does not seem to be any exact plan in the book; one great thought pervades it, the reality of Christ's appearance in the flesh, and the all-sufficiency of his doctrine for salvation, a salvation which manifests itself in holiness and love; but the author does not discuss these topics in any systematic or logical form; he rather allows his thoughts to flow out in succession as one suggests another, and clothes them in simple and earnest words as they arise in his mind. Some have imputed a character of senility to the work on this account, but without reason. Under a simple and inartificial exterior there lies deep thought; and the book is pervaded by a suppressed intensity of feeling that recalls the youthful Boanerges in the aged apostle. The mighty power that is in it has drawn to it in all ages the reverence and love of the noblest minds, 'especially of those who more particularly take up Christianity as a religion of love, a religion of the heart' (Lucke, Int., p. 55).

5. Relation to the Fourth Gospel.—The close affinity between this epistle and John's gospel has been already alluded to; in style, in prevailing formulæ of expression, in spirit, and in thought, the two are identical. This has led to the suggestion that both, in a sense, form one whole, the epistle being according to some a prolegomenon to the Gospel, according to others, its practical conclusion, and according to others its commendatory accompaniment. The probability is that both were written at the same period of the author's life, and that they both contain in writing what he had been accustomed to testify and teach during his apostolic ministry. But whether any closer relation than this exists between them must remain matter entirely of conjecture.

6. Design.—That the apostle sought to confirm the believers for whom he wrote in their attachment to Christianity, as it had been delivered to them by the ambassadors of Christ, is evident on the surface of the epistle. It is clear also that he had in view certain false teachers by whose arts the Christians were in danger of being seduced from the faith of Jesus as the incarnate Son of God, and from that holy and loving course of conduct to which true faith in Jesus leads. But who these false teachers were, or to what school they belonged, is doubtful. It is an old opinion that they were Doketae (Tertullian, De carne Christi, i. 24; Dionys. Al. ap. Euseb., H. E. vii. 25); and to this many recent inquirers have given in their adherence. Lucke, who strenuously defends this view, attempts to shew that Doketism was in vogue as early as the time of John by an appeal to the case of Cerenthus, and to the references to Doketism in three of the epistles of Ignatius (Ad Smyrn. 2, ff.; Ad Trall. ix.; Ad Eph. vii.) But the doctrine of Cerinthus respecting the person of Jesus Christ was not Doketic in the proper sense; and the passages cited from Ignatius are all subject to the suspicion of being interpolations, as none of them are found in the Syriac recension. Lucke lays stress also on the words ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληύθοντα (iv. 2; comp. 2 John vii.) as indicating an express antithesis to the doctrine of the Doketicks that Christ had come only in appearance. It may be doubted, however, whether this means anything more than that Christ had really come, the phrase ἐν σαρκὶ ἐλθεῖν being probably a familiar technicality for this among the Christians. It may be questioned also whether the passage should not be translated thus: 'Every spirit which confesseth Jesus Christ having [who has] come in the flesh is of God,' rather than thus, 'Every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come,' etc. (for ὁμολογεῖν with the accusative see John ix. 22; Acts xxiii. 8; Rom. x. 9; 1 Tim. vi. 12); and in this case even the appearance of allusion to a contrary doctrine vanishes (see Bleek, Eintleit. p. 593). It may be added that had John intended to express a direct antithesis to Doketism he would hardly have contented himself with merely using the words ἐν σαρκὶ, for there is a sense in which even the Doketæ would have admitted this. Besides the Doketæ, other heretical parties have been suggested, viz., the Judaisers, the Johannites, or disciples of the Baptist, the Gnostics as such, and even the Montanists. All this, however, is mere conjecture. Perhaps we shall best enter into the force of the Apostle's admonitions if we view them without relation to any known school of formal heresy.

JOHN, SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF. Whilst the internal evidence arising from similarity of style and tone of thought between these epistles and the First Epistle of John strongly supports the conclusion that all are from the same pen, the external evidence for their genuineness is less copious and decisive than that for the first epistle. They are not in the Peshito version, which shews that at the time it was executed they were not recognised by the Syrian churches; and Eusebius places them among the ἀντιλεγόμενα (H. E. iii. 25). The 11th ver. of the Second Epistle, however, is quoted by Irenæus (Hæc. i. 16. 3) as a saying of John the disciple of the Lord, meaning thereby, without doubt, the apostle. Clement of Alexandria, in referring to John's first epistle, uses the words Ἰωάννης ἐν τῇ μεΐζονι ἐπιστολῇ, which shews that he was acquainted with at least two epistles of John; there is extant in a Latin translation a commentary by him on the second epistle; and as Eusebius and Photius both attest that he wrote commentaries on all the seven catholic epistles, it would appear that he must have known and acknowledged the third also. Origen speaks of the Apostle John having left a second and third epistle, which, however, he adds, all did not accept as genuine (In Joan. ap. Euseb. vi. 25). Dionysius of Alexandria (Ibid. vii. 25) recognises them as productions of the same John who wrote the Gospel and the first epistle; and so do all the later Alexandrian writers. Eusebius himself refers to them in his Dem. Evang. iii. 5 without hesitation, as John's; and in the Synod held at Carthage (A.D. 256), Aurelius, Bishop of Chullabi, confirmed his vote by citing 2 John 10, fl., as the language of St. John. In the Muratori Fragment, which, however, in the part relating to the epistles of John is somewhat confused or apparently vitiated, there are at least two epistles of John recognised, for the author uses the plural in mentioning John's epistles. In all the later catalogues, with the exception of the Jambics ad Seleucum, they are inserted with the other canonical books of the N. T. There is thus a solid body of evidence in favour of the genuineness of these epistles; that they were not universally known and received is probably to be accounted for by their character as private letters to individuals, which would naturally be longer of coming under general recognition than such as were addressed to churches or the Christians of a district.

The only antagonist testimony which has reached us from antiquity is that of Jerome, who says (De vir. illust. ix. 18) that both epistles were commonly reputed to be the production not of John the Apostle, but of John the Presbyter; confirmed by the statement of Eusebius (iii. 25) that it was doubtful whether they were the production of the evangelist or of another John. On this it may be observed—1. That the statement of Jerome is certainly not true in its full extent, for there is evidence enough that both in his own time and before, as well as after it, the general belief both in the Latin and the Greek Churches was that they were written by John the Apostle; 2. Both Jerome and Eusebius concur in attesting that all ascribed these epistles either to John the Apostle or John the Presbyter as their author; which may be accepted as convincing evidence that they are not forgeries of an age later than that of the apostle; 3. The question being between John the Apostle and John the Presbyter, we may, without laying stress on the fact that the existence of the latter is, to say the least, involved in doubt [JOHN THE PRESBYTER], call attention to the consideration that, whilst the use of the expression ὁ πρεσβύτερος by the writer of the second epistle may have given rise to the report which Jerome and Eusebius attest, there lies in this a strong evidence that the writer was John the Apostle, and not John the Presbyter; for it is quite credible that the former, writing in his old age, should employ the term πρεσβύτερος to express this fact just as Paul does (Philem. 9), and as Peter does (1 Ep. v. 1), whereas it is incredible that the latter, with whom presbyter was a title of office, should, in writing a letter to an individual, designate himself thus, inasmuch as, the office being common to him with many others, the title, in the absence of his name, was no designation at all; to say nothing of the fact that there is no evidence that the members of the πρεσβυτήριον in the primitive churches ever received πρεσβύτερος as a title, any more than the members of the church, though collectively οἱ ἄγιοι and οἱ ἀδελφοί, received individually ἄγιος or ἀδελφος as a title. On these grounds there seems no reason for attaching any importance to the opinion or tradition reported by Jerome; though it has been adopted by Erasmus, Grotius, Credner, Jachmann (Comm. ub. d. Kathol. Br.), and more recently by Ebrard (Olshausen's Comment. vi. 4, E. T. vol. x., and in Herzog's Encyc. vi. 736).

The second epistle is addressed to one whom the writer calls ἐκλεκτὴ κυρία. This has been differently understood. By some it has been regarded as designating the Church collectively; by others as designating a particular congregation; and by others as denoting an individual. The two former opinions are rendered improbable, partly by the reference in ver. 11 to the children, and in ver. 13 to the sister of the party addressed, partly by the want of any authority for such a usage of the term κυρία as would thus be imputed to the apostle. Of those who understand this of an individual, some take both terms appellatively (as in the A. V., 'elect lady'); some take the former as a proper name and the latter as appellative, 'the lady Eclecta;' and some reverse this, and make the latter the proper name and the former an adjective, 'the elect Kyria.' On the whole this last seems the preferable explanation. Kyria occurs elsewhere as a proper name; and that ἐλεκτή is to be taken in its usual signification is rendered probable by its being applied in ver. 13 to the sister of the party addressed.

The epistle is an affectionate address to an esteemed Christian friend, whom the apostle congratulates on the piety of her children, exhorts to continue in love to the brethren, and warns to shun erroneous teachers, especially such as denied that Jesus had come in the flesh. At the time of writing this epistle the apostle was with the sister of Kyria, but expresses a hope ere long to see the latter, and converse with her on matters of which he could not then write. From this we may infer either that the apostle was at the time on a journey from which he expected ere long to return, or that Kyria resided not very far from his usual residence, and that he intended soon to pay her a visit. Adopting the latter hypothesis as the more probable, and viewing it in connection with the apostle's styling himself πρεσβύτερος, we may infer that the epistle was written from Ephesus in the later part of the apostle's life.

The third epistle is addressed to Gaius, a Christian brother noted for his hospitality to the saints. Whether this be one of those mentioned elsewhere in the N. T. by this name is uncertain; he may have been the Gaius mentioned Acts xix. 28 [GAIUS]. The apostle having heard of his kind attentions to those Christians who travelled on the service of the gospel, writes to commend him for this; and at the same time animadverts on the misconduct of one Diotrophes, who had usurped undue power in the church to which Gaius belonged, and was exercising it in a way opposed to the mind of the apostle, and in opposition to his authority. He mentions especially an epistle which he himself had written to the church, but which Diotrophes apparently had rendered fruitless by his unhallowed influence. This epistle is lost, for it cannot have been either the first or second of those extant. The apostle intimates the probability of his soon personally visiting the church, when he would deal with Diotrophes for his misconduct, and would communicate to Gaius many things of which he could not then write. In the meantime he exhorts him to follow that which is good; commends one Demetrius, of whom we know nothing further; and concludes with benediction and salutation. The epistle was probably written about the same time as the second, and at Ephesus.

JOHN THE BAPTIST (Gr. Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτιστής, or simply Ἰωάννης, when the reference is clear, as in Matt. iii. 4; iv. 12). This eminent individual commonly bears the honourable title of 'forerunner of the Lord'—antecursor et præparator viarum Domini (Tertull. adv. Marc. iv. 33); in Greek, πρόδρομος, προάγγελος Κυρίου. The accounts of him which the gospels present are fragmentary and imperfect: they involve too, some difficulties which the learned have found it hard to remove; yet enough is given to show that he was a man of a lofty character, and that the relation in which he stood to Christianity was one of great importance.

His parents were Zacharias and Elisabeth, the latter 'a cousin of Mary,' the mother of Jesus, whose senior John was by a period of six months (Luke i.). The exact spot where John was born is not determined. The rabbins fix on Hebron, in the hill-country of Judæa; Paulus, Kuinoel, and Meyer, after Reland, are in favour of Jutta, 'a city of Judah.' According to the account contained in the first chapter of Luke, his father, while engaged in burning incense, was visited by the angel Gabriel, who informed him that in compliance with his prayers his wife should bear a son, whose name he should call John—in allusion to the grace thus accorded. A description of the manner of his son's life is given, which in effect states that he was to be a Nazarite, abstaining from bodily indulgences, was to receive special favour and aid of God, was to prove a great religious and social reformer, and so prepare the way for the long-expected Messiah. Zacharias is slow to believe these tidings, and seeks some token in evidence of their truth. Accordingly a sign is given which acts also as a punishment of his want of faith—his tongue is sealed till the prediction is fulfilled by the event. Six months after Elisabeth had conceived she received a visit from Mary, the future mother of Jesus. On being saluted by her relation, Elisabeth felt her babe leap in her womb, and, being filled with the Holy Spirit, she broke forth into a poetic congratulation to Mary, as the destined mother of her Lord. At length Elisabeth brought forth a son, whom the relatives were disposed to name Zacharias, after his father—but Elisabeth was in some way led to wish that he should be called John. The matter was referred to the father, who signified in writing that his name was to be John. This agreement with Elisabeth caused all to marvel. Zacharias now had his tongue loosed, and he first employed his restored power in praising God. These singular events caused universal surprise, and led people to expect that the child would prove a distinguished man.

The parents of John were not only of a priestly order, but righteous and devout. Their influence, in consequence, in the training of their son, would be not only benign but suitable to the holy office which he was designed to fill. More than this—the special aids of God's Spirit were with him (Luke i. 66). How thoroughly Zacharias was penetrated with his parental responsibility and the future dignity of his son, appears from the 'divine song' to which he gives utterance; the following words deserve notice:—'And thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the Highest; for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways; to give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins, through the tender mercy of our God, whereby the day-spring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and the shadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace.' As a consequence of the lofty influences under which he was nurtured, the child waxed strong in spirit. The sacred writer adds that 'he was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel' (Luke i. 80). The apocryphal Protev. Jac., ch. xxii., states that his mother, in order to rescue her son from the murder of the children at Bethlehem, which Herod commanded, fled with him into the desert. She found no place of refuge; the mountain opened at her request, and gave the needed shelter in its bosom. Zacharias, being questioned by Herod as to where his son was to be found, and refusing to answer, was slain by the tyrant. At a later period Elisabeth died, when angels took the youth under their care (Fabricius, Cod. Apocryph., p. 117, seq.; comp. Kuhn, Leben Jesu, i. 163, remark 4).

In the fifteenth year of the Emperor Tiberius, John made his public appearance, exhibiting the austerity, the costume, and the manner of life of the ancient Jewish prophets (Luke iii.; Matt. iii.) His raiment was camel's hair; he wore a plain leathern girdle about his loins; his food was that the desert spontaneously offered—locusts and wild honey from the rock. Desert though the place is designated, the country where he began his mission—the wild mountainous tract of Judæa—lying between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea, along which it stretches, was not entirely destitute of means for supporting human existence (Matt. iii. 1-12; Mark i. 1-8; Luke iii. 1-20; John i. 28; Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph., c. 88). Josephus, in his Life (ii. 2), gives an account of one of his instructors, Banus, which throws light on John's condition in the desert:—'he lived in the desert, and had no other food than what grew of its own accord, and bathed himself in cold water frequently, both by night and by day. I imitated him in these things, and continued with him three years.'

The burden of John's preaching bore no slight resemblance to the old prophetic exhortations, whose last echo had now died away for centuries. He called upon the Jewish people to repent (μετανοεῖν), to change their minds, their dispositions, and affections, and thus prepared the way for the great doctrine promulgated by his Lord, of the necessity of a spiritual regeneration. That the change which John had in view was by no means of so great or so elevated a kind as that which Jesus required, is very probable; but the particulars into which he enters when he proceeds to address classes or individuals (Matt. iii. 7, seq.; Luke iii. 7, seq.), serve fully to show that the renovation at which he aimed was not merely of a material or organic, but chiefly of a moral nature. In a very emphatic manner did he warn the ecclesiastical and philosophical authorities of the land of the necessity under which they lay of an entire change of view, of aim, and of desire; declaring in explicit and awful terms that their pride of nationality would avail them nothing against the coming wrathful visitation, and that they were utterly mistaken in the notion that Divine Providence had any need of them for completing its own wise purposes (Luke iii. 8, 9). The first reason assigned by John for entering on his most weighty and perilous office, was announced in these words—'the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' It was his great work to prepare the mind of the nation, so that when Jesus himself came they might be a people made ready for the Lord. What was the exact idea which John intended to convey by the term 'kingdom of heaven' it is not easy, at least in the space before us, to determine with satisfaction. We feel ourselves, however, justified in protesting against the practice of those who take the vulgar Jewish notion, and ascribe it to John, while some go so far as to deny that our Lord himself, at the first, possessed any other. The reference which we have made to John's addresses to his auditors suffices to show that there was an ample and predominant moral element in his conception of this kingdom; while, if he entertained the vulgar notion of the Messiah, why his urgency in behalf of μετάνοια—an entire, internal change? Besides, does the fact need enforcement, that all superior minds—especially those that are enlightened by the Divine Spirit—have both correcter and nobler views than the bulk of their contemporaries, and that it is the power which, under God's aid, these views give them, that sustains them in their duty and makes their efforts successful? If John really came in the spirit and power of Elias—if he reproduced the old ardour and quickening foresight of the prophets, he must have gone far beyond the vulgar conception of the kingdom of God. And indeed the whole tenor of his teaching seems to our mind intended and fitted to refine, exalt, and expand the ordinary Jewish mind, and so to prepare the way for the perfect day of Christ.

Had we space to develop the moral character of John, we could show that this fine, stern, high-minded teacher possessed many eminent qualities; but his personal and official modesty in keeping, in all circumstances, in the lower rank assigned him by God, must not pass without special mention. The doctrine and manner of life of John appear to have roused the entire of the south of Palestine, and people flocked from all parts to the spot where, on the banks of the Jordan, he baptised thousands unto repentance. Such, indeed, was the fame which he had gained, that 'people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ or not' (Luke iii. 15). Had he chosen, John might without doubt have assumed to himself the higher office, and risen to great worldly power. But he was faithful to his trust, and never failed to declare in the fullest and clearest manner, that he was not the Christ, but merely his harbinger, and that the sole work he had to do was to usher in the day-spring from on high.

The more than prophetic fame of the Baptist reached the ears of Jesus in his Nazarene dwelling, far distant from the locality of John (Matt. ii. 22-23). The nature of the report—namely, that his divinely-predicted forerunner had appeared in Judæa—shewed our Lord that the time was now come for his being made manifest to Israel. Accordingly he comes to the place where John is to be baptized of him, in order that thus he might fulfil all that was required under the dispensation which was about to disappear (Matt. iii. 13). John's sense of inferiority inclines him to ask rather than to give baptism in the case of Jesus, who, however, wills to have it so, and is accordingly baptised of John. Immediately on the termination of this symbolical act, a divine attestation is given from the opened vault of heaven, declaring Jesus to be in truth the long looked-for Messiah—'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased' (Matt. iii. 17). The events which are found recorded in John i. 19, sq., seem to have happened after the baptism of Jesus by John. This appears to us to be implied in the past character of the narrative. John is obviously speaking of something over and gone: for instance, 'This is he of whom I said' (not I say), 'after me cometh a man,' etc.; John's testimony had already been borne when he gave his reply to the Sanhedrim. It was therefore prior to his baptism that John 'knew him not'—knew not his person, though, of course, he knew that the Messiah was on the point of coming; and though John and Jesus were relatives, yet, considering the distance at which they dwelt from each other, and the habits of retirement and solitude in which both indulged, there is no difficulty whatever in the statement. But it may be asked, if John was ignorant of the person of Jesus, how he could acknowledge his superiority, as he does when he intimates that it was more meet he should receive than give baptism. This difficulty has excited much attention. The reader may with advantage consult the very learned and, for the most part, impartial commentary of Lücke, on the passage. Our view is this: the relation in which John and Jesus stood to each other must have been well known to both. When, therefore, Jesus came to John, he would naturally declare himself to be the intended Messiah. Such a declaration—thus pointing out the person—would, of course, conciliate belief in John's mind, and might naturally prompt the self-abasing language which he employs when requested by Jesus to give him baptism. No other fact than such an assertion would communicate to John's mind, could justify the language which the Baptist uses, since, as the forerunner of the Messiah, he was second to him only. Still the divinely-promised evidence remained to be given—'upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost' (John i. 33). That evidence was at length vouchsafed after the baptism, and then the divine and human testimony concurred in giving such satisfaction to John's mind as he had been led of God to expect, and which the important interests at stake seemed to demand.

In the testimony which John bears to Jesus, as recorded by the Evangelist John, Winer, in his Realwörterbuch, finds some difficulty, and thinks that there is a variation, in fact a contrariety, between the view which John presents of the person and work of our Lord and that which the other evangelists afford—a view, indeed, of which the Baptist could have known nothing, but which came from the Gnosticizing colours of John's mind. We again refer the reader to Lücke's valuable work. But what has already been remarked will have shewn that Winer and others are in error in the supposition which lies at the bottom of these alleged difficulties and variations—namely, that John the Baptist had no idea of the kingdom of God, higher or more far-reaching than that which was prevalent in the common mind of Judæa. It is in the words, 'Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world' (John i. 29, 36), that the difficulty is thought to be found. What, it is asked, could John the Baptist have known of this assumed function—the remission of sins? Lücke has, we think, satisfactorily shewn that such a function did enter into the prophetic idea of the Messiah (Is. liii.), or at least into that conception of him which the authoritative expounders of religious truth had drawn from the peculiar language of prophecy. And this is unquestionably certain, that 'the remission of our sins, through the tender mercy of our God' (Luke i. 77), did form a part of the conception of the coming Messiah which Zacharias, John's father, entertained and expressed immediately on the birth of his son; while in the account given by the synoptical evangelists (Matthew, Mark, Luke), to the effect that John preached 'the baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins' (Luke iii. 3), adding that the Christ would 'baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire' (Luke iii. 16), may surely be found the essence of the idea conveyed by the words, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' etc.

The relation which subsisted between John and Jesus, after the emphatic testimony above recorded had been borne, we have not the materials to describe with full certainty.

It seems but natural to think, when their hitherto relative position is taken into account, that John would forthwith lay down his office of harbinger, which, now that the Sun of Righteousness himself had appeared, was entirely fulfilled and terminated. Such a step he does not appear to have taken. On the contrary, the language of Scripture seems to imply that the Baptist church continued side by side with the Messianic (Matt. xi. 3; Luke vii. 19; Matt. ix. 14; Luke xi. 1; John iii. 23), and remained long after John's execution (Acts xix. 3). Indeed, a sect which bears the name of 'John's disciples,' exists to the present day in the East, whose sacred books are said to be pervaded by a Gnostic leaven. They are hostile alike to Judaism and Christianity, and their John and Jesus are altogether different from the characters bearing these names in our evangelists. Still, though it has been generally assumed that John did not lay down his office, we are not satisfied that the N. T. establishes this alleged fact. John may have ceased to execute his own peculiar work, as the forerunner, but may justifiably have continued to bear his most important testimony to the Messiahship of Christ; or he may even have altogether given up the duties of active life some time, at least, before his death; and yet his disciples, both before and after that event, may have maintained their individuality as a religious communion. Nor will the student of the N. T. and of ecclesiastical history, who knows how grossly a teacher far greater than John, was, both during his life and after his crucifixion, misunderstood and misrepresented, think it impossible that some misconception or some sinister motive may have had weight in preventing the Baptist church from dissolving and passing into that of Christ.

It was, not improbably, with a view to remove some error of this kind that John sent the embassy of his disciples to Jesus which is recorded in Matt. xi. 3; Luke vii. 19. The spiritual course which the teachings of Jesus were more and more taking, and the apparent failure, or at least uneasy postponement of the promised kingdom in the popular sense, especially the fact that their esteemed master lay in prison, and was in imminent danger of losing his life, may well have led John's disciples to doubt if Jesus were in truth the expected Messiah. Appearances, to them, were purely adverse. What step so fit on the part of their master, as that he should send them to Jesus himself? No intimation is found in the record that John required evidence to give him satisfaction; and all the language that is used is proper and pertinent if we suppose that the doubt lay only in the minds of his disciples. That the terms employed admit the interpretation that John was not without some misgivings (Luke vii. 23; Matt. xi. 6), we are free to allow. And if any doubt had grown up in the Baptist's mind it was most probably owing to the defective spirituality of his views; for even of him Jesus has declared, 'he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Matt. xi. 11). Were this the case, it would of itself account not only for the embassy sent by John to Jesus, but also for the continuance and perpetuation of John's separate influence as the founder of a sect.

The manner of John's death is too well known to require to be detailed here (Matt. iv. 12; xiv. 3; Luke iii. 19; Mark vi. 17; Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 2). He reproved a tyrant for a heinous crime, and received his reward in decapitation. Josephus, however, assigns a somewhat different cause for this execution from that given in the gospels. The passage bears forcible evidence to the general truth of the evangelical narrative respecting John, and therefore we transcribe it:—'Now some of the Jews thought that the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and that very justly, as a punishment of what he did against John that was called the Baptist; for Herod slew him, although he was a good man, and commanded the Jews to exercise virtue, both as to righteousness one towards another, and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism. Now when others came in crowds about him—for they were greatly moved by hearing his words—Herod, who feared lest the great influence John had over the people might put it into his power and inclination to raise a rebellion (for they seemed ready to do any thing he should advise), thought it best, by putting him to death, to prevent any mischief he might cause, and not bring himself into difficulties by sparing a man who might make him repent of it when it should be too late. Accordingly he was sent a prisoner, out of Herod's suspicious temper, to Machærus, the castle I before mentioned, and was there put to death.'

There is no contrariety between this account and that which is given in the N. T. Both may be true: John was condemned in the mind of Herod on political grounds, as endangering his position, and executed on private and ostensible grounds, in order to gratify a malicious but powerful woman. The Scriptural reason was but the pretext for carrying into effect the determinations of Herod's cabinet. That the fear of Herod was not without some ground may be seen in the popularity which John had gained (Mark xi. 32; Lardner, Works, vi. 483).

The castle of Machærus, where John was imprisoned and beheaded, was a fortress lying on the southern extremity of Peræa, at the top of the lake Asphaltites, between the dominions of Herod and Aretas, king of Arabia Petræa, and at the time of our history appears to have belonged to the former (Lardner, vi. 483). According to the Scripture account, the daughter of Herodias obtained the Baptist's head at an entertainment, without delay. How could this be, when Machærus lay at a distance from Jerusalem? The feast seems to have been made at Machærus, which, besides being a stronghold, was also a palace, built by Herod the Great, and Herod himself was now on his route towards the territories of Aretas, with whom he was at war. Bishop Marsh (Lecture xxvi.) remarks, that the soldiers who, in Luke iii. 14, are said to have come to John while baptizing in the Jordan, are designated by a term (στρατιώμενοι, not στρατιῶται) which denotes persons actually engaged in war, not merely soldiers. In the same way, in Mark vi. 27, the officer sent to bring John's head bears a military title—σπεκουλάτωρ. These minute indications are quite accordant with the fact that Herod was then making war on Aretas, as appears from Josephus (Antiq. xviii. 5. 1), and afford a very strong evidence of the credibility of the sacred narratives, by shewing that the authors described what was actually proceeding before their own eyes. We also see a reason why Herodias was present on this occasion, since she was Herod's paramour, and had, 'like another Helen,' led to the war.

John the Baptist is mentioned in the Koran, with much honour, under the name of Jahia (see Hottinger, Historia Orientalis, pp. 144-149, Tiguri 1660).

The literature connected with the subject of this article, to be found in foreign writers, is very rich. JOHN THE PRESBYTER. The important place which has been assigned by some to this individual as the writer of certain books in the sacred canon, renders it proper that some notice should be taken of him in this work. As his existence has been wholly denied by some, whilst it has been assumed as unquestionable by others, we shall best serve the interests of the reader by, in the first instance, setting before him in order all the statements occurring in ancient Christian writers respecting the object of our inquiry.

The earliest testimony is that of Papias (Euseb., H. E. iii. 39), who says, speaking of the efforts he made to establish himself with certainty in Christian truth, 'Whenever any one arrived who had had intercourse with the elders (τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις), I made inquiry concerning the declarations of these; what Andrew, what Peter, or Philip, or Thomas, or James, or John, or Matthew, or any other of the disciples of the Lord said, as also what Aristion and John the Presbyter, disciples of the Lord, say. For I believed that I should not derive so much advantage from books as from living and abiding discourse.* In reporting this, Eusebius remarks that Papias purposely adduces the name John twice, first in connection with Peter, James, and Matthew, where only the Apostle can be intended, and again, along with Aristion, where he distinguishes him by the title of 'The Presbyter.' Eusebius goes on to say that this confirms the report of those who relate that there were two men in Asia Minor who bore that name and had been closely connected with Christ, and that two tombs had been found in Ephesus bearing the name of John. In another part of his history (vii. 25), Eusebius cites Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, about the middle of the 3d century, as uttering the same tradition concerning the finding of the two tombs at Ephesus inscribed with the name of John, and as ascribing to John the Presbyter the authorship of the Apocalypse; an opinion to which Eusebius himself inclined (iii. 39). Jerome (De vir. ill., c. 9) reports the opinion of some that the second and third epistles of John are the production of John the Presbyter, 'cujus et hodie alterum sepulcrum apud Ephesum ostenditur, etsi nonnulli putant duas memorias ejusdem Johannis evangelistae esse.' An earlier testimony, that of the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 36), declares that there was a second John who was bishop of Ephesus after St. John, by whom he was instituted in this office.

Such is the evidence in favour of the existence of John the Presbyter. On examining it we find—1. That Papias knew a disciple of our Lord named John, distinct from the Evangelist, and known as ὁ πρεσβύτερος Ἰωάννης; but Papias says nothing of his being bishop of Ephesus or of his being at Ephesus at all. 2. That there was a bishop at Ephesus of the name of John, who was the successor of the apostle John there. 3. That there was a tradition that two tombs were found at Ephesus bearing the name of John, one of which was supposed to be that of the apostle, the other that of the presbyter. 4. That this supposition did not obtain universal acceptance, and was by Eusebius held so doubtful that he appeals to the statement of Papias as supporting it. This tradition, consequently, must be discounted; and in that case there remains only the statement of Papias that he knew one John the Presbyter who had been a disciple of the Lord, and the statement of the Apostolical Constitutions that there was a bishop at Ephesus of the name of John, who was instituted to his office by the apostle. As there is nothing to prove that these two were the same person, the testimony of the Constitutions must also be discounted in our present inquiry; and consequently, the statement of Papias remains as the sole direct evidence for the existence of John the Presbyter.

To this evidence there is opposed—1. The negative evidence arising from the silence of all other ancient authorities, especially the silence of Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, who, in a list of eminent teachers and bishops in Asia Minor, preserved by Eusebius (H. E., v. 24), makes no mention of John the Presbyter; and 2. The positive evidence afforded by the statement of Irenæus, who not only omits all mention of the Presbyter, but says that Papias was a hearer of John the apostle, along with Polycarp (Adv. Haer. v. 33). This counter evidence has appeared to some so strong that they have thought it sufficient to set aside that of Papias, who, they remind us, is described by Eusebius as a man of a very small intellect (σφόδρα μικρὸς τὸν νοῦν, H. E., iii. 39). But this seems going too far. Papias describes himself as a hearer of the Presbyter John (Euseb. v. 24), and in this he could hardly be mistaken, whatever was his deficiency in intellectual power; whereas it is very possible that Irenæus may have confounded the presbyter with the apostle, the latter of whom would be to his mind much more familiar than the former. The silence of Polycrates may be held proof sufficient that no John the Presbyter was bishop of Ephesus or famed as a teacher of Christianity in Asia Minor; but as Papias does not attest this, his testimony remains unaffected by this conclusion.

On the whole, the existence of a John the Presbyter seems proved by the testimony of Papias; but beyond this and the fact that he was a disciple of the Lord, nothing is certainly known of him. Credner contends that πρεσβύτερος is to be taken in its ordinary sense of 'older,' and that it was applied to the person mentioned by Papias, either because he was the senior of St. John, or because he arrived before him in Asia Minor; but this is improbable in itself, and had Papias meant to intimate this he would not have simply called him ὁ πρεσβύτερος Ἰωάννης. In his statement πρεσβύτερος is plainly opposed to ἀπόστολος as a distinctive title of office.—W. L. A.

JOIADA (יְדִידָא; Sept. Ἰωδαῖ, Ἰωδᾱ; Alex. Ἰωαδδ). A Jewish high-priest, son and successor of Eliashib, and father of Jonathan or Johanan, by whom he was succeeded (Neh. xii. 10, 11, 22). Another of his sons married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite, and was expelled by Nehemiah (Neh. xiii. 28).—†

JOIAKIM (יְחִיָּה; Sept. Ἰωακίμ), a Jewish high-priest, father of Eliashib and grandfather of Joiada. His father was Jeshua, the colleague of Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 10).—†

JOKDEAM (יְדְעָא; perhaps 'possessed by the people,' from the root יָדַע; Ἀριδαμ; Alex. Ἰεκδαμ; Jacadaam), a town of the south of Judah, near Juttaah and Carmel (Josh. xv. 5, 6). Eusebius calls it Iexdadδ; but he does not appear to have known anything of it, and its site is still unknown.—J. L. P.

JOKIM (יְחִיָּה; Sept. Ἰωακίμ), one of the sons of Shelah (1 Chron. iv. 22). [JASHUBI-LEHEM.]

JOKMEAM (יְמָעָא; Sept. Ἰωμαμ), 'gathered of the people,' from יָמַע; Ἰεμαδμ; Jemaaam), one of the cities given to the Kohathites out of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. vi. 68 [53]). It is worthy of note that the parallel passage in Josh. xxi. 22 has Kibzaim instead of Jokmeam. This may be accounted for either by a change in the name of the city—no uncommon occurrence in Palestine, or by an error of a scribe, the letters of the two names bearing considerable resemblance to each other (יְמָעָא, יְכִמְעָא), and even more in the ancient than in the modern characters. The site of Jokmeam is unknown. There is a Jokneam mentioned in the Hebrew text of 1 Kings iv. 12, but it was manifestly situated at the western extremity of Esdraelon, and was no doubt identical with JOKNEAM, as the translators of our A. V. appear to have thought (Robinson, B. R., iii. 115).—J. L. P.

* In what follows Papias reports what he heard from John concerning the authorship of the Gospels of Mark and Matthew.

JOKNEAM (יִקְנֵאָם, 'possessed by the people'; יִקְנֵאָם, יִקְנֵאָם, Madv; Alex. יִקְנֵאָם, יִקְנֵאָם; Juchanan, Jechonam, Jecnam), an ancient royal Canaanitish city, situated at the base of Mount Carmel; whence its name, Jokneam of Carmel (Josh. xii. 22). It was given to the Levites out of the tribe of Zebulun (xxi. 34). Two other passages in which it is mentioned tend to define its exact position. In describing the border of Zebulun, Joshua says: 'It went up toward the sea and Maralah, and reached to Dabbasheth, and reached to the river that is before Jokneam' (xix. 11). This river was doubtless the Kishon. Again, in 1 Kings iv. 12, the district of one of Solomon's purveyors is thus described: To Baana pertained Taanach and Megiddo, and all Beth-shean, which is by Zartanah beneath Jezreel, from Beth-shean to Abelmeholah, even unto beyond Jokneam (מֵעֵבֶר לַיִם). Baana thus held the great plain from Beth-shean at the eastern extremity, to Jokneam at the western. It is true the Hebrew text in this passage reads Jokneam, but from the passage it is evident reference is made to the city at the base of Carmel, and not to Jokneam of Ephraim [JOKMEAM]. The letters D and J are often interchanged in Hebrew.

Dr. Robinson has satisfactorily identified Jokneam with Tell Kaimon, a conspicuous little hill, covered with ruins, situated at the western extremity of Esdraelon, on the south bank of the Kishon, and close to the base of Carmel. It commands the main pass leading through the hills from Esdraelon to Sharon. The Arabic name Kaimon (قَيْمُون) is evidently identical with the Kammon of Eusebius, which lay in the great plain, six miles from Legio, on the way to Ptolemais (Onomast. s. v. Canon); and it is a corruption of the Hebrew קַיְמֹן. The Yod is dropped, as in Zerin for Jezerel; the Nun is changed to Mem; the Ayin probably was omitted in the Galilean dialect—thus the change was effected (Lightfoot, Opera, ii. 233; Robinson, B. R., iii. 115). The corruption must have taken place at an early date, for in the book of Judith (vii. 3) we have Kammon (see Van de Velde, Travels, i. 331; Memoir, p. 326).—J. L. P.

JOKSHAN (יִקְשָׁן, foowler; Sept. Ἰεζάν), second son of Abraham and Keturah, whose sons Sheba and Dedan appear to have been the ancestors of the Sabæans and Dedanites, who peopled a part of Arabia Felix (Gen. xxv. 2, 3) [ARABIA]. Knobel (Genes., p. 188) suggests that the name Jokshan may have passed into יִקְשָׁן, Kashan, and that his descendants were the Kασσαῖται of Ptolemy (vi. 7. 6) and Steph. Byzant. (s. h. v.), the Κασσάρηδες of Agatharchides (p. 60, Huds.), the Γασαρόηδες of Diod. Sic. (iii. 44), and the Casani or Gasani of Pliny (Nat. Hist., vi. 32); who dwelt by the Red Sea, to the south of the Kinædokolpites, and extended to the most northern of the Joktanites.—W. L. A.

JOKTAN (יִקְטָן, small; Sept. Ἰεκτάν), one of the sons of Eber, a descendant from Shem (Gen. x. 25-26), and the supposed progenitor of many tribes in Southern Arabia. The Arabians call him Kahtan, and recognise him as one of the principal founders of their nation. Edrisi mentions a town in Yemen called Baishat Jaktan, which Niebuhi conjectures may be the modern Kahtan (Arab. ii. 117). The Arabic Kahtan, which is commonly represented as a dialectical corruption of Joktan, seems rather to be a significant name given to him by the Arabs. An Arabic writer quoted by Mr. E. S. Poole (Smith's Dictionary, i. 1118), says he 'was named Kahtan only because of his suffering from drought' (كَحْطَانٌ, from كَحَطَ, inopia pluviae laboravit). There seems no ground for doubting that the descendants of the Arab Kahtan are Joktanites. See Schultens, Hist. Imperii Juktanid. in Arabia Felice; Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arab., pp. 3, 38; Bochart's Phaleg, iii. 15 [ARABIA].—W. L. A.

JOKTHEEL (יִקְתָּאֵל, 'subdued of God,' from יִתְּן, an old root = יָטָא; Ἰαχαφῆλ; Alex. Ἰεχ-ῤαῆλ; Jechthel), a town of Judah, situated in the plain of Philistia (Shephelah), and apparently not far distant from Lachish (Josh. xv. 38). It has not been identified.

2. (Ἰεθῶλ; Alex. Ἰεκθῶλ; Jecthel). The name given by Amaziah, king of Judah, to Selah, or Petra, the capital of Edom, to shew that he had captured it. We read in 2 Kings xiv. 7: 'He slew of Edom, in the valley of Salt, ten thousand, and took Selah by war, and called the name of it Joktheel, that is, 'subdued of God.' The date of this victory was about B.C. 850 (see AMAZIAH and SELAH; and for some additional details of the capture, 2 Chron. xxv. 11).—J. L. P.

JONADAB (יֹנָדָב, contraction of יֹהָנָדָב, God-impelled; Sept. Ἰωνάδδβ). 1. A nephew of David, a crafty person, whose counsel suggested to his cousin Amnon the means by which he accomplished his abominable design upon his half-sister Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 4, 5).

2. A son or descendant of Rechab, the progenitor of those nomadic Rechabites who held themselves bound by a vow to abstain from wine, and never to relinquish the nomadic life. The principle on which the tribe acted may be considered elsewhere [RECHABITES]. Jonadab was at the head of this tribe at the time when Jehu received his commission to exterminate the house of Ahab, and is supposed to have added to its ancient austerities the inhibition of wine. He was held in great respect among the Israelites generally: and Jehu, alive to the importance of obtaining the countenance and sanction of such a man to his proceedings, took him up in his chariot, when on his road to Samaria to complete the work he had begun at Jezreel. The terms of the colloquy which took place on this occasion are rather remarkable. Perceiving Jonadab, he saluted him, and called out, 'Is thine heart right, as my heart is with thy heart?' Jonadab answered, 'It is.' Then said Jehu, 'If it be, give me thine hand' And he gave him his hand, and was taken up into the chariot, Jehu inviting him to 'Come and see my zeal for the Lord' (2 Kings x. 15-17; Jer. xxxv. 6-10). It would seem that the Rechabites were a branch of the Kenites, over another branch of whom Heber was chief in the time of Deborah and Barak (Judg. iv. 11, 17): and as it is expressly said that Jonadab went out to meet Jehu, it seems probable that the people of Samaria, alarmed at the menacing letter which they had received from Jehu, had induced Jonadab to go to meet and appease him on the road. His venerated character, his rank as the head of a tribe, and his neutral position, well qualified him for this mission; and it was quite as much the interest of Jonadab to conciliate the new dynasty, in whose founder he beheld the minister of the divine decrees, as it was that of Jehu to obtain his concurrence and support in proceedings which he could not but know were likely to render him odious to the people.—J. JONAH (יֹנָתָן; Sept. Iouân), the fifth in order of the minor prophets. No era is assigned to him in the book of his prophecy, yet there is little doubt of his being the same person who is spoken of as the son of Amittai in 2 Kings xiv. 25. The Jewish doctors, followed by some of the fathers, have supposed him to be the son of the widow of Sarepta: 'Now by this I know,' said she to Elijah, 'that thou art a man of God, and that the word of the Lord in thy mouth is truth' אֲמַת (1 Kings xvii. 24). The restored child was thenceforward named יֹנָתָן, a title which was to preserve the memory of his miraculous resuscitation (Hieron. Prefat. in Jonam). His birthplace was Gath-hepher, in the tribe of Zebulun. In that place, according to Jerome, his grave was pointed out, and El-Meshad is identified by ecclesiastical tradition with Gath-hepher. Jonah flourished in the beginning of the reign of Jeroboam II., and predicted the successful conquests, enlarged territory, and brief prosperity of the Israelitish kingdom under that monarch's sway. The oracle itself is not extant, though Hitzig has, by a novel process of criticism, amused himself with a fancied discovery of it in chaps. xv. and xvi. of Isaiah. Hitzig, Des Proph. Jon. Orakel über Moab kritisch-vindicirt, etc., Heidelberg 1831.

The book of Jonah contains an account of the prophet's commission to denounce Nineveh, and of his refusal to undertake the embassy—of the method he employed to escape the unwelcome task [TARSHISH], and the miraculous means which God used to curb his self-willed spirit, and subdue his petulant and querulous disposition. The third and fourth chapters briefly detail Jonah's fulfilment of the divine command, and present us with another exemplification of his refractory temper. His attempt to flee from the presence of the Lord must have sprung from a partial insanity, produced by the excitement of distracting motives in an irascible and melancholy heart. The temerity and folly of the fugitive could scarcely be credited, if they had not been equalled by future outbreaks of a similar peevish and morbid infatuation. Dr. Pusey's diluted interpretation of the phrase כַּפְנֵי יְהוָה, as if it signified only an evasion of the mission, or that he fled from officially standing in the divine presence, does not relieve us of the difficulty. It was as absurd in Hebrew creed to attempt to escape the divine omnipotence as it was to elude the divine omnipresence. But men in certain moods have often tried to do what their theology tells them is utterly in vain, and such actions done against a conviction of their vanity is yet no proof of theoretic unbelief.

The history of Jonah is certainly striking and extraordinary. His mission was to a distant city, brought about that time into closer connection with Israel. There is no precise parallel to it, for the mission of Elisha to Damascus is not quite analogous. But is any act of God to be suspected if it happen to want a direct historical parallel? Must we reject every apparent anomaly in the procedure of him whose 'ways are not our ways?' The Divine Being had made himself known to other nations in various forms; as in Egypt by Moses and his wonders, and in Philistia by the captivity of his ark. The influence of the theocracy on surrounding countries might be extended in a variety of ways, and Jonah's refusal of the message is as suggestive as his subsequent performance of it.

The extraordinary character given to Jonah in this book is so unflattering to the well-known national pride and partialities, that it is a presumption in favour of its historic reality. The tale of the prophet's flight is true to life;—the sudden departure to the westward—the paying of the fare when he took ship—the different effects produced by the storm on the crew and their passenger—they in their panic crying to their gods, and he fast asleep 'in the sides of the ship' wearied out with anxiety and terror—his conviction that Jehovah had overtaken him, and his sullen resignation to his fate—the casting of the lots, and the dialogue that followed—the reluctance of the sailors to do an act of murder for their own safety, even though the prophet had enjoined them—their prayer to Jonah's God in their extremity—the casting out of Jonah—the calm that followed, and the effect on the simple mariners—their devoutness and their sacrifice, not now to their own divinities, but to Jehovah.

What is said about the size of Nineveh also is in accordance with fact. It was 'an exceeding great city of three days' journey.' Built in the form of a parallelogram, it made, according to Diodorus (ii. 7), a circuit of 480 furlongs, or about 60 miles. It has been usual, since the publication of Layard's Nineveh, to say that the great ruins of Koyunjik, Nimrud, Keremles, and Khorsabad, form such a parallelogram, the distances from north to south being about 18 miles, and from east to west about 12; the longer sides thus measuring 36 miles, and the shorter ones 24. But against this view Professor Rawlinson has recently urged, with considerable force, that the four great ruins bore distinct local titles; that Nimrud, identified with Calah, is mentioned in Scripture as a place so far separated from Nineveh, that 'a great city'—Resen—lay between them (Gen. x. 12); that there are no signs of a continuous town; and that the four sites are fortified 'on what would be the inside of the city.' Still Nineveh, as represented by the ruins of Koyunjik and Nebbi-Yunus, or Tomb of Jonah, was of an oblong shape, with a circuit of about eight miles, and was therefore a place of unusual size—'an exceeding great city.' The phrase, 'three days' journey,' may mean that it would take that time to traverse the city and pro claim through all its localities the divine message; and the emphatic point then is, that at the end of his first day's journey the preaching of Jonah took effect. The clause, 'that cannot discern their right hand from their left hand,' probably denotes children, and 120,000 of these might represent a population of more than half a million [NINEVEH]. Rawlinson's Five Great Monarchies, vol. i. p. 310; Sir Henry Rawlinson's Comment. on Cuneif. Inscrip., p. 17; Captain Jones' Topography of Nineveh; Journal of Asiatic Society, vol. xv. p. 298. Jonah entered the city 'a day's journey,' that is, probably went from west to east uttering his incisive and terrible message. The sublime audacity of the stranger—the ringing monotony of his sharp short cry—had an immediate effect. The people believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and man and beast fasted alike. The exaggeration ascribed to this picture adds to its credibility, so prone is Oriental nature to extremes. If the burden of Jonah was to have any effect at all, one might say that it must be profound and immediate. It was a panic—we dare not call it a revival, or with Dr. Pusey, dignify it into conversion. There was plainly no permanent result. After the sensation had passed away, idolatry and rapacity resumed their former sway, as is testified by the prophets Isaiah, Nahum, and Zephaniah. Yet the appalled conscience of Nineveh did confess its 'evil and its violence,' as it grovelled in the dust. Various causes may have contributed to deepen this consternation—the superstition of the people, and the sudden and unexplained appearance of the foreigner with his voice of doom. 'The king,' as Layard says, 'might believe him to be a special minister from the supreme deity of the nation,' and it was only 'when the gods themselves seemed to interpose that any check was placed on the royal pride and lust.' Layard adds, 'It was not necessary to the effect of his preaching that Jonah should be of the religion of the people of Nineveh. I have known a Christian priest frighten a whole Mussulman town to tents and repentance by publicly proclaiming that he had received a divine mission to announce a coming earthquake or plague' (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 632). The compulsory mourning of the brute creation has at least one analogy in the lamentation made over the Persian General Masistius: 'The horses and beasts of burden were shaven' (Herodotus, ix. 24). According to Plutarch also, Alexander commanded the observance of a similar custom on the death of Hephæstion. Therefore, in the accessories of the narrative there is no violation of probability—all is in accordance with known customs and facts.

The characteristic prodigy of the book does not resemble the other miraculous phenomena recorded in Scripture. Yet we must believe in its literal occurrence, as the Bible affords no indication of its being a myth, allegory, or parable. On the other hand, our Saviour's pointed and peculiar allusion to it is evidence of its reality (Matt. xii. 40). The Pharisees asked a sign—σημειον—or supernatural token—some signal and brilliant proof of his mission. He refuses such a sign in their sense of it, but adds that the sign of Jonah shall be given them: 'For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so also shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.' To say that such words are 'only put into the mouth' of Jesus, as Paulus, De Wette, Strauss, and Krabbe affirm, at once gainsays all critical evidence, and puts an end to all reasoning on the point. Holding, however, that Jesus spoke them, and there is the same proof that he spoke them as that he spoke any other sentence ascribed to him in the gospels, we maintain, that the σημειον is not Jonah's call to repentance, but his miraculous preservation. The context plainly implies it, and warrants us to give to σημειον the meaning of a miracle or supernatural token. Not that Jonah, in the strict theological sense, was a type of Christ—but this wonder of his life had in itself, and in its lessons, a striking resemblance to that great event in Christ's career which proved the divinity of his mission, and the perfection of his mediatorial work. The preaching of Jonah referred to in verse 41 is indeed connected with the sign, but is distinct from it, and brings out another aggravation of Pharisaic unbelief. The denial of the possibility or probability of this miracle, or of other miracles, limits omnipotence, while it deifies the uniformity of nature, and judges of the sovereign ruler from our own self-imposed conceptions of his ways and works. The opinion of the earlier Jews (Tobit xiv. 4; Joseph. Antiq. ix. 10. 2) is also in favour of the literality of the adventure. It requires less faith to credit this simple excerpt from Jonah's biography, than to believe the numerous hypotheses that have been invented to deprive it of its supernatural character. In vindication of its reality, it may be argued too, that the allusions of Christ to Old Testament events on similar occasions are to actual occurrences (John iii. 14; vi. 48); that the purpose which God had in view justified his miraculous interposition; and that this miracle must have had a salutary effect both on the minds of the Ninevites and on the people of Israel. Neither is the character of Jonah improbable. Many reasons might induce him to avoid the discharge of his prophetic duty—fear of being thought a false prophet, scorn of a foreign and hostile race, desire for their utter destruction, and a false dignity which might reckon it beneath him to officiate among uncircumcised idolaters (Laberenz, De Vera lib. Jona Interp., Fulda 1836).

Some, who cannot altogether reject the reality of the narrative, suppose it to have had a historical basis, though its present form be fanciful or mythical. Such an opinion is the evident result of a mental struggle between receiving it as a real transaction and regarding it as wholly a fiction. (Blasche, Grimm, Uebersetz. p. 61, and Abarbanel, regard it as a dream produced in that sleep which fell upon Jonah as he lay in the sides of the ship). The opinion of the famous Herman von der Hardt, in his Jonas in luce, and other similar productions, a full abstract of which is given by Rosenmüller (Prolegom. in Jonam, p. 19), was, that the book is a historical allegory, descriptive of the fate of Manasseh, and Josiah his grandson, kings of Judah. The fancy of this eccentric author has found ample gratification. Tarshish, according to him, represents the kingdom of Lydia; the ship, the Jewish republic, whose captain was Zadok the high-priest; while the casting of Jonah into the sea symbolized the temporary captivity of Manasseh in Babylon. We cannot say, with Rosenmüller, that this theory deserves even the praise of ingenious fiction. That the book is an allegory, is the opinion of Bertholdt, Rosenmüller, Gesenius, and Winer—an allegory based upon the Phœnician Myth of Hercules and the Sea-monster. Less, in his tract, Von Historischen Styl der Urwelt, supposed that all difficulty might be removed by imagining that Jonah, when thrown into the sea, was taken up by a ship having a large fish for a figure-head—a theory somewhat more pleasing than the hypothesis of Anton, who fancied that the prophet took refuge in the interior of a dead whale floating near the spot where he was cast overboard (Rosenm. Prolegom. in Jon., p. 328). Not unlike the opinion of Less is that of Charles Taylor, in his Fragments affixed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cxlv., that it signifies a life-preserver, a notion which, as his manner is, he endeavours to support by mythological metamorphoses founded on the form and names of the famous fish-god of Philistia. But many regard the book as a mere fiction with a moral design—the grotesque coinage of a Hebrew imagination. This opinion, variously modified, seems to be that of Semler, Michaelis, Herder, Stäudlin, Eichhorn, Augusti, Meyer, Pareau, Hitzig, and Maurer. On the other hand, the historical character of the narrative is held by Hess, Lilienthal, Sack, Reindl, Hävernicks, Hengstenberg, Laberenz, Baumgarten, Delitzsch, Welte, Stuart, and Keil, Einleitung, sec. 89. (See Friedrichsen Krit. übersicht der verschied. Ansichten von d. Buch Jona, 2d ed. 1841.) There are others who allow, as De Wette and Knobel, that Jonah was a real person, but hold that the book is made up, for didactic purposes, of legendary stories which had gathered around him. Bunsen maintains that the hymn in the second chapter is a genuine poem composed by Jonah on an occasion of shipwreck and deliverance, and that it suggested the narrative which now imbeds it.

The plain literal import of the narrative being set aside, the supposed design of it has been very variously interpreted. Michaelis, Semler, and Bleek, virtually suppose the purpose of the narrative to be the injustice of the arrogance and hatred cherished by the Jews towards other nations. Eichhorn and Jahn think its design was to teach the Jews that other people with less privileges excelled them in pious obedience. Hezel argues that this episode was meant to solace and excite the prophets under the discharge of difficult and dangerous duties; while Paulus (Memorabilia, vi. 32, sqq.) maintains that the object of the author of Jonah is to impress the fact that God remits punishment on repentance and reformation. Similar is the idea of Kimchi and Pareau. Krahmer thinks that the theme of the writer is that God's kindness to penitents extends to Gentiles as well as Jews. Maurer adheres to the opinion that it inculcates the sin of not obeying God, even in pronouncing severe threatenings on a heathen people; and lastly, Köster (Die Propheten des A. und N. T., Leipz. 1839) favours the malignant insinuation that its chief end was to save the credit of the prophets among the people, though their predictions against foreign nations might not be fulfilled, as Nineveh was preserved after being so menaced and doomed. While the book embodies several of these truths, the prophet's mission had also a direct bearing on the profligacy, impenitence, and danger of his own people.

Much profane wit has been expended, very unnecessarily and very absurdly, on the miraculous means of Jonah's deliverance. It is simply said, 'The Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up

Jonah.' Now the species of marine animal is not defined, and the Greek κῆτος is often used to specify, not the genus whale, but any large fish or sea-monster. All objections to its being a whale which lodged Jonah in its stomach from its straitness of throat, or rareness of haunt in the Mediterranean, are thus removed. Hesychius defines κῆτος as θαλάσσιος ἰχθύς παμμεγέθης. Eustathius explains its correspondent adjective κητώσσαν by μεγάλην, in the Homeric line (Iliad, ii. 581)—

οἱ δ' εἶχον κολῆν Λακεδαιμόνα κητώσσαν.

Diodorus Siculus speaks of terrestrial monsters as κητώδη ζῶα, and describes a huge fish as κῆτος ἀπιστον τὸ μέγεθος. The Scripture speaks only of an enormous fish, which under God's direction swallowed the prophet, and does not point out the species to which the monster belonged. There is no ground for the supposition of Bishop Jebb, that the asylum of Jonah was not in the stomach of a whale, but in a cavity of its throat, which, according to naturalists, is a very capacious receptacle, sufficiently large, as Captain Scoresby asserts, to contain a merchant ship's jolly-boat full of men (Sacred Literature, p. 178). Since the days of Bochart it has been a common opinion that the fish was of the shark species, Lamia canis carcharias, or 'sea-dog' (Bochart, Op. iii. 72; Calmet's Dissertation sur Jon.) Entire human bodies have been found in some fishes of this kind. The stomach, too, has no influence on any living substance admitted into it. Granting these facts as proof of what is termed the economy of miracles, still must we say, in reference to the supernatural preservation of Jonah, 'Is anything too hard for the Lord?' We cannot accede to the system of Gale, Huet, Bryant, Faber, and Taylor, in tracing all pagan fiction, legend, and mythology, to Scripture facts and events. The miraculous incident of this book is unlike in many particulars the story of Arion and the dolphin (Herodot. i. 24), or the wild adventure of Hercules in regard to Hermione, which is referred to in Lycophron (Cassandra, v. 33). The same assertion may be made of the myth of Perseus and Andromeda and the Babylonian fable of the sea monster Oannes—a name not unlike that of Jonah. Cyrillus Alex., however, in his Comment. in Jon., notices some similitude between the incident of Jonah and the fabled enterprise of the son of Alcmena. Compare, too, Theophylact (Opp., tom. iv. p. 189).

On what portion of the coast Jonah was set down in safety we are not informed. The opinions held as to the peculiar spot by the Rabbins and other similar expositors need not to be repeated. The prophet proceeded, on receiving a second commission, to fulfil it. The second commission was sharper and more determinate than the original one. The fearful menace had the desired effect. The city humbled itself before God, and a respite was vouchsafed. The king (Pul, according to Usher) and his people fasted, and their penitence was accepted. The spirit of Jonah was chafed that the doom which he had uttered was not executed. He retired to a station out of the city whence he might witness the threatened catastrophe. Under the shadow of a gourd prepared by God he reclined, while Jehovah taught him by the growth and speedy death of this plant, and his attachment to it, a sublime lesson of patient and forgiving generosity. The gourd, קִיקִיּוֹן, was probably the Ricinus, whose name Kiki is yet preserved in some of the tongues of the East. The Sept. renders it κολοκύνθη. Jerome translates it hedera, but against his better judgment, and for fear of giving offence to the critics of his age, as he quietly adds in justification of his less preferable rendering, 'sed timuimus grammaticos.' It is impossible to determine the king who reigned in Nineveh at the period of Jonah's mission. Layard (Nineveh, ii. 249) supposes that the visit of the prophet took place during the second dynasty, which may have commenced 747 B. C.; but Jeroboam II., under whom or at the beginning of whose reign Jonah prophesied, began to reign 825 B. C. The earlier Assyrian dynasty was also a mighty one, and to one of its kings Jonah may have been sent—perhaps to Ivalush III., supposed by some to be the Pul of Scripture. The name of Jehu, grandfather of Jeroboam II., has been discovered on an obelisk, in connection with Shalmanubar grandfather of Ivalush.

The book of Jonah is a simple narrative, with the exception of the prayer or thanksgiving in chap. ii. Its style and mode of narration are uniform. There are no traces of compilation, as Nactigall supposed. The prayer contains, indeed, not only imagery peculiar to itself, but also such imagery as at once was suggested to the mind of a pious Hebrew preserved in circumstances of extreme jeopardy. On this principle we account for the similarity of some portions of its phraseology to portions of Ps. xxx., xxxi., xlii., lxix., cx., cxxx., etc. The language in such places had been hallowed by frequent usage, and had become the consecrated idiom of a distressed and succoured Israelite. The prayer, allowed by many to be original, is thus based on theocratic language which the saints used in common, and is well adapted to Jonah's strange and perilous situation—uttered by him in the whale's belly and afterwards recorded by himself. It is mere guesswork to say that the psalms referred to were imitated from it, and there is no proof of its being a collection of excerpts or an anthology. That the book of Jonah has a place among the prophets shows the opinion held of it by those who formed the canon. It has, however, this anomaly, as Stähelin remarks, 'that it is not a prophecy, but the history of a prophecy' (Specielle Einleitung, p. 360, 1862). But the lesson for the people and for all time lies as much in the circumstances as in the brief oracle which Jonah repeated. There is little reason either for dating the composition of this book later than the age of Jonah, or for supposing it the production of another than the prophet himself (Vance Smith, Proph. relating to Nineveh, p. 252). The book does not, indeed, claim Jonah for its author, but to his authorship its use of the third person in speaking of him can be really no objection. The Chaldaisms which Jahn and others find in it may be accounted for by the nearness of the canton of Zebulun, to which Jonah belonged, to the northern territory, whence by national intercourse Aramaic peculiarities might be insensibly borrowed. Thus we have ספינה—a ship with a deck—not the more common Hebrew term; רֶכֶב—a foreign title applied to the captain; מִנֵּה, to appoint—found however in Ps. lxi., a psalm which Hupfeld without any valid grounds places after the Babylonish captivity; אָמַר, to command, as in the later books; צִוָּה, command, referring to the royal decree, and probably taken from the native Assyrian tongue; רֶכֶב, to row, a nautical term; and the abbreviated form of the relative, which however occurs in other books, etc.

As for the date of the book, Gesenius, Ewald, and many others, place it after the exile, Bleek in the Persian times, and Hitzig in the period of the Maccabees. Yet Ewald admits that the conclusion of the book is in the true prophetic style. There is no force in the assertion that the phrase 'Nineveh was an exceeding great city' implies that it had long perished, the language is only in accordance with the common idiom of narrative (Keil, Einleitung, sec. 90). Sharpe (Bononi, Nineveh and its palaces, p. 73) places the book in the reign of Josiah, as if the partial overthrow of Nineveh by Nabopolassar were connected with Jonah's prophecy, and the purport of his book were to explain the divine justice in sparing it. With as much probability the overthrow menaced by Jonah and warded off for a season by repentance, may have come upon the city at the conclusion of the first dynasty, for the first king of the second dynasty seems to have been a usurper, since, unlike his royal predecessors, he makes no mention of his ancestors [ASSYRIA]. The book seems to be but a fragment, though the commencing 1, i. 1, which refers to prior things, will not of itself prove a literary connection with some antecedent and unreported oracles (Ezek. i. 1), nor can we assign it the deeper logical meaning which Pusey gives it. Apocryphal prophecies ascribed to Jonah may be found in the pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Proph., c. 16), and the Chronic. Paschale.

Among the numerous commentators on Jonah may be noticed Archbishop Abbot, Exposition of Jonah, 1600; Crocius, Comment. in Jonam., Cassell 1656; J. Gerhardt, Annot. in Proph. Amos et Jon. etc., Frag. 1692; Leusden, Jonas Illustratus, 1692; Lessing, Observat. in Vatic. Jon., 1782; Grimm, *Der Proph. JONATHAN (יֹנָתָן, or יְהוֹנָתָן, JEHOATHAN, Given by Jehovah; comp. Theodorus; Sept. Ἰωνάθαρ). 1. A Levite descended from Gershom, the son of Moses (Judg. xviii. 30). It is, indeed, said, in our common copies, that the Gershom from whom this Jonathan sprang was 'the son of Manasseh'; but it is on very good grounds supposed that in the name Moses (מֹשֶׁה), the single letter נ (n) has been interpolated, changing it into Manasseh (מְנַשֶּׁה), in order to save the character of the great lawgiver from the stain of having an idolater among his immediate descendants. The singular name Gershom, and the date of the transaction, go far to establish this view. Accordingly, the Vulgate, and some copies of the Septuagint, actually exhibit the name of Moses instead of Manasseh. The interpolation, however, has been very timidly executed. The letter j was originally placed above the line of the other letters (as it now appears in the printed Hebrew Bibles), as if rather to suggest than to make an alteration; but in process of time the letter sunk down into the body of the word. The Hebrew writers themselves admit the fact of the interpolation, and allege the intention to veil the disgrace of Moses, by suggesting a figurative descent from Manasseh. The history of this Jonathan is involved in the narrative which occupies Judg. xvii., xviii.; and is one of the two accounts which form a sort of appendix to that book. The events themselves appear to have occurred soon after the death of Joshua, and of the elders who outlived him, when the government was in a most unsettled state. Its proper place, in the chronological order, would have been between the second and third chapters of the book.

Jonathan, who was resident at Bethlehem, lived at a time when the dues of the sanctuary did not afford a livelihood to the numerous Levites who had a claim upon them; and belonged to a tribe destitute of the landed possessions which gave to all others a sufficient maintenance. He, therefore, went forth to seek his fortune. In Mount Ephraim he came to 'a house of gods,' which had been established by one Micah, who wanted nothing but a priest to make his establishment complete [MICAH]. This person made Jonathan what was manifestly considered the handsome offer of engaging him as his priest for his victuals, a yearly suit of clothes, and ten shekels (twenty-five shillings) a year in money. Here he lived for some time, till the Danite spies, who were sent by their tribe to explore the north, passed this way and formed his acquaintance. When, not long after, the body of armed Danites passed the same way when going to settle near the sources of the Jordan, the spies mentioned Micah's establishment to them; on which they went and took away not only 'the ephod, the teraphim, and the graven image,' but the priest also, that they might set up the same worship in the place of which they were going to take possession. Micah vainly protested against this robbery; but Jonathan himself was glad at the improvement in his prospects, and from that time, even down to the captivity, he and his descendants continued to be priests of the Danites in the town of Laish, the name of which they changed to Dan.

There is not any reason to suppose that this establishment, whether in the hands of Micah or of the Danites, involved an apostasy from Jehovah. It appears rather to have been an attempt to localise or domesticate His presence, under those symbols and forms of service which were common among the neighbouring nations, but were forbidden to the Hebrews. The offence here was two-fold,—the establishment of a sacred ritual different from the only one which the law recognised, and the worship by symbols, naturally leading to idolatry, with the ministration of one who could not legally be a priest, but only a Levite, and under circumstances in which no Aaronic priest could legally have officiated. It is more than likely that this establishment was eventually merged in that of the golden calf, which Jeroboam set up in this place, his choice of which may very possibly have been determined by its being already in possession of 'a house of gods.'

2. The eldest son of Saul, king of Israel, and consequently heir apparent of the throne which David was destined to occupy (1 Sam. xiv. 9; 1 Chron. viii. 33; ix. 39). The war with the Philistines, which occupied the early part of his father's reign, afforded Jonathan more than one opportunity of displaying the chivalrous valour and the princely qualities with which he was endowed. His exploit in surprising the Philistine garrison at Michmash, attended only by his armour-bearer, is one of the most daring which history or even romance records (1 Sam. xiv. 1-14). His father came to follow up this victory, and in the ensuing pursuit of the confounded Philistines, Jonathan, spent with fatigue and hunger, refreshed himself with some wild honey which he found in a wood through which he passed. He knew not that his father had rashly vowed to put to death any one who touched a morsel of food before night. When the fact transpired, Saul felt himself bound to execute his vow even upon his gallant son; but the people, with whom the young prince was a great favourite, interposed, saying, 'Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid! As the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he hath wrought with God this day' (1 Sam. xiv. 16-52).

Jealousy and every mean or low feeling were strangers to the generous heart of Jonathan. Valiant and accomplished himself, none knew better how to acknowledge valour and accomplishment in others. The act of David in meeting the challenge of Goliath, and in overcoming that huge barbarian, entirely won his heart; and from that day forward the son of Jesse found no one who loved him so tenderly, who admired his high gifts with so much enthusiasm, or who risked so much to preserve him from harm, as the very prince whom he was destined to exclude from a throne. Jonathan knew well what was to happen, and he submitted cheerfully to the appointment which gave the throne of his father to the young shepherd of Bethlehem. In the intensity of his love and confidence he shrank not to think of David as his destined king and master; and his dreams of the future pictured nothing brighter than the day in which David should reign over Israel, and he be one with him in friendship, and next to him in place and council—not because he was covetous even of this degree of honour, but because 'next to David' was the place where he wished always to be, and where he desired to rest.

When Saul began to hate David as his intended successor, he was highly displeased at the friendship which had arisen between him and his son. This exposed Jonathan to much contumely, and even to danger of life; for, once at least, the king's passion against him on this account rose so high that he cast a javelin at him 'to smite him to the wall.'

This unequivocal act taught Jonathan that the court of Saul was no safe place for David. He told him so, and they parted with many tears. David then set forth upon those wanderings among strangers and in solitary places, which lasted all the time of Saul. The friends met only once more. Saul was in pursuit of David when he was in the wilderness of Ziph; and Jonathan could not forbear coming to him secretly in the wood to give him comfort and encouragement (1 Sam. xxiii. 16-18). Nothing more is related of Jonathan till both he and his father lost their lives in the fatal battle of Gilboa, combating against the enemies of their country. When informed of this catastrophe, David uttered a lamentation over his lost friend, than which there is, perhaps, nothing in Hebrew poetry more beautiful and touching, nothing more complete as a whole, or more full of fine images and tender thoughts.—J. K.

3. Son of Shimeah and nephew of David, famous for having encountered and slain a Philistine giant of Gath (2 Sam. xxi. 21; 1 Chron. xx. 7). It is probably the same person who is mentioned 1 Chron. xxvii. 32 as one of David's officers, and who is there described as a wise man and a scribe. The word used there to indicate his relationship to David is דודר, a word which, though commonly applied to a father's brother, properly denotes simple relationship of any kind, and may therefore be used for nephew as well as for uncle.

4. The son of Abiathar the high-priest, who, from the only two occasions on which his name is introduced, may be regarded as especially distinguished by his qualities as a swift and trustworthy messenger (2 Sam. xv. 36; 1 Kings i. 42, 43).

5. The son of Jehoiada and his successor in the priesthood (Neh. xii. 11). In vers. 22 and 23 of this chap. he is called Johanan, and it is recorded that the catalogue of the heads of houses among the Levites was kept in a book of chronicles up to his time. What the meaning of this statement may be is not very clear, for the writer himself informs us of lists continued till the reign of Darius the Persian. Bertheau proposes to connect the latter clause of ver. 23 with ver. 24, and to read thus—'And to the days of Johanan the son of Eliashib were heads of the Levites, Hashabiah,' etc. Josephus, who also calls him John, records the slaughter by him of his brother Jesus in the temple in a fit of passion, excited by the latter making pretensions to the priesthood; a crime which, he says, was punished by God by the oppression of the nation and the profanation of the temple by the Persians (Antiq. xi. 7. 1).

Other persons of the name of Jonathan are mentioned 2 Sam. xxiii. 32; comp. 1 Chron. xi. 34; Esd. viii. 6; x. 15; Neh. xii. 14; xii. 35; Jer. xi. 8; 1 Maccab. ix. 19; xiii. 11; 2 Maccab. i. 23.—W. L. A.

JONATHAN B. UZZIEL (יהונתן בן עוזיאל), the celebrated translator of the Pentateuch and Prophets into Chaldee, was the distinguished disciple of Hillel I., and therefore flourished about 30 B.C. [EDUCATION]. He was the first of those thirty disciples of Hillel who, in the language of the Talmud, 'were worthy to possess the power of stopping the sun like Joshua,' and 'when he sat studying the Scriptures, every bird which happened to fly over his head was burned or converted into a Seraph' (Succa 28, a; Baba Bathra 134, a). His expositions were those of the three last prophets, viz., Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, which had been orally transmitted, and the high esteem in which they were held by the nation may be gathered from the following description in the Talmud:—'When the illuminating sun arose upon the dark passages of the Prophets, through this translation, the length and breadth of Palestine were agitated, and everywhere the voice of God (בְּת קוֹל) or the voice of the people (vox populi vox dei) was heard asking, 'Who has disclosed these mysteries to the sons of men?' With great humility and becoming modesty, Jonathan b. Uzziel answered, 'I have disclosed thy mysteries; but thou, O Lord, knowest that I have not done it to get glory for myself or for the house of my father; but for thy glory's sake, that discussion might not increase in Israel' (Megilla 3, a). From these notices in the Talmud, it will be seen that he is only described as the Chaldee translator of the Prophets; and, indeed, it is distinctly declared in the last quoted passage that when Jonathan wanted also to translate the Hagiographa (כְּתוּבִים), the same voice from Heaven (בְּת קוֹל) emphatically forbade it (רִייד) because of the great Messianic mysteries contained therein (רְאוּת בִּיה קִץ מְשִׁיחַ), especially in the book of Daniel (comp. Rashi in loco). But as tradition has also ascribed to him the paraphrase of the Pentateuch which is known by the name of Pseudo-Jonathan, and the Targum of the Five Megilloth, and as the student will naturally look for an account of the editions of, and the literature on these paraphrases under the name which they bear, it is deemed best to describe them here.

The (reputed) paraphrase of Jonathan on the Pentateuch (תרגום יונתן על התורה), as has been shewn with great learning and reason in a Prize Essay by Selgsohn and Traub (Frankel's Monatsschrift, vol. vi., Leipzig 1857, pp. 96-114, 138-149), was made in the middle of the 7th century, by some one who was anxious to make a complete version of what is called the Jerusalem or Palestine Targum (תרגום ירושלמי), which in reality is nothing but desultory glosses on Onkelos' paraphrase. The Targum thus based upon the ancient Jerusalem fragments was at first called Targum Jerusalem, and afterwards obtained the name of Targum Jonathan, by erroneously resolving the abbreviation תי תרגום ירושלמי into תרגום יונתן. This so-called paraphrase of Jonathan b. Uzziel on the Pentateuch, was first published in Venice 1590-91, with the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch, the paraphrase of Onkelos, the fragments of the Jerusalem glosses, the commentaries of Rashi and Jacob b. Asher, then in Basle 1607, Hanau 1614, Amsterdam 1640, Prague 1646, etc., etc., and has lately been printed, with a commentary, in the beautiful edition of the Pentateuch with the Rabbinic commentaries, Vienna 1859. Explanations of this Targum were also written by David b. Jacob, Prague 1609; Feiwei b. David Secharja, Hanau 1614; Mordecai Kremser, Amsterdam 1671. It was translated into Latin by Chevallier in Walton's Polyglott. The first volume of an English translation, containing Genesis and Exodus, has just been published by Etheridge (Longman 1862); but the masterly treatises on this Pseudo-Jonathan are by Selgsohn and Traub, already quoted, and by Frankel, Zeitschrift für die religiöse Interesse d. Judenthums, 1846, p. 100, etc. Comp. also Wiener, De Jonathanis in Pentateuchum paraphrasi chaldaica, Erlangen 1823; Petermann, De duabus Pentateuchi paraphrasis chaldaicis, Berlin 1829.

The (reputed) paraphrase of Jonathan on the Five Megilloth, is perhaps of a still later date, and has most probably been compiled by several individuals from ancient materials. It is generally published with the Hebrew text of these Megilloth in the Jewish editions of the Pentateuch, and is contained in all the Rabbinic Bibles. A rhymed version of the whole of this paraphrase by Jacob b. Samuel, also called Koppelman b. Bonem, was published about 1584. A Latin version of it is given in Walton's Polyglott. Gill has given an English translation of the entire paraphrase on the Song of Songs (Comment on the Song, 1728). Ginsburg translated the first chapter of the paraphrase on the Song (Comment on the Song, p. 29, etc.), and the whole of the paraphrase on Ecclesiastes (Comment on Ecclesiastes, p. 503, etc.) There are Hebrew commentaries on this paraphrase by Mordecai Lorca, Cracow 1580, and Chajim Feivel, Berlin 1705.

The paraphrase of Jonathan on the Prophets (תרגום נביאים ראשונים ואחרונים) embraces Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor Prophets. The importance of this version may be judged of not only from the opinion of the ancient Jews, that it embodies the expositions of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, but from the fact that it contains numerous ancient readings which are undoubtedly genuine, and which relieve many an obscure passage in the Prophets from the constrained and unnatural interpretations forced upon it by critics who are determined to adhere to manifest textual corruptions. A most interesting and instructive list of these readings of Jonathan b. Uzziel, and by no means an exhaustive one, is given in the Hebrew Annual entitled הוֹחֵלֵץ, vol. i., Lemberg 1852, p. 109, etc. This paraphrase is printed in all the Rabbinic Bibles, and is given in the Polyglotts of Antwerp 1572, Paris 1645, London 1657, etc., with a Latin translation. JONES, JEREMIAH, was born in 1693, and died in 1724. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters, and was for some time pastor of a congregation at Forest Green, Avening, Gloucestershire. He had also an academy at Nailsworth in that neighbourhood, where he resided. His leisure time was devoted to Biblical studies. In 1719 he published A Vindication of St. Matthew's Gospel from Mr. Whiston's charge of Dislocations, etc., in which he maintains, with much ability and learning, the integrity of the existing text of that gospel, and offers some valuable remarks on the harmony of the four gospels. At his death he left in MS. the work on which his fame principally rests, his New and Full Method of Settling the Canonical Authority of the N. T. This was published in 1726 in 2 vols. 8vo, followed afterwards by a third vol. This work, along with his dissertation on Matthew, has been recently issued in a correct and elegant edition from the Clarendon Press, Oxford 1827. The writings of Jones are marked by sound erudition, careful citation, and judicious inference.—W. L. A.

JOPPA and JAPHO (יָפֹה and יָפוֹה), 'beauty,' in the LXX. and N. T. Ἰόππη; Vulg. Joppa, one of the most ancient and important sea-port towns of Palestine, situated on the coast of the Mediterranean, in lat. 32° 2', and long. E. 34° 47', about 30 geographical miles from Jerusalem, and nearly midway between the promontory of Carmel and Gaza. Various accounts have been given of the origin and meaning of the name. Some derive it from the Heb. יָפֹה, 'beautiful'; others from Japhet, the son of Noah; classic authors from Ἰόπη, the daughter of Aeolus (see Reland, p. 864-65).

The first mention of Japho is in the description given by Joshua of the boundaries of Dan, of which it was one of the marks (xix. 46). We hear no more of it till the time of Solomon. That wise monarch was the father of Jewish commerce, and he resolved to imitate the Phœnicians in building navies and founding sea-ports. By him, probably, Joppa was made the port of the Jewish capital, and the western outlet of its trade, as Eziongeber was the eastern. When building the Temple he employed Tyrian workmen to fell timber in the pine and cedar forests of Lebanon; they conveyed it 'in floats by sea to Joppa,' whence it was carried to Jerusalem (2 Chron. ii. 16). At Joppa Jonah embarked for Tarshish, in his vain attempt to escape an unpleasant mission to Nineveh (Jonah i. 3). During the captivity the situation of the city, and its commercial importance, appear to have saved it from ruin. On the return of the Jews, Ezra tells us that they gave 'meat, and drink, and oil to them of Zidon, and to them of Tyre, to bring cedar-trees from Lebanon to the sea of Joppa,' for rebuilding the House of the Lord (iii. 7).

After the close of O. T. history Joppa rose in importance. The sea was then beginning to be the highway of nations. Greece, Egypt, Persia, and some of the little kingdoms of Asia Minor had their fleets for commerce and war. Joppa was the only port in Palestine proper at which foreign ships could touch; it was thus not only the shipping capital, but the key of the whole country on the sea-board. During the wars of the Maccabees it was one of the principal strongholds of Palestine (1 Maccab. x. 75; xiv. 5, 34; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 15. 1). It would seem that Jews then constituted only a minority of the population; and the foreign residents—Greeks, Egyptians, and Syrians—were so rich and powerful, and so aided by the fleets of their own nations, as to be able to rule the city. On one occasion they enticed 200 Jews on board ships, and threw them into the sea. For this act of cruelty Judas Maccabæus took signal revenge. Attacking the town by night, he burned all the shipping with every human being on board (2 Maccab. xii. 3-7). The Maccabæan princes subsequently strengthened the fortifications, placed a garrison in the citadel, and retained Joppa in their hands as the chief port of their little kingdom (1 Maccab. xii. 34; xiii. 11; xiv. 5).

When Pompey invaded Palestine (B.C. 63), Joppa was among the first cities captured and annexed to the Roman province of Syria, doubtless because it was deemed wise to secure such an important sea-port (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 4. 4). After the fall of Antony and Cleopatra, Cæsar gave Joppa, with other cities, to Herod the Great (xv. 7. 3). Herod founded Cæsarea Palæstina on the coast a little south of Carmel, formed a harbour there at vast expense, and made it the capital of his kingdom. After Herod's death Joppa passed into the hands of Archelaus (xvii. 11. 4); but on his deposition

Joppa was virtually a Roman town in the time of the apostles. The population was mixed, as is the case in all sea-ports—Greeks, Syrians, Phœnicians, and Egyptians, with a few Roman officials, and a large Jewish community, chiefly engaged in trade (Strabo, xvi. 2. 34). When Peter visited Lydda, ten miles distant across the plain of Sharon, the Christians of Joppa sent for him, fondly hoping that he would be able to restore to them the dead Tabitha. He came and raised her; and while staying there with 'one Simon a tanner, whose house was by the sea-side,' and while praying on the house-top, he saw that remarkable vision which shewed him that the distinction between Jew and Gentile was for ever removed by the Gospel (Acts ix. 36-43; x. 9-18).

During the last Jewish war Joppa suffered severely. Cestius, marching from the north, suddenly captured the city, and massacred upwards of 8000 of its inhabitants (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 18. 10). A few years later bands of pirates, taking advantage of the disturbed state of the country, rebuilt Joppa, established themselves there, and extended their ravages over the whole sea from Cilicia to Egypt. The attention of Vespasian was at length drawn to them, and he took their stronghold, and when the people fled to their ships a storm rose, dashed them to pieces on the rocky shore, so that not a single man escaped. The houses and fortifications were then razed to the ground (Id. iii. 9. 2-4).

Joppa is mentioned by many of the classic authors; and some of them assign to it a wondrous antiquity, affirming that it existed before the flood (Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 14). It was mainly, however, in connection with the fable of Andromeda that Joppa was known to Greeks and Romans. Pliny tells us that 'in front of the city lies a rock upon which they point out the vestiges of the chains by which Andromeda was bound,' when she was rescued, and the sea-monster slain by Perseus (Hist. Nat. l.c.; Apollod. ii. 4. 3; Strabo, xvi. 2. 28; i. 2. 35; Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 9. 3; Jerome, in Jon. i.).

Joppa must have soon revived again. In the 4th century Eusebius calls it a city (Onomast. s. v.); and it was then made the seat of a bishopric, an honour which it retained till the conquest of the country by the Saracens (Reland, p. 868; S. Paul, Geogr. Sac. p. 305). Joppa has been the landing-place of pilgrims going to Jerusalem for more than a thousand years, from Arculf in the 7th century to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in the 19th; and it is mentioned in almost all the itineraries and books of travel in the Holy Land which have appeared in different languages (Early Travels in Pal., pp. 10, 34, 142, 286). During the Crusades Joppa was several times taken and retaken by Franks and Saracens. Saladin destroyed its fortifications, and Richard of England rebuilt them (Itinerary of Richard I., iv. 23 and 26; vi. 13 and 18). After the close of the Crusades Joppa fell to ruin. In the 13th century it did not contain a single habitable house. Bertrandon de la Broquiere says of it in that age—'It formerly belonged to the Christians, and was then strong; at present it is entirely destroyed, having only a few tents covered with reeds, whither pilgrims retire to shelter themselves from the heat of the sun' (Early Travels in Pal., Bohn, p. 286). It soon afterwards began to revive, and has since attained to something of its ancient importance. In the year 1797 it was taken by the French, and upon that occasion the conquerors were guilty of an act of cruelty fortunately rare in modern warfare. A body of 4000 Albanians, who held a strong position in the town, surrendered on promise of having their lives spared. The promise was given, and yet the whole 4000 were afterwards pinioned and shot on the strand! Another tragedy perpetrated at Joppa by Napoleon is not only an everlasting disgrace to the man, but it leaves a dark stain on the history of a civilized nation. When compelled to retreat to Egypt, between 400 and 500 French soldiers lay ill of the plague in the hospitals of Joppa. They could not be removed, and Napoleon ordered them to be poisoned! (Handbook for S. and P., p. 288).

Yifsa is the modern name of Joppa, and is identical with the old Hebrew Japho (יָפוֹ = יָפֹא). It contains about 5000 inhabitants, of whom 1000 are Christians, about 150 Jews, and the rest Muslims. It is beautifully situated on a little rounded hill, dipping on the west into the waves of the Mediterranean, and on the land side encompassed by orchards of orange, lemon, apricot, and other trees, which for luxuriance and beauty are not surpassed in the world. They extend for several miles across the great plain. Like most Oriental towns, however, it looks best in the distance. The houses are huddled together without order; the streets are narrow, crooked, and filthy; the town is so crowded along the steep sides of the hill that the rickety dwellings in the upper part seem to be toppling over on the flat roofs of those below. It has no port, and it is only under favourable circumstances of wind and weather, vessels can ride at anchor a mile or so from the shore. There is a place on the shore which is called 'the harbour.' It consists of a strip of water from fifteen to twenty yards wide and two to three deep, enclosed on the sea side by a ridge of low and partially sunken rocks. It may afford a little shelter to boats, but it is worse than useless so far as commerce is concerned. The town is defended by a wall, on which a few old guns are mounted. With the exception of a few broken columns scattered about the streets, and through the gardens on the southern slope of the hill, and the large stones in the foundations of the castle, Joppa has no remains of antiquity; and none of its modern buildings, not even the reputed 'house of Simon the tanner,' which the monks show, are worthy of note. The town has still a considerable trade as the port of Jerusalem, and its fruits are reckoned the best in Syria.—J. L. P.

JORAH (יֹרָה; Sept. Iwpa), the ancestor of the Benei Jorah, or, as they are elsewhere called, the Benei-Hariph, a company of 112 persons who came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 18; Neh. vii. 24). Whether Jorah or Hariph (חֲרִיף) is the correct form, or whether both are not errors for חֲרִים, Harim, is uncertain. In the Syr. for חֲרִי there is ܡܫܠܝܢ, Churum, in Neh. vii. 24; and the Cod. Alex. has here Ἀπελῶ, which, when compared with Ezra x. 31, favours the conclusion that the proper reading in all the passages is חֲרִים.—†.

JORAM (יֹרָם; Sept. Iwpa, a contraction of JEHORAM), ninth king of Israel, son of Ahab, and successor to his elder brother Ahaziah, who died childless. He began to reign B.C. 896, and reigned twelve years (2 Kings i. 17; iii. 1). Joram adhered to the sinful policy of Jeroboam in the matter of the golden calves; but, although his mother Jezebel was still alive, he discontinued the dark idolatries of Baal which she had introduced and maintained at such high cost of guilt and blood to the nation.

The Moabites had been tributary to the crown of Israel since the separation of the two kingdoms. But king Mesha deemed the defeat and death of Ahab so heavy a blow to the power of Israel that he might safely assert his independence. He accordingly did so, by withholding his tribute of '100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams with the wool.' The short reign of Ahaziah had afforded no opportunity for any operations against the revolvers; but the new king hastened to reduce them again under the yoke they had cast off. The good king of Judah, Jehoshaphat, was too easily induced to take a part in the war. He perhaps feared that the example of Moab, if allowed to be successful, might seduce into a similar course his own tributary, the king of Edom, whom he now summoned to join in this expedition. The deliverance of the allies from perishing from lack of water, and the signal overthrow of the Moabites at the word of Elisha, have been already described under ELISHA and JEHO-SHAPHAT.

After this a more redoubtable enemy, Benhadad, king of Syria, occupied for a long time the attention and strength of the king. In the sacred records the more striking events of this war seem to be recorded for the sake of shewing forth the great acts of ELISHA, and they have therefore been related under his name. It suffices here to indicate that they consisted in the Syrian king being constrained to terminate one campaign in consequence of all his plans being made known by the prophet to the king of Israel (2 Kings vi. 1-23); and in the deliverance of Samaria, according to the prediction of the prophet, from a horrible famine, caused by the city being besieged by the Syrians (2 Kings vi. 24-33; vii.) An interval of the war also afforded occasion for the remarkable cure of Naaman, the Syrian leper, by the same prophet (2 Kings v.) [NAAMAN]. These events serve to manifest the uncertain character of Joram, and the too strong influence of instant circumstances upon his faith and conduct. So in his conduct to Elisha, we find him at one time obedient to the prophet, and full of respectful admiration of his office and character; and at another time devoting his head to destruction, sending messengers to put him to death, and then starting himself after them—probably to prevent his own orders from being executed (2 Kings vi. 31-33).

After the death of Benhadad, Joram found a new and active enemy in his murderer and successor, Hazael. During the illness of Benhadad, the king of Israel seems to have employed himself in strengthening his eastern frontier against the Syrians, and in fortifying Ramoth-Gilead, which had fallen into his hands, and which his father had perished in the attempt to recover from the Syrians. This strong fortress henceforth became the head-quarters of the operations beyond the river. Hazael was scarcely settled on the throne before he took arms, and marched against Ramoth, in the environs of which the Israelites sustained a defeat, and the king was wounded. He returned to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds, leaving the army in the charge of Jehu, one of his ablest and most active generals. It was in this interval that Jehu was anointed king of Israel by the messenger of Elisha, and immediately proceeded to Jezreel to fulfil his commission to exterminate the house of Ahab. The king, who went forth from the city to meet him when the watchman on the tower of Jezreel announced his approach, was slain under the circumstances described in the article JEHU; and Ahaziah, the king of Judah, who was at Jezreel on a visit to his sick cousin, shared his fate (B.C. 884). With Joram ended the dynasty of Ahab, which reigned forty-four years in Israel (2 Kings viii. 25-29; ix. 1-20).—J. K.

JORDAN (יַרְדֵּן), always with the article in prose, יַרְדֵּן; ὁ Ἰορδάνης; Jordanis), the chief and most celebrated river of Palestine, flowing through a deep valley down the centre of the country from north to south.

The name.—Jordan may be rendered 'the descender,' from the root יָרַד, 'to descend'—a name most applicable to it, whether we consider the rapidity of its current, or the great depth of the valley through which it runs. From whatever part of the country its banks are approached, the 'descent' is long and steep. That this is the true etymology of the word seems evident from an incidental remark in Josh. iii. 16, where, in describing the effect of the opening of a passage for the Israelites, the word used for the 'coming down' of the waters (הַמַּיִם הַיֹּרְדִּים) is exactly the same as the name of the river (יַרְדֵּן; see Stanley, S. and P., 279, note). Other derivations have been given. Some say it is compounded of יָרַד, 'a river,' and יָרֵן, the name of the city where it rises, but this etymology is impossible, for the word יַרְדֵּן has no relation to the name of the city

יָרֵן (Reland, Pal., p. 271). Another view is, that the river having two sources, the name of the one was Jor, and of the other Dan; hence the united stream is called Jordan. So Jerome, 'Jordanes oritur ad radices Libani; et habet duos fontes, unum nomine Jor, et alterum Dan; qui simul mixti Jordanis nomen efficiunt' (Comm. in Matt. xvi. 13). This theory has been copied by Adamnanus (De Loc. Sanct. ii. 19), William of Tyre (xiii. 18), Brocardus (3), Adrichomius (p. 109), and others; and the etymology seems to have spread among the Christians in Palestine, from whom Burckhardt heard it (Travels in Syria, pp. 42, 43; see Robinson, B. R., iii. 412, note). The Greeks called the river Ἰορδάνης; but Pausanias has Ἰόρδανος. Arab geographers call it either

الأردن (El-Urdon), which is equivalent to the Hebrew יַרְדֵּן; or الشريعة (Esh-sheriah), which signifies 'the watering-place;' and this latter is the name almost universally given to it by the modern Syrians, who sometimes attach the appellative el-Kebtr, 'the great,' by way of distinction.

Sources.—The snows that deeply cover Hermon during the whole winter, and that still cap its glittering summit during the hottest days of summer, are the real sources of the Jordan. They feed its perennial fountains; and they supply from a thousand channels those superabundant waters which make the river 'overflow all its banks in harvest time' (Josh. iii. 15). The Jordan has two historical sources. In the midst of a rich but marshy plain, lying between the southern prolongation of Hermon and the mountains of Naphtali, is a low cup-shaped hill, thickly covered with shrubs. On it once stood Dan, the northern border-city of Palestine; and from its western base gushes forth the great fountain of the Jordan. The waters at once form a large pond encircled with rank grass and jungle—now the home of the wild boar—and then flow off southward. Within the rim of the cup, beneath the spreading branches of a gigantic oak, is a smaller spring. It is fed doubtless by the same source; and its stream, breaking through the rim, joins its sister, and forms a river some forty feet wide, deep and rapid. The modern name of the hill is Tell el-Kâdy, 'the hill of the judge;' and both fountain and river are called Laddan—evidently the name Dan corrupted by a double article, El-ed-Dan (Robinson, B. R., iii. 394; Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 214; and in Bibliotheca Sac. for 1846, p. 196). Josephus calls this stream 'Little Jordan' (τὸν μικρὸν Ἰορδάνην, Bell. Jud. iv. 1. 1); but it is the principal source of the river, and the largest fountain in Syria.

Four miles east of Tell el-Kâdy, on a lower terrace of Hermon, amid forests of oak, lie the ruins of Banias, the ancient Caesarea-Philippi, and more ancient Panium. Beside the ruins is a lofty cliff of red limestone, having a large fountain at its base. Beneath the cliff there was formerly, as Josephus tells us, a gloomy cave, and within it a yawning abyss of unfathomable depth, filled with water. This was the other source of the Jordan (Bell. Jud. i. 21. 3). A temple was erected over the cave by Herod, and its ruins now fill it and conceal the fountain. From it a foaming torrent still bursts, and dashes down to the plain through a narrow rocky ravine, and then glides swiftly on till it joins the other about four miles south of Tell el-Kâdy (Robinson, iii. 397; Handbook for S. and P., p. 446).

Such are the sources of the Jordan, of which Stanley well says—'It is not always that the sources of great rivers correspond to the future course of their progeny. But those of the Jordan meet every requirement. Geographically they might be perhaps sought elsewhere; but historically the sight of the springs which we have now reached at once vindicates and explains their claims' (S. and P., p. 386). They are in truth noble fountains; and their crystal waters burst forth in the very centre of the richest and grandest scenery in all Palestine. It seems fitting, too, that the river in which the SON OF MAN was baptised should spring from that mountain whose summit was the only spot on earth where his divine glory was manifested in the Transfiguration (Porter's Damascus, i. p. 306).

The Jordan has also a fabled fountain, thus described by Josephus:—'Apparently Panium is the source of the Jordan; but the water is, in reality, conveyed thither unseen by a subterranean channel from Phiala, as it is called, which lies not far from the high road, on the right as you ascend to Trachonitis, at the distance of 120 stadia from Cæsarea . . . That the Jordan hence derived its origin was formerly unknown, until it was ascertained by Philip, Tetrarch of Trachonitis; who, having thrown chaff into Phiala, found it cast out at Panium' (Bell. Jud. iii. 10. 7). The lake here referred to appears to be Burkat er-Ram, which Robinson visited and described (B. R., iii. 399). The legend has no foundation in reality.

Other fountains in this region, though unnamed in history, contribute much to the Jordan. The chief of these, and the highest perennial source of the Jordan, is in the bottom of a valley at the western base of Hermon, a short distance from the town of Hasbeiya and twelve miles north of Tell el-Kâdy. The fountain is in a pool, at the foot of a basalt cliff; the stream from it, called Hasbâny (from Hasbeiya), flows through a narrow glen into the plain, and falls into the main stream about a mile south of the junction of the Leddân and Baniâsy. The relative size of the three streams Robinson thus estimates—'That from Banias is twice as large as the Hasbâny; while the Leddân is twice, if not three times, the size of that from Banias' (B. R., iii. 395). The united river flows southward through the marshy plain for six miles, and then falls into lake Hûleh, called in Scripture 'The Waters of Merom' [MEROM].

Besides these a considerable stream comes down from the plain of Ijon, west of the Hasbâny; and two large fountains (called Balât, and Mellâhah), burst forth from the base of the mountain-chain of Naphtali. Such, then, are the sources, and such is the gradual formation of the Jordan (Handbook for S. and P., p. 436).

Physical features of the Jordan and its valley.—The most remarkable feature of the Jordan is, that throughout nearly its entire course it is below the level of the sea. Its valley is thus like a huge fissure in the earth's crust. The following measurements, taken from Van de Velde's Memoir of Map, will give the best idea of the depression of this singular valley:—

Fountain of Jordan at Hasbeiya,	1700 ft. elevation.
" " Banias,	1147 "
" " Dan,	647 "
The Lake Hûleh, . . . about	120 "
The Lake of Tiberias, . . .	650 ft. depression.
The Dead Sea,	1312 "

There must be some error in the elevations of the fountains as here given. Lake Hûleh is encompassed by a great plain, extending to Dan, and as it appears to the eye almost level, it is impossible there could be a difference of 500 feet in the elevations of the fountain and the lake. The writer estimated it on the spot at not above 100 feet; and it is worthy of note that von Wildenbruch makes it by measurement 537 feet, and De Bertou 344.

The general course of the Jordan is due south. From their fountains the three streams flow south to the points of junction, and continue in the same direction to the Hûleh; and from the southern extremity of this lake the Jordan again issues and resumes its old course. For some two miles its banks are flat, and its current not very rapid; but on passing through Jisr Benât Yakûb ('The bridge of Jacob's daughters'), the banks suddenly contract, and rise high on each side, and the river dashes in sheets of foam over a rocky bed, rebounding from cliff to cliff in its mad career. Here and there the retreating banks have a little green meadow, with its fringe of oleanders all wet and glistening with spray. Thus it rushes on, often winding, occasionally doubling back like the coils of a serpent, till, breaking from rocky barriers, it enters the rich plain of Bathlah, where on the left bank stand the ruins of Bethsaida [BETHSAIDA]. The stream now expands, and glides lazily along till it falls on the still bosom of the sea of Galilee. Between Bethsaida and the sea, the Jordan averages about twenty yards in width, and flows sluggishly between low alluvial banks. Bars of sand extend across its channel here and there, at which it is easily forded (Handbook for S. and P., p. 426; Robinson, ii. 414, seq.; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 315). From Jisr Benât Yakûb the distance is only seven miles; and yet in that distance the river falls 700 feet. The total length of the section between the two lakes is about eleven miles as the crow flies.

An old tradition tells us that the Jordan flows direct through the sea of Galilee without mingling with its waters. The origin of the story may be the fact that the river enters the lake at the northern extremity, and leaves it at a point exactly opposite at the southern, without apparent increase or diminution.

The third section of the river, lying between the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, is the Jordan of Scripture; the other two sections not being directly mentioned either in the O. T. or N. T. Until the last few years little was known of it. The notices of ancient geographers are not full. Travellers had crossed it at several points, but all the portions between these points were unknown. When the remarkable depression of the Dead Sea was ascertained by trigonometrical measurement, and when it was shown that the Jordan must have a fall of 1400 feet in its short course of about 100 miles, the measurements were called in question by that distinguished geographer Dr. Robinson, in a paper read before the Royal Geographical Society in 1847 (Journal, vol. xviii., part 2). In that same year Lieut. Molyneux, R.N., conveyed a boat from the sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, mostly in the river, but in places on the backs of camels, where rocks and rapids prevented navigation. Owing to the hostility of the Arabs the expedition was not successful; and the Jordan was not yet explored. Lieut. Lynch of the United States Navy headed a much more successful expedition in 1848, and was the first fully to describe the course, and fully to solve the mysteries of the Jordan. His Official Report is the standard work on the river. Molyneux's paper in the Journal of the R. Geog. Society also contains some useful matter (vol. xviii., part 2).

292. Jordan by Moonlight.

The valley through which this section of the Jordan flows is a long, low plain, running from north to south, and shut in by steep and rugged parallel ridges; the eastern ridge rising fully 5000 feet above the river's bed; and the western about 3000. This plain is the 'great plain' of the later Jews; the 'great desert' (πολλὴν ἐρημὴν) of Josephus; the 'Aulon' or 'channel of the Greek geographers; and the 'Ghar' or 'sunken plain' of the modern Arabs (Stanley, p. 277; Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 9. 7; iv. 8. 2; Reland, Pal., p. 305, 361, 377, seq.) It is about six miles wide at its northern end, but it gradually expands until it attains a width of upwards of twelve at Jericho. Its sides are not straight lines, nor is its surface perfectly level. The mountains on each side here and there send out rocky spurs, and long low roots far into it. Winter torrents, descending from wild ravines, cut deeply through its soft strata. As a whole it is now a desert. In its northern division, above the fords of Succoth, small portions are cultivated around fountains, and along the banks of streamlets, where irrigation is easy; but all the rest is a wilderness—in spring covered with rank grass and thistles, but in summer parched and bare. The southern section—known as the 'plain of Jericho'—is different in aspect. Its surface is covered with a white nitrous crust, like hoar frost, through which not a blade of grass or green herb springs. Nothing could be imagined more dreary or desolate than this part of the plain.

Down the midst of the plain winds a ravine, varying from 200 yards to half a mile in breadth, and from 40 to 150 feet in depth. Through this the Jordan flows in a tortuous course, now sweeping the western, and now the eastern bank; now making a wide, graceful curve, and now doubling back; but everywhere fringed by a narrow, dense border of trees and shrubs. The river has thus two distinct lines of banks. The first or lower banks confine the stream, and are from five to ten feet high, the height of course decreasing in spring when the river is high; the second or upper are at some distance from the channel, and in places rise to a height of 150 feet. The scenery of the river is peculiar and striking. Lynch thus describes the upper section: 'The high alluvial terraces on each side were everywhere shaped by the action of the winter rains into numbers of conical hills, some of them pyramidal and cuneiform, presenting the appearance of a giant encampment. This singular conformation extended southward as far as the eye could reach. At intervals I caught a glimpse of the river in its graceful meanderings, sometimes glittering like a spear-head through an opening in the foliage, and again clasping some little island in its shining arms, or, far away, snapping with the fierceness and white foam of a torrent by some projecting point. . . . The banks were fringed with the laurustinus, the oleander, the willow, and the tamarisk, and farther inland, on the slope of the second terrace, grew a small species of oak, and the cedar.'

The Jordan issues from the Sea of Galilee close to the hills on the western side of the plain, and sweeps round a little peninsula, on which lie the ruins of Tarichæa (Handbook, p. 321; Robinson, i. 538). The stream is about 100 feet wide, and the current strong (Lynch). A short distance down are the remains of a Roman bridge, whose fallen arches greatly obstruct the river, and make it dash through in sheets of foam. Below this are several weirs, constructed of rough stones, and intended to raise the water, and turn it into canals, so as to irrigate the neighbouring plain (Molyneux). Five miles from the lake the Jordan receives its largest tributary, the Sheriat el-Maudhâr (the Hiromax of the Greeks), which drains a large section of Bashan and Gilead. This stream is 130 feet wide at its mouth. Two miles farther is Jisr el-Mejâmia, the only bridge now standing on the lower Jordan. It is a quaint structure; one large pointed arch spanning the stream, and double tiers of smaller arches supporting the roadway on each side. The river is here deep and impetuous, breaking over high ledges of rocks.

Below this point the ravine inclines eastward to the centre of the plain, and its banks contract. Its sides are bare and white, and the chalky strata are deeply furrowed. The margin of the river has still its beautiful fringe of foliage; and the little islets which occur here and there are covered with shrubbery. Fifteen miles south of the bridge, Wady Yîbes (so called from Yabesh-Gilead), containing a winter torrent, falls in from the east. A short distance above it a barren sandy island divides the channel, and with its bars on each side forms a ford, probably the one by which Jacob crossed, as the site of Succoth has been identified on the western bank [SUCCOTH]. The plain round Succoth is extensively cultivated, and abundantly watered by fountains and streamlets from the adjoining mountains. The richness of the soil is wonderful. Dr. Robinson says, 'the grass intermingled with tall daisies, and wild oats, reached to our horses' backs; while the thistles sometimes overtopped the riders' heads. All was now dry, and in some places it was difficult to make our way through this exuberant growth' (iii. p. 313). Jacob exercised a wise choice when 'he made booths for his cattle' at this favoured spot (Gen. xxxiii. 17). No other place in the great plain equals it in richness. The ravine of the Jordan is here 150 feet below the plain, and shut in by steep bare banks of chalky strata (Robinson, l.c., p. 316).

About nine miles below Succoth, and about half-way between the lakes, the Jabbok, the only other considerable tributary, falls into the Jordan, coming down through a deep wild glen in the mountains of Gilead [JABBOK]. When Lynch passed (April 17), it was 'a small stream trickling down a deep and wide torrent bed. . . . There was another bed, quite dry, shewing that in times of fresher there were two outlets.' Lynch gives some good pictures of the scenery above the junction. 'The plain that sloped away from the bases of the hills was broken into ridges and multitudinous cone-like mounds. . . . A low, pale, yellow ridge of conical hills marked the termination of the higher terrace, beneath which swept gently this low plain, with a similar undulating surface, half redeemed from barrenness by sparse verdure and thistle-covered hillocks. Still lower was the valley of the Jordan—its banks fringed with perpetual verdure—winding a thousand graceful mazes. . . . its course a bright line in this cheerless waste.'

Below the Jabbok the fall of the river is still greater than above; but there is less obstruction from rocks and cliffs. The jungles along the banks become denser, the sides of the river-glen more regular, and the plain above more dreary and desolate.

On approaching the Dead Sea, the plain of the Jordan attains its greatest breadth—about 12 miles. The mountain ranges on each side are higher, more rugged, and more desolate. The plain is coated with a nitrous crust, like hoar-frost; and not a tree, shrub, or blade of grass is seen except by fountains or rivulets. The glen winds like a serpent through the centre, between two tiers of banks. The bottom is smooth, and sprinkled on the outside with stunted shrubs. The river winds in ceaseless coils along the bottom, now touching one side and now another, with its beautiful border of green foliage, looking all the greener for contrast with the desert above. The banks are of soft clay, in places ten feet high; the stream varies from 80 to 150 feet in breadth, and from 5 to 12 in depth. Near its mouth the current becomes more sluggish, and the stream expands. Where Wady Hesbân falls in, Lynch found the river 150 feet wide and 11 deep, 'the current four knots.' Farther down the banks are low and sedgy; the width gradually increases to 180 yards at its mouth; but the depth is only three feet (Lynch, Official Report, Handbook, pp. 195-197; Robinson, i. 538, seq.; Stanley, p. 290).

Lynch in a few words explains the secret of the great and almost incredible fall in the Jordan. 'The great secret is solved by the tortuous course of the Jordan. In a space of 60 miles of latitude, and four or five of longitude, the Jordan traverses at least 200 miles. . . . We have plunged down twenty-seven threatening rapids, besides a great many of lesser magnitude.'

(In addition to the works cited on the physical features of the Jordan, the following afford important information:—Journal of R. Geog. Society, xviii., part 2, articles by Robinson, Petermann, and Molyneux; Berton in Bulletin de la Soc. Geograph. de Paris, xii. 166, seq.; Wildenbruch, Monatsberichte der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin, 1845-46. A clear summary of all known about the Jordan up to 1850 is given by Ritter in Palästina und Syrien, vol. ii., pp. 152-556. Where facts are stated and scenery is described, without citing authorities, the writer is giving his own personal observations.)

The Fords of the Jordan have always been important in connection with the history of the country. The three streams which flow from the fountains are fordable at almost every point. It is south of lake Hületh that the river begins to form a serious barrier. The bridge called Jisr Benât Yakûb has for centuries been the leading pass from Western Palestine to Damascus. The first reference to it is in A.D. 1450 (Reisbuch des Heil. Landes, p. 451; Robinson, ii. 441); though, as early as the Crusades, a 'Ford of Jacob' (Vadium Jacob, Will. Tyr. Hist. xviii. 13) is mentioned, and was reckoned a most important pass. The bridge was probably built during the 15th century, when the caravan road was constructed from Damascus to Egypt (Handbook, ii. 466). The origin of the name, 'Bridge of Jacob's daughters,' is unknown. Perhaps this place may have been confounded with the ford of Succoth, where the patriarch crossed the Jordan, or perhaps the 'Jacob' referred to was some Muslim saint or Turkish pasha (Ritter, Pal. und Syr., 269, seq.)

Between Bethsaida-Julias and the Sea of Galilee there are several fords. The river is there shallow and the current sluggish. At this place the multitudes that followed our Lord from Capernaum and the neighbourhood were able to cross the river to where he fed the 5000 (Mark vi. 32, seq.; Robinson, ii. 414).

The first ford on the southern section of the Jordan is about half a mile from the lake, where the ruins of the Roman bridge now lie. It was the means of communication between Tiberias and Gadara; and it was doubtless at this point our Lord crossed when he went from Galilee to Judæa 'by the farther side of Jordan' (Mark x. 1; Matt. xix. 1, 2). Jisr el-Mejâmia is a Saracenic bridge on an old caravan route from Damascus to Egypt. Probably a Roman bridge may have stood at the same place, connecting Scythopolis with the other cities of Decapolis. There is no ford here. At a point east of the ruins of Scythopolis, ten miles below the bridge, the river is now fordable;

but the passage is deep and dangerous (Robinson, iii. 325; Van de Velde, Memoir, 137).

At Succoth is one of the best and most important fords over the Jordan. Here Jacob crossed with his cattle. This, too, is in all probability the Beth-barah, 'house, or ford of passage,' where the Israelites intercepted the routed Midianites (Judg. vii. 24). It is still the place at which the eastern Bedawîn cross in their periodical invasions of Esdraelon. From Succoth to the mouth of the Jabbok the river becomes very low during the summer, and is fordable at many points. At one spot are the remains of a Roman bridge (Molyneux, pp. 115, seq.; Lynch, April 16; Burckhardt, pp. 344, seq.) Ten miles south of the Jabbok there is a noted ford on the road from Nabulus to Es-Salt. Traces of a Roman road and bridge were here discovered by Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 124). The only other fords of note are those in the plain of Jericho, one above and one below the pilgrims' bathing-place. They are much deeper than those higher up, and when the river is swollen they become impassable.

Historical Notices.—The first notice of the Jordan is in the story of the separation of Abraham and Lot;—Lot 'beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah' (Gen. xiii. 10). The section of the valley visible from the heights of Bethel, where the patriarchs stood, was the plain of Jericho and southward over a part of the Dead Sea. The 'plain,' or 'circle' (עֵרְבָה), of the Jordan must have been different then from what it is now. It is now a parched desert—then it was well watered everywhere. The waters of numerous springs, mountain torrents, and probably of the Jordan, raised by weirs such as are seen at its northern end, were used by the old Phœnician inhabitants in the irrigation of the vast plain. The curse had not yet come upon it; the fire of heaven had not yet passed over it; the Lord had not yet destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah (Stanley, p. 215). It is manifest that some great physical change was produced in the valley by the convulsion at the destruction of the cities. The bed of the Dead Sea was probably lowered, and a greater fall thus given to the river; but this subject will be considered elsewhere [SEA].

Another wonderful epoch in the Jordan's history was the passage of the Israelites. They were encamped on the 'plains of Moab'—on the broad plain east of the river, extending along the northern shore of the sea to the foot of the mountains. It was harvest-time—the beginning of April—when the rains were still falling heavily in Hermon, and the winter snows were melting under the rays of the warm sun, and when a thousand mountain torrents, thus fed, swept into the Jordan, and made it 'overflow all its banks;' or, as the Hebrew literally signifies, made it 'full up to all its banks'

(מָלָא עַד-כָּל-נְדוּתָיו; see Robinson, B. R., i. 540); that is, perhaps, up not merely to the banks of the stream itself, but up to the banks of the glen; covering, as it still does in a few places (Molyneux, p. 116; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 125), the whole bottom of the glen, and thus rendering the fords impassable for such a host as the Israelites. There can be no doubt that in ancient times the Jordan rose higher than it does now. When the country was more thickly wooded, and more extensively cultivated, more rain and more snow must have fallen. There are wet seasons even yet, when the river rises several feet more than ordinarily (Reland, p. 273; Raumer, Pal., p. 61, 2d ed.) The opening of a passage through the river at such a season was the greater miracle. Had it been late in summer, it might have been thought that natural causes operated; but in harvest—the time of the overflow—the finger of God must have been manifest to all. It is a remarkable fact that at this same spot the Jordan was afterwards twice miraculously opened—by Elijah and Elisha (2 Kings ii. 8, 14).

At a later period it was considered a feat of high daring that a party of David's 'mighty men' crossed the Jordan 'in the first month (April), when it had overflowed all its banks,' and subdued their enemies on the east side (1 Chron. xii. 15). Jeremiah speaks of the lions 'coming up' from the 'swellings of the Jordan'; but the Hebrew word יִנְיָ, signifies 'beauty' or 'glory,' and refers to the dense jungles and verdant foliage of its banks; these jungles are impenetrable except to the wild beasts that dwell there. No allusion is made to the rise or overflow of the river (Gesenius, Thesaurus, s. v.; Robinson, i. 540). The writer has often seen wild swine, hyænas, and jackals, and also the tracks of panthers, on the banks of the Jordan (cf. Molyneux, p. 118).

The passage of the river by King David in his flight from Absalom has one peculiarity—a ferry-boat was used to convey his household over the channel (2 Sam. xix. 18). The passage was probably effected at one of the fords in the plain of Jericho. The word עֲבָרָה simply signifies a thing for crossing—it may have been a 'boat,' or a 'raft,' or a few inflated skins, such as are represented on the monuments of Nineveh, and are still used on the Euphrates and the Jordan.

Naaman's indignant depreciation of the Jordan, as compared with the 'rivers of Damascus,' is well known. The rivers of Damascus water its great plain, converting a desert into a paradise; the Jordan rolls on in its deep, deep bed, useless to the Sea of Death.

The great event of the N. T. history enacted at the Jordan, was the baptism of our Lord. This has made it the queen of rivers, and has given it the title 'sacred.' The exact spot is disputed. The topography and the incidents of the narrative, both before and after the baptism, unquestionably point to the same place, already famous as the scene of three miracles (Handbook, p. 198). In commemoration of the baptism, the Christian pilgrims who assemble at Jerusalem at Easter, visit the Jordan in a body and bathe at this spot (Stanley, p. 308).

The references to the Jordan in the writings of Josephus contain nothing of importance beyond what has been already mentioned in connection with the fountains and the physical features. Greek and Roman geographers seem to have known but little of the river. Pliny praises its beauty, and states that, with the greatest reluctance, as it were, it moves onward toward Asphalites, a lake of gloomy and unpropitious nature, by which it is at last swallowed up' (H. N., v. 15). Strabo makes the singular assertion that it is 'navigated upwards with vessels of burden!' Of course, he can only refer to the Sea of Galilee

(xvi. 2, 16). Pausanias tells how strangely the river disappears in the Dead Sea (book v. 7. 4).

Such, then, is the river Jordan, without any parallel, historical or physical, in the whole world. A complete river beneath the level of the sea! Disappearing in a lake which has no outlet, which could have none, and which originated in a miracle! Thrice were its waters divided by the direct agency of God, that his servants might pass in safety and comfort. In whatever light we regard it, the Jordan stands alone.—J. L. P.

JORKOAM (יִרְקֹאם; Sept. Ἰερκόαμ; Alex. Ἰερκάαμ), a place of which Rekem, a descendant of Caleb, was chief (1 Chron. ii. 44). From the form of the word in the LXX, Bertheau conjectures that יִרְקֹאם, Jorkoam, may be the proper reading. Neither name has been identified with any known locality. [JOKDEAM.]

JOSABAD. [JOZABAD.]

JOSEPH (יוֹסֵף; Sept. Ἰωσήφ), son of Jacob and Rachel, born under peculiar circumstances, as may be seen in Gen. xxx. 22; on which account, and because he was the son of his old age (xxxvii. 3), he was beloved by his father more than were the rest of his children, though Benjamin, as being also a son of Jacob's favourite wife, Rachel, was in a peculiar manner dear to the patriarch. The partiality evinced towards Joseph by his father excited jealousy on the part of his brethren, the rather that they were born of different mothers (xxxvii. 2). Joseph had reached his seventeenth year, having hitherto been engaged in boyish sports, or aiding in pastoral duties, when some conduct on the part of 'the sons of Bilhah and the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives,' seems to have been such as in the opinion of Joseph to require the special attention of Jacob, to whom, accordingly, he communicated the facts. This regard to virtue, and this manifestation of filial fidelity, greatly increased his brothers' dislike, who henceforth 'hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him' (xxxvii. 4). Their aversion, however, was carried to the highest pitch when Joseph acquainted them with two dreams that he had had, to the effect—the first, that while he and they were binding sheaves, his sheaf arose and stood erect, while theirs stood round and did obeisance to his; the second, that 'the sun and the moon and the eleven stars paid him homage.' These dreams appeared to indicate that Joseph would acquire pre-eminence in the family, if not sovereignty; and while even his father rebuked him, his brothers were filled with envy. Jacob, however, was not aware of the depth of their ill will; so that on one occasion, having a desire to hear intelligence of his sons, who were pasturing their flocks at a distance, he did not hesitate to make Joseph his messenger for that purpose. His appearing in view of his brothers was the signal for their malice to gain head. They began to devise means for his immediate destruction, which they would unhesitatingly have effected, but for his half-brother, Reuben, who, as the eldest son, might well be the party to interfere on behalf of Joseph. A compromise was entered into, in virtue of which the youth was stripped of the distinguishing vestments which he owed to his father's affection, and cast into a pit. Having performed this evil deed, and while they were taking refreshment, the brothers beheld a caravan of Arabian merchants, who were bearing the spices and aromatic gums of India down to the well-known and much-frequented mart, Egypt. Judah on this feels a bitter emotion arise in his mind, and proposes that, instead of allowing Joseph to perish, they should sell him to the merchants, whose trade obviously from this embraced human beings as well as spicery. Accordingly the unhappy young man was sold for a slave, to be conveyed by his masters into Egypt. While on his way thither, Reuben returned to the pit, intending to rescue his brother, and convey him safely back to their father. Joseph was gone. On which Reuben went to the wicked young men, who, not content with selling a brother into slavery, determined to punish their father for his partiality towards the unoffending sufferer. With this view they dipped Joseph's party-coloured garment in the blood of a kid and sent it to Jacob, in order to make him believe that his favourite child had been torn to pieces by some wild beast. The trick succeeded, and Jacob was grieved beyond measure.

Meanwhile the merchants sold Joseph to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh's, and captain of the royal guard, who was a native of the country. It is by no means easy to determine who at this time was the Pharaoh, or ruling monarch, though, what is far more important, the condition of the country, and therein the progress of civilization, are in certain general and important features made clear in the course of the narration. According to Syncellus, however, the general opinion in his day was that the sovereign's name who ruled Egypt at the time of the deportation of Joseph was Apophis.

In Potiphar's house Joseph enjoyed the highest confidence and the largest prosperity. A higher power watched over him; and whatever he undertook succeeded, till at length his master gave every thing into his hands. The Hebrew race have always been remarkable for personal beauty, of which Joseph seems to have had an unusual share. This fact explains, if it cannot palliate, the conduct of Potiphar's wife, who tried every means to bring the uncontaminated and pure-minded youth to fulfil her unchaste desires. Foiled in her evil wishes, she resolved to punish Joseph, who thus a second time innocently brings on himself the vengeance of the ill-disposed. Charged with the very crime to which he had in vain been tempted, he is, with a fickleness characteristic of Oriental lords, at once cast into the state prison.

The narrative, which is obviously constructed in order to shew the workings of divine Providence, and may not impossibly have received some shape or hue from the predominant idea, states, however, that Joseph was not left without special aid, in consequence of which he gained favour with the keeper of the prison to such an extent that every thing was put under his direction. If the suddenness and magnitude of this and other changes in the lot of Joseph should surprise any one, the feeling will be mainly owing to his want of acquaintance with the manners and customs of the East, where vicissitudes not less marked and sudden than are those presented in our present history are not uncommon; for those who come into the charmed circle of an Eastern court, especially if they are persons of great energy of character, are subject to the most wonderful alternations of fortune, the slave of to-day being the vizier of to-morrow.

Among the many advantages secured to posterity by this interesting and admirable narrative regarding the patriarch Joseph, is an intimate acquaintance (so far as it goes) with the state, at the time to which it refers, of civilization in Egypt. In the part at which we are now arrived, we read of 'the chief of the butlers' and 'the chief of the bakers'; officers who vouch, by the duties which they had to discharge, for the advanced and complex condition of society in which their services were required and supplied. How true and trustworthy, too, the Biblical narrative is, may be learned by an implication which is here offered. The head-butler had a dream in which he saw a vine. On the authority of Herodotus and others, it was long denied that the vine grew in Egypt; and if so, the imagery of the butler's dream would hardly have been appropriate. Wilkinson, however, has shewn beyond a question that vines did grow in Egypt, and thus not only removed a doubt, but given a positive confirmation of the sacred record (Manners of the Anc. Egypt. ii. 152).

The two regal officers just mentioned had, while in prison with Joseph, each one a dream, which Joseph interpreted correctly. The butler, whose fate was auspicious, promised the young Hebrew to employ his influence to procure his restoration to the free air of day; but when again in the enjoyment of his 'butlership,' 'he forgot' Joseph (xl.) Pharaoh himself, however, had two dreams, which found in Joseph a successful expounder; for the butler remembered the skill of his prison-companion, and advised his royal master to put it to the test in his own case. Pharaoh's dream, as interpreted by Joseph, foreboded the approach of a seven years' famine; to abate the evils of which Joseph recommended that some 'discreet and wise' man should be chosen and set in full power over the land of Egypt. The monarch was alarmed, and called a council of his advisers. The wisdom of Joseph was recognised as of divine origin and supereminent value; and the king and his ministers (whence it appears that the Egyptian monarchy—at Memphis—was not despotic, but constitutional) resolved that Joseph should be made (to borrow a term from Rome) Dictator in the approaching time of need. 'And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath shewed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art. Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou. See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh took off his ring and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck; and he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah ('saviour of the world'; comp. Jablonsky, Opusc. i. 207, sq.); and he gave him to wife Asenath, the daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On. And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt' (xli. 39, sq.). It has been supposed that Joseph was taken into the priestly order, and thus ennobled. The Biblical narrative does not support this opinion, though it leaves it without a doubt that in reality, if not in form as well, the highest trust and the proudest honours of the state were conferred on one so recently a Hebrew slave.

Seven years of abundance afforded Joseph opportunity to carry into effect such plans as secured an ample provision against the seven years of need. The famine came, but it found a prepared people. The visitation did not depend on any mere local causes, for 'the famine was over all the face of the earth;' 'and all countries came into Egypt to Joseph to buy corn' (ver. 56, 57). Among these customers appeared ten brethren, sons of the Hebrew Jacob. They had of necessity to appear before Joseph, whose licence for the purchase of corn was indispensable. Joseph had probably expected to see them, and he seems to have formed a deliberate plan of action. His conduct has brought on him the always ready charges of those who would rather impeach than study the Bible, and even friends of that sacred book have hardly in this case done Joseph full justice (Niemeyer, Charakt. ii. 366; Heuser, Diss. non inhumaniter sed prudentissime Josephum cum fratribus fecisse, Hal. 1773). Joseph's main object appears to have been to make his brothers feel and recognise their guilt in their conduct towards him. For this purpose suffering, then as well as now, was indispensable. Accordingly Joseph feigned not to know his brothers, charged them with being spies, threatened them with imprisonment, and allowed them to return home to fetch their younger brother, as a proof of their veracity, only on condition that one of them should remain behind in chains, with a prospect of death before him should not their words be verified. Then it was, and not before, that 'they said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul and would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us. And Reuben said, Spake I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child, and ye would not hear? therefore, behold also his blood is required' (xlii. 21). On which, after weeping bitterly, he by common agreement bound his brother Simeon, and left him in custody. How deeply concerned Joseph was for his family, how true and affectionate a heart he had, may be learned from the words which escape from the brothers in their entreaty that Jacob would allow Benjamin to go into Egypt, as required by Joseph: 'The man asked us straitly of our state and of our kindred, saying, Is your father yet alive? have ye another brother?' (xliii. 7). At length Jacob consents to Benjamin's going in company with his brothers: 'And God Almighty give you mercy before the man, that he may send away your other brother, and Benjamin. If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved' (ver. 14). Thus provided, with a present consisting of balm, honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds, and with double money in their hands (double, in order that they might repay the sum which Joseph had caused to be put into each man's sack at their departure, if, as Jacob supposed, 'it was an oversight'), they went again down to Egypt and stood before Joseph (xliii. 15); and there, too, stood Benjamin, Joseph's beloved brother. The required pledge of truthfulness was given. If it is asked why such a pledge was demanded, since the giving of it caused pain to Jacob, the answer may be thus: Joseph knew not how to demean himself towards his family until he ascertained its actual condition. That knowledge he could hardly be certain he had gained from the mere words of men who had spared his life only to sell himself into slavery. How had these wicked men behaved towards his venerable father? His beloved brother Benjamin, was he safe? or had he suffered from their jealousy and malice the worse fate with which he himself had been threatened? Nothing but the sight of Benjamin could answer these questions and resolve these doubts.

Benjamin had come, and immediately a natural change took place in Joseph's conduct: the brother began to claim his rights in Joseph's bosom. Jacob was safe, and Benjamin was safe. Joseph's heart melted at the sight of Benjamin: 'And he said to the ruler of his house, Bring these men home, and slay and make ready, for these men shall dine with me at noon' (xliii. 16). But guilt is always the ready parent of fear. Accordingly the brothers expected nothing but being reduced to slavery. When taken to their own brother's house they imagined they were being entrapped. A colloquy ensued between them and Joseph's steward, whence it appeared that the money put into their sacks, to which they now attributed their peril, was in truth a present from Joseph, designed, after his own brotherly manner, to aid his family in their actual necessities. The steward said, 'Peace be to you, fear not: your God and the God of your father hath given you the treasure in your sacks. I had your money' (ver. 23).

Noon came, and with it Joseph, whose first question regarded home: 'He asked them of their welfare, and said, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake? is he yet alive? And he lifted up his eyes and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son!' 'And Joseph made haste, for his bowels did yearn upon his brother, and he sought where to weep, and he entered into his chamber and wept there.' Does this look like harshness?

The connection brings into view an Egyptian custom, which is of more than ordinary importance, in consequence of its being adopted in the Jewish polity: 'And they set on (food) for him by himself (Joseph), and for them by themselves (the brethren), and for the Egyptians which did eat with them, by themselves: because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination with the Egyptians' (ver. 32). This passage is also interesting, as proving that Joseph had not, in his princely grandeur, become ashamed of his origin, nor consented to receive adoption into a strange nation: he was still a Hebrew, waiting, like Moses after him, for the proper season to use his power for the good of his own people.

Other customs appear in this interesting narrative: 'And they (the brothers) sat before him (Joseph), the first-born according to his birthright, and the youngest according to his youth.' 'And he sent messes (delicacies) unto them from before him; but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs' (ver. 32, 33). Fear had now given place to wonder, and wonder at length issued in joy and mirth (comp. ver. 18, 33, 34). Thus ended the second act in the drama. Another now opens.

far his brethren were faithful to their father, hit upon a plan which would in its issue serve to shew whether they would make any, and what, sacrifice, in order to fulfil their solemn promise of restoring Benjamin in safety to Jacob. Accordingly he orders not only that every man's money (as before) should be put in his sack's mouth, but also that his 'silver cup, in which my lord drinketh, and whereby he divineth, should be put in the sack's mouth of the youngest. The brethren leave, but are soon overtaken by Joseph's steward, who charges them with having surreptitiously carried off this costly and highly-valued vessel. They on their part vehemently repel the accusation, adding, 'With whomsoever of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord's bondmen.' A search is made, and the cup is found in Benjamin's sack. Accordingly they return to the city. And now comes the hour of trial: Would they purchase their own liberation by surrendering Benjamin? After a most touching interview, in which they prove themselves worthy and faithful, Joseph declares himself unable any longer to withstand the appeal of natural affection. On this occasion Judah, who is the spokesman, shews the deepest regard to his aged father's feelings, and entreats for the liberation of Benjamin even at the price of his own liberty. In the whole of literature we know of nothing more simple, natural, true, and impressive; nor, while passages of this kind stand in the Pentateuch, can we even understand what is meant by terming that collection of writings 'the Hebrew national epic,' or regarding it as an aggregation of historical legends. If here we have not history, we can in no case be sure that history is before us (xliv.)

Most natural and impressive is the scene also which ensues, in which Joseph, after informing his brethren who he was, and inquiring, first of all, 'Is my father alive?' expresses feelings free from the slightest taint of revenge, and even shews how, under Divine Providence, the conduct of his brothers had issued in good—'God sent me before you to preserve a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance.' Five years had yet to ensue in which 'there would be neither earring nor harvest;' and therefore the brethren were directed to return home and bring Jacob down to Egypt with all speed. 'And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck. Moreover, he kissed all his brethren and wept upon them; and after that his brethren talked with him' (xlv. 14, 15).

The news of these striking events was carried to Pharaoh, who being pleased at Joseph's conduct, gave directions that Jacob and his family should come forthwith into Egypt—'I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land; regard not your stuff, for the good of all the land is yours.' The brethren departed, being well provided for—'And to his father Joseph sent ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she asses laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way.'

The intelligence which they bore to their father was of such a nature that 'Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not.' When, however, he had recovered from the thus naturally told effects of his surprise, the venerable patriarch said, 'Enough; Joseph my son is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die' (xlv. 26, 28).

Accordingly Jacob and his family, to the number of threescore and ten souls, go down to Egypt, and by the express efforts of Joseph, are allowed to settle in the district of Goshen, where Joseph met his father: 'And he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while.' There Joseph 'nourished his father and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families' (xlvii. 12).

Meanwhile the predicted famine was pauperising Egypt. The inhabitants found their money exhausted, and their cattle and substance all gone, being parted with in order to purchase food from the public granaries, until at length they had nothing to give in return for sustenance but themselves. 'Buy us'—they then imploringly said to Joseph—'and our land for bread, and we and our land will be slaves unto Pharaoh.' 'And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, so the land became Pharaoh's. The people, too, 'Joseph removed to cities from one end of the borders of the land to the other end.' Religion, however, was too strong to submit to these political and social changes, and so the priests still retained their land, being supplied with provisions out of the common store gratuitously. The land, which was previously the people's own, was now let to them on a tenancy, at the rent of one-fifth of the produce: the land of the priests being exempted.

This is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, social revolution recorded in history. 'Under the pressure of famine an entire nation is reduced from freedom to dependence; while the population, which had been apparently limited to certain districts, was distributed all over the land on different spots.

At this distant period it may not be easy to understand and explain the entire conduct observed by Joseph in this crisis of the nation's fate; but we must protest against the application to it of measures of judgment which are derived from modern notions, and the pure and lofty morality of the Gospel. If a great change was suddenly effected in the social condition of the people, we are not hastily to conclude that the change was for the worse, especially considering that a very long and grievous famine had afflicted so fertile a land as Egypt under the previously existing social condition. And if an opportunity was taken to increase the royal power over the nation, it cannot be denied that the nation was saved from impending destruction by the foresight, wisdom, and benevolence of the Hebrew vizier.

Joseph had now to pass through the mournful scenes which attend on the death and burial of a father. Having had Jacob embalmed, and seen the rites of mourning fully observed, the faithful and affectionate son—leave being obtained of the monarch—proceeded into the land of Canaan, in order, agreeably to a promise which the patriarch had exacted, to lay the old man's bones with those of his fathers, in the 'field of Ephron the Hittite.' Having performed with long and bitter mourning Jacob's funeral rites, Joseph returned into Egypt. The last recorded act of his life forms a most becoming close. After the death of their father, his brethren, unable, like all guilty people, to forget their criminality, and characteristically finding it difficult to think that Joseph had really forgiven them, grew afraid now they were in his power, that he would take an opportunity of inflicting some punishment on them. They accordingly go into his presence, and in imploring terms and an abject manner, entreat his forgiveness. 'Fear not'—this is his noble reply—'I will nourish you and your little ones.'

Joseph lived an hundred and ten years, kind and gentle in his affections to the last; for we are told, 'The children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were brought up upon Joseph's knees' (l. 23). And so having obtained a promise from his brethren, that when the time came, as he assured them it would come, that God should visit them, and 'bring them unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob,' they would carry up his bones out of Egypt, Joseph at length 'died, and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin' (l. 26). This promise was religiously fulfilled. His descendants, after carrying the corpse about with them in their wanderings, at length put it in its final resting-place in Shechem, in a parcel of ground that Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor, which became the inheritance of the children of Joseph (Josh. xxiv. 32).

By his Egyptian wife Asenath, daughter of the high-priest of Heliopolis, Joseph had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. xli. 50, seq.), whom Jacob adopted (Gen. xlviii. 5), and who accordingly took their place among the heads of the twelve tribes of Israel. Among other authorities the following may be consulted.—Wolfenb. Fragment; Less, Geschichte der Rel. i. 267; J. T. Jacobi, Sämmtl. Schrift. 3 thl.; Hess, Gesch. der Patriarch. ii. 324; Niemeyer, Charakt. ii. 340; Allg. Welthist. ii. 322; Heeren, Idem. ii. 551.—J. R. B.

JOSEPH, 'the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ' (Matt. i. 16). By Matthew he is said to have been the son of Jacob, whose lineage is traced by the same writer through David up to Abraham. Luke represents him as being the son of Heli, and traces his origin up to Adam. This is not the place to attempt to reconcile these two accounts, as it would lead to discussion and detail, for which we have not space: but it may be mentioned that Luke appears to have had some specific object in view, since he introduces his genealogical line with words of peculiar import:—'Jesus being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli' (Luke iii. 23)—ὡς ἐνομίσθητο, 'as was supposed,' in other terms, as accounted by law, as enrolled in the family registers; for Joseph, being the husband of Mary, became thereby, in law (νόμος), the father of Jesus. And as being the legal father of Jesus, he might have his origin traced in the line of Mary's family, as well as in that of his own.

The statements of Holy Writ in regard to Joseph are few and simple. According to a custom among the Jews, traces of which are still found, such as hand-fasting among the Scotch, and betrothing among the Germans, Joseph had pledged his faith to Mary; but before the marriage was consummated she proved to be with child. Grieved at this, Joseph was disposed to break off the connection; but, not wishing to make a public example of one whom he loved, he contemplated a private disruption of their bond. From this step, however, he is deterred by a heavenly messenger, who assures him that Mary has conceived under a divine influence. 'And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins' (Matt. i. 18, 19; Luke i. 27). To this account various objections have been taken; but most of them are drawn from the ground of a narrow, short-sighted, and half-informed rationalism, which judges everything by its own small standard, and either denies miracles altogether, or admits only such miracles as find favour in its sight; attempting not to learn what Christianity is, nor what was suitable and proper in the days of Christ, but to construct a Christianity of its own, and then to impose the new creation on the writers of the Gospel, and the primitive church.

Joseph was by trade a carpenter, in which business he probably educated Jesus. In Matt. xiii. 55, we read, 'Is not this the son of the carpenter?' and in Mark vi. 3, 'Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary?' The term employed, τέκτων, is of a general character (from τεύχω, 'I form'), and may be fitly rendered by the English word 'artificer' or 'artizan,' signifying any one that labours in the fabrication (faber in Latin) of articles of ordinary use, whatever the material may be out of which they are made. Accordingly, sometimes it denotes a smith as well as a carpenter or joiner, and in the Septuagint the additional term 'iron' (σίδηρου) or 'wood' (ξύλων) is employed, in order to denote its specific application. If some doubt may exist whether 'carpenter' is the necessary rendering of the word when applied to Joseph, yet there is no impropriety in that rendering, for not seldom the word, when used without any explanatory addition, has that signification. Schleusner (in voc.) asserts that the universal testimony of the ancient church represents our Lord as being a carpenter's son. This is, indeed, the statement of Justin Martyr (Dial. cum Tryphone, sec. 88), for he explains the term τέκτων, which he applies to Jesus, by saying that he made ἀροτρα καὶ ζυγά, ploughs and yokes; but Origen in replying to Celsus, who indulged in jokes against the humble employment of our Lord, expressly denied that Jesus was so termed in the Gospels (see the passage cited in Otho's Justin Martyr, tom. ii. p. 306, Jené 1843)—a declaration which suggests the idea that the copies which Origen read differed from our own; while Hilarius, on Matthew (quoted in Simon's Dictionnaire de la Bible, i. 691), asserts, in terms which cannot be mistaken, that Jesus was a smith (ferrum igne vincentis, massamque formantis, etc.) Of the same opinion was the venerable Bede; while others have held that our Lord was a mason, and Cardinal Cajetan that he was a goldsmith.

The last notion probably had its origin in those false associations of more modern times which disparage hand-labour. Among the ancient Jews all handicrafts were held in so much honour, that they were learned and pursued by the first men of the nation.

Jewish tradition (Hieros. Schaph. c. 14) names the father of Jesus מנדיה, Phenedia, and represents him (Orig. c. Cels. i. 31) as a rough soldier, who became the father of Jesus, after Mary was betrothed to Joseph. Another form of the legend sets him forth (Toled. Jeschu, p. 3, ed. Wagenseil; Epiphani. Hier. 78. 7) under the name of Pandira. Christian tradition makes Joseph an old man when first espoused to Mary (Epiphani. Hier. 78. 7), being no less than eighty years of age, and father of four sons and two daughters. [Comp. the Apocryphal Gospels, especially the Protevangelium Jacobi, whence all the traditionary stories concerning Christ are derived.] Theophylact, on Matt. xiii. 55, says that Jesus Christ had brothers and sisters, all children of Joseph, whom he had by his sister-in-law, wife of his brother Cleophas, who having died without issue, Joseph was obliged by law to marry his widow. Of the sons, James, the brother of the Lord, was, he states, the first bishop of Jerusalem. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 1) agrees in substance with Theophylact; so also does Epiphanius, adding that Joseph was fourscore years old when he married Mary. Jerome, from whom it appears that the alleged mother's name was Escha, opposes this tradition, and is of opinion that what are termed the brothers of Jesus were really his cousins. The painters of Christian antiquity conspire with the writers in representing Joseph as an old man at the period of the birth of our Lord—an evidence which is not to be lightly rejected, though the precise age mentioned may be but an approximation to fact.

Another account (Niceph. ii. 3) gives the name of Salome as that of Joseph's first wife, who was related to the family of John the Baptist.

It is not easy to determine when Joseph died. That event may have taken place before Jesus entered on his public ministry. This has been argued from the fact, that his mother only appeared at the feast at Cana in Galilee. The premises, however, hardly bear out the inference. With more force of argument, it has been alleged (Simon, Dict. de la Bible) that Joseph must have been dead before the crucifixion of Jesus, else he would in all probability have appeared with Mary at the cross. Certainly the absence of Joseph from the public life of Christ, and the absence of reference to him in the discourses and history, while 'Mary' and 'his brethren' not unfrequently appear, afford evidence not only of Joseph's death, but of the inferior part which, as the legal father only of our Lord, Joseph might have been expected to sustain. So far as our scanty materials enable us to form an opinion, Joseph appears to have been a good, kind, simple-minded man, who, while he afforded aid in protecting and sustaining the family, would leave Mary unrestrained to use all the impressive and formative influence of her gentle, affectionate, pious, and thoughtful soul. Those who may wish to pursue this subject in its details, we refer to the following works:—J. T. Meyer, Num Jos. tempore Natu. C. fuerit senex decrepitus; Hist. Joseph. fabri lignar., Arab. ed. G. Wallin, a Latin translation of which may be found in Fabricii Pseudepigr. i. 309. [The original, with a translation and notes, is given in Hirtii Antholog. Arab. Jen. 1774, p. 41.] The traditions respecting Joseph are collected in Act. Sanct. iii. p. 4, sq.; there is a Life of Joseph written in Italian by Affaitati.—J. R. B.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA. The name Arimathea denotes probably the place where Joseph was born, not that where he resided. We make this remark because Michaelis (Begräbniss- und auferstehungs-gesch. Christi, p. 44, translated into English) states it as his opinion that it was unlikely that Joseph possessed a burial-place in or near Jerusalem, since that city was not his ordinary abode. So easy is it to be led away by modern associations in interpreting the Scripture that even a man of Michaelis' learning could allow Germany to overpower Palestine, and modern days to give their colouring to ancient ones, and thus hold that 'of Arimathea' must of necessity denote the residence and not the birth-place of Joseph; whereas a little reflection might have taught him that in a measure in his own times, and fully so in the days of our Lord, such a form of speech indicated rather a man's birth-place than his customary abode.

Arimathea lay in the territory of Benjamin, on the mountain range of Ephraim, at no great distance south of Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 25; Judg. iv. 5), not far from Gibeah (Judg. xix. 13; Is. x. 29; Hos. v. 8).

Joseph was a secret disciple of Jesus—'an honourable counsellor (βουλευτής), who waited for the kingdom of God' (Mark xv. 43), and who, on learning the death of our Lord, 'came and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus.' Pilate having learned from the centurion, who commanded at the execution, that 'Jesus was actually dead,' gave the body to Joseph, who took it down and wrapped his deceased Lord in fine linen which he had purchased for the purpose; after which he laid the corpse in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a stone unto the door of the sepulchre (Mark xv. 43; seq.) From the parallel passages in Matthew (xxvii. 57, seq.), Luke (xxiii. 50, seq.), and John (xix. 38, seq.), it appears that the body was previously embalmed at the cost of another secret disciple, Nicodemus, and that the sepulchre was new, 'wherein never man before was laid;' also that it lay in a garden, and was the property of Joseph himself. This garden was 'in the place where Jesus was crucified.' Luke describes the character of Joseph as 'a good man and a just,' adding that 'he had not consented to the counsel and deed of them,' i.e., of the Jewish authorities. From this remark it is clear that Joseph was a member of the Sanhedrim: a conclusion which is corroborated by the epithet 'counsellor,' applied to him by both Luke and Mark. Whether or not Joseph was a priest, as Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. p. 669) thought, there is not evidence to determine. Various opinions as to his social condition may be found in Thiess (Krit. Comment. ii. 149). Tradition represents Joseph as having been one of the Seventy, and as having first preached the Gospel in our own country (Ittig, Diss. de Pat. Apostol., sec. 13; Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. iii. i. 319, seq.) [GOLGOTHA.]—J. R. B.

JOSEPH CALLED BARSABAS was one of the two persons whom the primitive church, immediately after the resurrection of Christ, nominated, praying that the Holy Spirit would show which of them should enter the apostolic band in place of the wretched Judas. On the lots being cast, it proved that not Joseph, but Matthias, was chosen.

Joseph bore the honourable surname of Justus, which was not improbably given him on account of his well-known probity. He was one of those who had 'complicated with the Apostles all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out amongst them, beginning from the baptism of John,' until the ascension (Acts i. 15, seq.) Tradition also accounted him one of the Seventy (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. i. 12). The same historian relates (iii. 39), on the authority of Papias, that Joseph the Just 'drank deadly poison, and by the grace of God sustained no harm.' It has been maintained that he is the same as Joscs surnamed Barnabas, mentioned in Acts iv. 36 (Heinrichs, On Acts i. 23; Ullmann, in the Theolog. Stud. und Kritik, i. 377); but the manner in which the latter is characterized seems to point to a different person.—J. R. B.

JOSEPH B. CHIJA (ר'יוסף בר חייא), also called Joseph Coccus = סני נהור, great in light, a euphemic antiphrasis for a pious blind man, in the Talmud is simply styled R. Joseph. This distinguished president of the College at Pumbedita, and reputed translator of the Hagiographa into Chaldee, was born in Babylon about A.D. 270. He was a disciple of Jehudah b. Jechekel, founder and president of the College at Pumbedita, and fellow-student of the celebrated Rabba b. Nachmani, commonly called Rabba, the reputed author of the Midrash Rabba, or the traditional commentary on Genesis, with whom he formed an intimate friendship which lasted all their lifetime. At the death of their teacher (A.D. 299) both disciples were named by the students as successors to the presidency of the college, but both of them declined the honour, whereupon Chasda was elected, and when, after occupying this high position for two years, Chasda died, Rabba and Joseph were again respectively urged to take this office. Joseph again refused the office, but his friend Rabba accepted it (A.D. 309), and when, after holding it for about twenty-two years, he died, Joseph at last yielded and was installed as president of the College at Pumbedita about 330; but he was not permitted to occupy long this distinguished position, for he died in the third year of his Rectorate, about A.D. 333 [EDUCATION]. His learning was so extensive, and his knowledge of the traditional lore was so profound, that he obtained the appellation of Sinai (סיני), that is, one who is acquainted with all the traditions in succession since the giving of the Law on Sinai (Horajoth 14, a; Sanhedrim 42, a). One of his favourite studies was the Jewish Theosophy, the mysteries of which, being contained in the vision of Ezekiel respecting the throne of God (מעשיה מרכבה), he endeavoured to propound (Chagiga 18, a). Another department of his studies, which is of great interest to the Biblical student, was the rendering of the Hebrew Scriptures in Chaldee. From the twelve passages of his version which are quoted in the Talmud (comp. Moed Katon 26, a; Pesachim 68, a; Menachoth 110, a; Joma 32, b; 77, b; Aboda Sara 44, a; Kiddushin 13, a; 72, b; Nedarim 38, a; Baba Kama 3, b; Berachoth 28, a) it is evident that he translated Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea, Amos, Obadiah, Zephaniah, and Zechariah, since these passages are from these books, and are distinctly cited with the declaration כדמתרגם רב יוסף, as R. Joseph has rendered it into Chaldee. These renderings are almost exactly the same that are given in the Targum of Jonathan b. Uzziel, a fact which has led some to suppose that this Targum ascribed to Jonathan is in reality Joseph's. But there is no necessity for such a conclusion, since we are expressly told that Jonathan's Targum embodied the traditional renderings of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi [JONATHAN B. UZZIEL], and that Joseph also was the depository of the ancient traditions. The identity of the renderings is therefore to be ascribed to the identity of the ancient source from which both paraphrasts drew their information. That a Chaldee paraphrase of the Prophets existed before Joseph made his, is moreover evident from the fact that he himself declares on several occasions, when discussing the meaning of a difficult passage in the Scriptures, אלמלא תרגומא דהאי קרא לא היה ידענא, 'if we had not the Targum on this passage we should not know what it means' (Sanhedrin 94, a; Moed Katon 28, b; Megilla 3, a). But though the quotations in the Talmud from Joseph's Chaldee paraphrase are restricted to the Prophets, yet the version in our Rabbinic and Polyglott Bibles, which is now ascribed to him, is that of the Hagiographa, i. e., Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. Rashi on Kiddushin 13 a, and Tossafoth on Baba Kama, indeed deny that he made any Chaldee paraphrase at all, and say that he was simply conversant with the Targum of Jonathan b. Uzziel on the prophets דהיה בקי בתרגם נביאים שתרגם יונתן (כן עזיאל), but this is contrary to the meaning of the phrase כדמתרגם רב יוסף, as Joseph translates, with which the quotations from his Targum are always introduced. In his advanced life Joseph became totally blind and also lost his memory, which greatly afflicted him and ruffled his temper, as he could not remember his own sayings about the traditions of the fathers (Erub. 10, a; Nedarim 41, a; Baba Bathra 134, b; Pesachim 113, b; Succa 29, a).

His paraphrase on the Hagiographa is contained in all the Rabbinic Bibles, and is given with a Latin translation in the Polyglotts of Antwerp (1572), Paris (1645), London (1657), etc. Comp. JOSEPH B. GORION. [JOSIPPON.]

JOSEPH B. SHEMTOV, a distinguished philosopher, polemic, and commentator, flourished in the middle of the 15th century in Spain. Besides his numerous philosophical works, which form important contributions to the history of Jewish philosophy, Joseph b. Shemtov wrote—(1) A commentary on the celebrated Epistle of Prophant Duran against Christianity [PROPHIAT DURAN], published in Constantinople 1577, and in Geiger's יונתן וכתובים, Breslau 1844; (2) A course of homilies delivered in the Synagogue on different Sabbaths on various portions of the Bible, entitled עין הקורא, the eye of the reader, still in MS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, Cod. Michael 581; (3) A commentary on Lamentations, composed at Medina del Campo in the year 1441, MS. by De Rossi, No. 177; (4) A commentary on Genesis i. 1-vi. 8, being the Sabbath lesson which commences the Jewish year [HAPHTARA]; and (5) An exposition of Deut. xv. 11. Comp. Steinschneider, in Ersch und Gruber's Allgemeine Encyclopädie, sec. ii., vol. xxxi., p. 87-93; Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, col. 1529.—C. D. G.

JOSEPH JOEL. [WITZENHAUSEN.]

JOSEPH TAITATZAK. [TAITATZAK.]

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS, the celebrated Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem, A.D. 37, in the first year of Caius (Caligula). His father was a priest of the first course, and his mother belonged to the royal Asmonean family; he appeals to public documents in proof of his genealogy, at which some of his cotemporaries seem to have sneered (Bios, ed. Havercamp, ii. 1, sec. 1). The only authority for the outline of his life is his own self-laudatory autobiography; but in spite of the egregious vanity which marks every page of that performance, he does not seem to have wilfully perverted any facts. He tells us that even at the age of fourteen he was so remarkable for learning that even the high-priests and chief men of the city came to inquire * of him about minute questions of the law. After a careful examination of the tenets held by the three chief sects of Jews—Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes—and after residing three years in the desert with the ascetic eremite Banus, he embraced Pharisaism, which, he says, resembled the Stoic philosophy (Vit. 2). At the age of twenty-six (A.D. 63) he sailed to Rome to plead the cause of some imprisoned Jewish priests. Like St. Paul he was shipwrecked, but after a night's swimming (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 25) † was picked up by a Cyrenian vessel, and through the friendship of the actor Aliturus obtained the patronage of Poppea, who gained his cause for him, and dismissed him with great gifts (Vit. 3; cf. Antiq. xx. 8. 11). About the time of his return (A.D. 66) the Jewish insurrection broke out, the causes of which he very obscurely describes, although the greater part of his autobiography, as well as much of the book on the Jewish war, is occupied with this portion of his history. Although he despaired from the first, and advised his countrymen to submission, he accepted the command in Galilee, and has given us a most graphic account of the numerous plots and perils in which he was entangled during the brilliant and stormy period of his life as a general (Vit. 4-74). After displaying consummate courage and ability in putting Galilee in a state of defence, and in resisting the Romans, he finally threw himself into Jotapata, which was taken after a splendid defence of forty-seven days. He hid himself with forty others in a cave, and, being betrayed, refused to surrender on a promise of safety. Against his wishes they all determined to commit suicide, but at his proposal finally agreed to kill each other by lot, when (by whatever means) he and another alone survived. (They surrendered to the Romans, and Vespasian put him in chains, intending to send him to Nero, a fate which he avoided by prophesying (for he distinctly claims a prophetic gift, Bell. Jud. iii. 8. 9) Vespasian's future elevation to the purple. After three years of lenient imprisonment (A.D. 70) his prophecy came true, and his chains were cut off by order of Titus (Bell. Jud. iv. 10. 7).

* The suggestion of Paret (Herzog, Encykl. s.v.), that in this narrative Josephus had an eye to Luke ii. 46, 47, is extremely probable, and if so, it throws light on the character of the man.

† There is, however, no ground for identifying the voyage of Josephus with that of St. Paul, as is done by Ottius, Spicileg. ex Josepho.

He took part in the siege of Jerusalem, and was once struck senseless by a stone while urging the Jews to surrender. He was enabled by the patronage of Titus to save the lives of his brother and fifty other Jews, and to rescue from destruction a valuable copy of the Scriptures. Detested as he was, and suspected of double treachery both by Jews and Romans, subjected to endless accusations and attacks, his life must have been sufficiently burdensome, but the position of a renegade was rendered supportable by imperial favour, and probably by unlimited self-approbation. After the fall of Jerusalem he lived as a court-pensioner, comfortably following his literary pursuits, and surviving till the early years of Trajan's reign (about A.D. 103) in contented and wealthy infamy. For all these facts, and many others of a more directly personal character, such as his three marriages, the names of his sons, etc., see the seventy-six chapters of his life, and the following passages of his other works, C. Apion. i. 9. 10; Bell. Jud. i.; Proem ii. 20. 3, sqq., 21. 2, sqq.; iii. 7. 13, sqq., 8. 1, sqq., 9; vi. 5; Antiq. ed. Havercamp, vol. 1, pp. 5, 228, 536, 545, 682, 982; Suid., s.v. 'Ιωσήφος.

Josephus is one of those men for whose characters, in spite of their learning, their ability, and even their good qualities, it is impossible to feel any respect. An almost girlish conceit is everywhere visible in his narrative of his own proceedings; and a consciousness of his own importance often betrays him into a superstition quite alien to the natural tone of his mind (Bell. Jud. iii. 8. 9; Vit. 15, 42, 75, etc.). Cunning, worldliness, and a vulgar desire for external prosperity, appear in him throughout his life. (He was a fulsome flatterer of the great, and was not even ashamed to assume the name of Flavius, as though he had been a freedman of Titus.) He was a strange mixture of the bigoted Pharisee and the time-serving Herodian, and he mingles the national pride of the patriot with the apostasy of a traitor. The worst stain on his character is his desertion of his country in the hour of her sorest need; and the fact that he was eager to kiss the hands that were reeking with her blood, and to sing the praises of the men for whom his countrymen could find no curse too deep or loud. While Judea Captiva wept under her desolate palm-tree, he could live in splendour in the house assigned to him by her conquerors, enjoy a share of their booty, and boast of their patronage (Vit. 76); while his countrymen were dead, degraded, or enslaved, this 'nescio quis Arabarches' (Juv. i. 130) could bear to see his own triumphal statue set up among their oppressors, and could 'sit as a congratulating guest, offering homage and adoring cringes, whilst the triumphal pageant for Judea ravaged, and Jerusalem burned, filled the hours of a long summer's day ere it unfolded its pomps before him' (Bell. Jud., vii. 5. 5-7).

Josephus was an admirable writer. Although he could not pronounce Greek well, he writes it with singular purity (Niebuhr, Lectures on Rom. Hist., iii. 205), with the exception of a few constant errors; and he is fairly entitled to his own claim of possessing the highest qualifications for a Greek writer of Jewish history (Antiq. xx. 12. 1), as well as to St. Jerome's complimentary designation of him as 'Græcus Livius' (Epist. ad Eustoch.) 'His work,' says Niebuhr (Ancient Hist. iii. 455), 'is one of the most charming and interesting books, and is read a great deal too little.' Nevertheless, he is hardly deserving of the epithet φιλαλήτης, so often bestowed on him (Suid. s. v. Ἰώσηπος; Isidor Pelusiot. iv., Ep. 75; 'diligentissimus et φιλαληθέτατος', Jos. Scaliger, De Emend. Temp. Prof., etc.); for though he understood the duty and importance of veracity to the historian (Antiq. xiv. i. 1; Rel. Jud. i. 1; c. Ap. i. 19), yet 'he is often untrue, and his archaeology abounds in distortions of historical facts, and in falsifications which arise from his inordinate national pride; and wherever he deals in numbers, he shews his Oriental love of exaggeration' (Niebuhr, Lect. Rom. Hist., l. c.). Hence his narrative, even of events sufficiently near his own times, requires constant correction (Prideaux, Connect., i. 44, 341, 542, ii. passim). Yet he has received very hard measure at the hands of Baronius and other writers, and we must agree with Casaubon (Exerc. xx. 2), that his works have been preserved to us by a singular providence, and throw a flood of light on Jewish affairs.

It is hardly possible to overrate the importance of Josephus to the theologian. The numberless references to all his writings in this volume will shew how indispensable he is, and how constantly his works elucidate the history, geography, and archaeology of Scripture. Yet, in spite of his constant assertions (Antiq. x. 11), he can have had no real respect for the writings which he so largely illustrates. If he had felt, as a Jew, any deep or religious appreciation of the O. T. history, which he professes to follow (οὐδὲν προθεῖς οὐδ' ἀπαλινύων, Antiq. i. proæm), he would not have tampered with it as he does, mixing it with pseudo-philosophical fancies (c. Ap. i. 10), with groundless Jewish Agadoth or traditions (such as the three years' war of Moses with the Ethiopians, the love of Tharbis for him, etc.—Antiq. ii. 10. 2), and with quotations from heathen writers of very doubtful authority (Antiq. viii. 5. 3, etc.; see Van Dale, De Aristat., p. 211). Moreover, he constantly varies from the sacred text in numbers (e.g., in his entire chronology), and in names, so that in his genealogy of the high-priests, 'scarce five of the names agree with anything that we have in Scripture' (Prideaux, Connect. i. 44). The worst charge, however, against him, is his constant attempt, by alterations and suppressions (and especially by a rationalistic method of dealing with miracles, which contrasts strangely with his credulous fancies), to make Jewish history palatable to Greeks and Romans, to such an extent that J. Ludolfus calls him 'fabulator sepius quam historicus' (Hist. Ethiop., p. 230). Thus he omits all the most important Messianic prophecies; he manipulates the book of Daniel in a most unsatisfactory manner (Antiq. ix. 11); he speaks in a very loose way about Moses and Abraham (Antiq. i. 8. 1; c. Ap. ii. 15); and though he can swallow the romance of the pseudo-Aristeas, he rationalises the account of the Exodus and Jonah's whale (Antiq. ii. 16. 5; ix. 10. 2). On the whole subject of his credibility as a writer, his omissions, his variations, and his panderings to ethnic taste, see J. A. Fabricius, De Joseph. et ejus Scriptis, in Hudson's ed.; Van Dale, De Aristat., x., xi.; De Idolo-latrid., vii.; Brinch, Examen Hist. Flav. Josepho, in Havercamp, ii. 309, sq.; Ottius, Spicilegium ex Josepho; Ittigius, Prolegomena; Usher, Epist. ad Lud. Cappellum, p. 42, Whiston's Dissertations, etc.

Nothing is more certain than that Josephus was no Christian (ἀπιστῶν τῷ Ἰησοῦ ὡς Χριστῷ, Orig. c. Cels. i. 35); the whole tone of his mind was alien from the noble simplicity of Christian belief, and, as we have seen already, he was not even a good Jew. Whatever, therefore, may be thought about the passages alluding to John the Baptist* (Antiq. xviii. 5. 2), and James, 'the Lord's brother' (Id. xx. 9. 1), which may possibly† be genuine, there can be no reasonable doubt that the famous allusion to our Lord (Antiq. xviii. 3. 3), is either absolutely spurious, or largely interpolated. The silence of Josephus on a subject of such importance, and with which he must have been so thoroughly acquainted, is easily explicable, and it is intrinsically much more probable that he should have passed over the subject altogether (as is done also by his cotemporary Justus of Tiberias, Phot. Cod. Bibl. 33), than that he should only have devoted to it a few utterly inadequate lines; and even if he had been induced to do this by some vague hope of getting something by it from Christians like Flavius Clemens, he certainly would not have expressed himself in language so strong as ἐλεγε ἀνδρα αὐτὸν λέγειν χρῆ, and still less would he have vouched for the Messiahship, the miracles, or the resurrection. Justin, Tertullian, Chrysostom, Origen, and even Photius, knew nothing of the passage, nor does it appear till the time of Eusebius (Hist. Ecc., i. 2; Dem. Evang., iii. 5), a man for whom Niebuhr can find no better name than 'a detestable falsifier,' and whose historical credibility is well nigh given up. Whether Eusebius forged it himself, or borrowed it from the marginalia of some Christian reader, cannot be determined, but that Josephus did not write it may be regarded as settled. Nay, the very next section (Antiq. xvii. 3. 4) is a disgusting story, wholly irrelevant to the tenor of the narrative, and introduced in all probability for the sole purpose of a blasphemous parody on the miraculous conception, such as was attempted by various rabbinical writers (e.g., Sopher Toledoth Jeshua; see Wagenseil, Tela Ign. Satan.; Winer, s. v. Joseph.). That Josephus intended obliquely to discredit some of the chief Christian doctrines, by representing them as having been anticipated by the Essenes, seems by no means improbable (De Quincey's Works, ix., The Essenes). For a compendium of the abundant literature on those questions, see Gieseler, Ecl. Hist., sec. 34. The chief treatises are, Daubuz, Pro testimonio Fl. Jos. de Jesu Christ., Lond. 1706; reprinted in Havercamp. Böhmert, über der Fl. Jos. Zeugniß von Christo, Leipz. 1823; Le Moyné, Var. Sacr. ii. 931; Heinichen, Excurs. i. ad Euseb. H. E. vol. iii. p. 331.

The works of Josephus are—1. De Bello Judaico, or περί ἀλώσεως, in seven books, translated by himself from the Syro-Chaldee. 2. Ἰουδαϊκὴ Ἀρχαιολογία, in twenty books (A. D. 95), an apologetic paraphrase of Scripture history for Gentiles. 3. The Autobiography, in seventy-six chapters. 4. Against Apion, a treatise of immense learning (Jer.,

* It is by no means impossible that Josephus may have learnt from Banus a respect for John the Baptist (Vit. 2).

† The latter passage, however, was early tampered with by Christians (Orig., Comment. ad Matt., ed. Rothom., p. 223; c. Celsum, i., p. 35; ii., p. 69., ed. Cant.; Euseb., Hist. Ecc., ii. 23).

ad Magn. Orat., Ep. 83) on the antiquity and nobility of the Jews. The Fourth of Maccabees (εἰς Μακκαβαίους λόγος) is doubted, and the πρὸς πᾶν-τος is spurious. Other books which he contemplated writing (On God, On the Laus, On Customs, Antiq. xx. 11. 2; viii. 10; iv. 8. 2, etc.) were either never written or have been lost. The best editions of Josephus are—Hudson's, 1720; Haver-camp's, 1726; Richter, 1827; Dindorf, 1845; Bekker, 1855. There are English translations by Whiston, Lodge, L'Estrange, and Traill.—F. W. F.

JOSES (Ἰωσῆς). 1. An ancestor of our Lord (Luke iii. 29; A. V. Jose). The best authorities read Ἰησοῦ here. 2. Son of Mary and Cleopas, and brother of James the Less, of Simon, and of Jude, and, consequently, one of those who are called the 'brethren' of our Lord (Matt. xiii. 55; xxvii. 56; Mark vi. 3; xv. 40, 47). Whether any of these brothers was an apostle has been disputed [JESUS CHRIST; JAMES, 3; JUDE, EPISTLE OF]. If one was, two at least were, James and Jude, and it is supposed by some Simon also. This is not at all probable on the face of it. 3. [BARNABAS].

JOSHUA (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, יֵשׁוּעַ, or יְשֻׁעַ, whose help is Jehovah, or Jehovah is help; comp. the German name Gotholf; Sept., N. T., and Joseph., Ἰησοῦς). 1. The son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, the assistant and successor of Moses. His name was originally יְהוֹשֻׁעַ (Hoshea), salvation (Num. xiii. 8); and it seems that the subsequent alteration of it by Moses (Num. xiii. 16) was significant, and proceeded on the same principle as that of Abram into Abraham (Gen. xvii. 5), and of Sarai into Sarah (Gen. xvii. 15).

According to the Tismach David, Joshua was born in Egypt, in the year of the Jewish era 2406 (B.C. 1537). In the Bible he is first mentioned as being the victorious commander of the Israelites in their battle against the Amalekites at Rephidim (Exod. xvii. 8-16). He distinguished himself by his courage and intelligence during and after the exploration of the land of Canaan, on which occasion he represented his tribe, which was that of Ephraim (Num. xiii., xiv.). Moses, with the divine sanction, appointed him to command the Israelites, even during his own lifetime (Num. xxvii. 18-23; Deut. iii. 28; xxxi. 23). After the death of Moses he led the Israelites over the Jordan, fortified a camp at Gilgal (Josh. ix. 6; x. 6-43), conquered the southern and middle portions of Canaan (vi.-x.), and also some of the northern districts (ix.). But the hostile nations, although subdued, were not entirely driven out and destroyed (xiii.; xxiii. 13; Judg. i. 27-35). In the seventh year after entering the land, it was distributed among the various tribes, which then commenced individually to complete the conquest by separate warfare (xv. 13, seq.; xvi. 10; xvii. 12, seq.). Joshua died 110 years old (B.C. 1427), and was buried at Timnath-serah (Josh. xxiv.), on Mount Ephraim. According to the Archæologia or Antiquities of Josephus, (v. 1. 29), Joshua commanded the Jews twenty-five years, but, according to other Jewish chronologists, twenty-seven years. The Tismach David, on the years of the Jewish era 2489 and 2496, remarks:—'It is written in the Seder Olam that Joshua judged Israel twenty-eight years, commencing from the year 2488, immediately from the death of Moses, to the year 2516. This, however, would not be known to us but for cabbalistic tradition, but in some degree also by reasoning,' etc. Hottinger (Smegma, p. 469) says:—'According to the Midrash, Rahab was ten years old when the Israelites left Egypt; she played the whore during the forty years in which the Israelites were in the desert. She became the wife of Joshua, and eight prophets descended from her, viz., Jeremiah, Mahasia, Hanamael, Shallum, Baruch, Ezekiel. Some say also that Huldah the prophetess was her descendant.' Some chronologists have endeavoured to reduce the rule of Joshua to seventeen, and others to twenty-one years.

There occur some vestiges of the deeds of Joshua in other historians besides those of the Bible. Procopius mentions a Phœnician inscription near the city of Tingis in Mauritania, the sense of which in Greek was:—Ἡμεῖς ἐσμεν οἱ φυγόντες ἀπὸ προσώπου Ἰησοῦ τοῦ ληστοῦ υἱοῦ Ναυῆ.—'We are those who fled before the face of Joshua the robber, the son of Nun' (De Bell. Vandal., ii. 10). Suidas (sub voce Χαναάν):—ἡμεῖς ἐσμεν Χαναανῖται οὓς ἐδίωξεν Ἰησοῦς ὁ ληστής.—'We are the Canaanites whom Joshua the robber persecuted.' Compare Fabricii Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti, i. 889, seq., and the doubts respecting this statement in Dale, De Origine et Progressu Idolatriæ, p. 749, seq.

The Samaritans, who for dogmatical purposes endeavoured to depreciate the authority of persons mentioned in the latter books of the O. T., such as Eli, Samuel, Zerubbabel, and others, had no such interest to attack the person of Joshua. Eulogius, according to Photius (Codex, p. 230), states: Τῶν Σαμαρειτῶν τὸ πλῆθος οἱ μὲν Ἰησοῦν τὸν Ναυῆ ἐδίωξαν εἶναι περὶ οὗ Μωυσῆς εἶπε, προφήτην ἡμῶν ἀναστήσει Κύριος, etc.—(Comp. Lampe, Comment. in Evangelium Johannis, vol. i., p. 748.) The Samaritans even endeavoured to exalt the memory of Joshua by making him the nucleus of many strange legends which they embodied into their Arabic book of Joshua, a work which seems to have been compiled in the middle ages, and is quoted by the Rabbinical chroniclers of that period, R. Samuel Schullam (Fuchasin, 154; Shalsheleth Hakkabalah, p. 96), Hottinger (Historia Orientalis, p. 60, sq.), Zunz (Gottesdienstliche Vorträge der Juden, p. 140). Reland supposed that this book was written at an earlier period, and augmented in the middle ages; but it is more likely that the whole is a late compilation.

A letter of Shaubech, שׁוּבֵחַ, king of Armenia Minor, in the Samaritan book of Joshua (chap. xxvi.), styles Joshua אֱלִיפָאטוֹר, אֱלִיפָאטוֹר, lupus percussor, 'the murderous wolf;' or, according to another reading in the book Fuchasin (p. 154, f. 1), and in the Shalsheleth Hakkabalah (p. 96), עֶרְבֹת, lupus vespertinus, 'the evening wolf' (comp. Hab. i. 8; Hottinger, Historia Orientalis, Tiguri 1651, p. 40, seq.; Buddeus, Hist. Eccles., p. 964, seq.). A comparison of Hercules, according to the Phœnician and Greek mythology, with Joshua, has been attempted by Hercklitz (Quod Hercules idem sit ac Josua, Lipsiæ 1706, 4to).—C. H. F. B.

2. The Bethshemite in whose field the cart containing the ark of the Lord rested when the ark was brought up from among the Philistines. In this field a memorial stone long stood commemorating the occurrence (1 Sam. vi. 14, 18). For תֵּר אֶבֶן we should probably read תֵּר אֶבֶן (so LXX., Targ., 3 codd. of Kennicott, and 1 of De Rossi), 'And a witness [thereof] is the great stone . . . unto this day.'

3. A governor in Jerusalem after whom a gate in the city was named (2 Kings xxiii. 8). This cannot have been one of the city gates, as no such name was borne by any of them. We must therefore regard it as a gate within the city, probably one made by Joshua for the purpose of affording a private entrance into the citadel, where, as governor, he doubtless resided, and where there may have been some place of idolatrous worship. The city gate mentioned in this verse is apparently the gate Gennath, by which access to the citadel was obtained from the valley of Gihon, the modern Jaffa Gate. The gate of Joshua was probably a smaller gate on the left hand side of the main gate as one entered the city.

4. The first of the high-priests after the Captivity. In Ezra ii. 2; iii. 2, the name is spelt Jeshua (יֵשׁוּעַ). He was the son of Jehozadak, and was probably born in Babylon, as his father was one of those carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar (1 Chron. vi. 15). His father having died in exile, it fell to Joshua, of hereditary right, to assume the place and functions of the high-priest when the people were restored to their own land. Associated with Zerubbabel, he acted as chief among the leaders of those who, availing themselves of the decree of Cyrus, returned to Jerusalem; and he took a principal part in the rebuilding of the Temple, and the repairing of the city. After the interruption caused by the efforts of the enemies of the Jews, he and Zerubbabel resumed the work in obedience to the summons of Haggai and Zechariah, and happily completed it. For his services in this respect he is praised among the famous men by the Son of Sirach (Ecclus. xlix. 12). Of his life subsequent to this event we have no information. The Chron. Alex. places his death in the fifty-third year of his high-priesthood. In the prophecies of Zechariah (iii., and vi. 8-14) he is set forth as typically representing the Messiah (comp. Hengstenberg, Christology, iii. 317, ff.; 349, ff.).—W. L. A.

JOSHUA, BOOK OF. The first in order of the נְבִיאִים רִאשׁוֹנִים in the Hebrew Canon. 1. Contents.—This book contains an account of the fortunes of the Israelites from the death of Moses to that of Joshua, the son of Nun. Beginning with the appointment of Joshua to succeed Moses as the leader of the people, it proceeds to describe the arrangements made by Joshua in prospect of passing over Jordan (i.-ii.); the crossing of the river, and the setting up of a memorial on the further side at Gilgal (iii.-iv.); the dismay which this occasioned to the Canaanites (v. 1); the circumcision of the males among the people, that rite having been neglected in the wilderness; the observance of the Passover by them in the camp at Gilgal; the ceasing of the manna on the day after they had entered Canaan (v. 2-12); the encouragement given to Joshua to proceed on his enterprise by the appearance of an angel to him (v. 13-15); the siege and capture of Jericho (vi.); the defeat of the Israelites at Ai (vii.); the taking of Ai (viii. 1-29); the writing of the law on tables of stone, and the solemn repetition from Ebal and Gerizim of the blessings and the curses which Moses had written in the book of the law (viii. 30-35); the confederation of the kings of Northern Canaan against the Israelites; the cunning device by which the Gibeonites secured themselves from being destroyed by the Israelites; the indignation of the other Canaanites against the Gibeonites, and the confederation of the kings around Jerusalem against Joshua, with their signal defeat by him (ix.-x.); the overthrow at the waters of Megiddo of the great northern confederacy, with the destruction of the Anakim (xi.); the list of kings whose country the Israelites had taken under Moses and Joshua (xii.); the division of the country, both the parts conquered and those yet remaining under the power of the Canaanites, among the different tribes, chiefly by lot; the setting up of the tabernacle in Shiloh; the appointment of cities of refuge and of cities for the Levites; the return of the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, to their possessions on the east of the Jordan, after the settlement of their brethren in Canaan (xiii.-xxii.); and the farewell addresses of Joshua to the people, his death and burial (xxiii.-xxiv.). The book naturally divides itself into two parts; the former (i.-xii.) containing an account of the conquest of the land; the latter (xiii.-xxiv.) of the division of it among the tribes. These are frequently distinctively cited as the historical and the geographical portions of the book.

2. Design.—The design of the book is manifestly to furnish a continuation of the history of the Israelites from the point at which it is left in the closing book of the Pentateuch, and at the same time to illustrate the faithfulness of Jehovah to his word of promise, and his grace in aiding his people by miraculous interference to obtain possession of the land promised to Abraham. The ground idea of the book, as Maurer (Comment., p. 3) observes, is furnished by God's declaration to Joshua, recorded i. 5, 6, that the work which Moses commenced he should finish by subduing and dividing to the tribes of Israel the promised land. The book, therefore, may be regarded as setting forth historically the grounds on which the claims of Israel to the proprietorship of the land rested; and as possessing, consequently, not merely an historical, but also a constitutional and legal worth. As illustrating God's grace and power in dealing with his people, it possesses also a religious and spiritual interest.

3. Structure.—On this head a variety of opinions have been entertained. It has been asserted—

1. That the book is a collection of fragments from different hands, put together at different times, and the whole revised and enlarged by a later writer. Some make the number of sources whence these fragments have been derived ten (Herwerden, Disp. de Libro Jos., Groning. 1826); others five, including the reviser (Knobel, Exeg. Hdb. pt. 13; Ewald, Gesch. der Israel., i. 73, ff.); while others content themselves with three (Bleek, Eintrit. ins. A. T., p. 325).

2. That it is a complete and uniform composition, interspersed with glosses and additions more or less extensive.

3. That the first part is the composition of one author; but the second betrays indications of being a compilation from various sources (Hävernicks, Einleit. II. i. p. 34).

4. That the book is complete and uniform throughout, and, as a whole, is the composition of one writer.

It is impossible here to enter into all the details of this discussion. The reader will find these fully presented by De Wette, Einleit. ins A. T., 4th and subsequent editions; Hävernicks, Einleit. 2ter Th. Abt. i. p. 1, ff.; König, Alt-testamentl. Studien, i. p. 4, ff.; Maurer, Comment.; Keil, Comment., E. T., p. 3, ff.; Bleek, Einl. ins A. T., p. 311, ff.; Knobel, in the Exeget. Handbuch, pt. 13; and Davidson, Introd. to the O. T., i. p. 412. It may suffice here to notice a few of the grounds on which principally the unity of the book has been denied. These are found partly in alleged double narratives of the same event, partly in supposed discrepancies of statement, and partly in marked differences of phraseology and style in different parts of the book.

The events so alleged to be twice narrated in this book are, Joshua's decease, ch. xxiii. and xxiv.; the command to appoint twelve men, one out of each tribe, in connection with the passing over Jordan (iii. 12; iv. 3); the stoning of Achan and his dependants (vii. 25); the setting of an ambush for the taking of Ai (viii. 9, 12); the rest from war of the land (xi. 23; xiv. 15); the command to Joshua concerning dividing the land (xiii. 6, ff.); and the granting of Hebron to Caleb (xiv. 13; xv. 13). This list we have transcribed from Knobel (Kritik des Pentat. und Josua, Exeget. Hdb., xiii. p. 498). On referring to the passages, the reader will probably be surprised that they should be gravely adduced as instances of repetition, such as can be accounted for only by the hypothesis of different authors. What evidence, for instance, is there that the address of Joshua reported in ch. xxiv. is a repetition of the address reported in ch. xxiii.? Is it incredible that Joshua should have twice assembled the representatives of the people, to address them before his decease? May he not have felt that, spared beyond his expectation, it behoved him to avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded to address once more to the people words of counsel and admonition? This surely is more probable than that these two chapters contain different reports of the same speech. In the case of the grant to Caleb of Hebron, there is undoubtedly a repetition of the same fact; but it is such a repetition as might proceed from the same pen; for the two statements are made in different connections, the one in connection with Caleb's personal merits, the other in connection with the boundaries and occupation of the portion allotted to Judah. The taking of Ai will be considered further on. As for the other instances, we leave them to the judgment of our readers.

Of the alleged discrepancies, one on which much stress has been laid is, that in various parts of the book Joshua is said to have subdued the whole land and destroyed the Canaanites (xi. 10; xii. 7, ff.; xxi. 43; xxii. 4), whereas in others it is stated that large portions of the land were not conquered by Joshua (xiii. 1, ff.; xvii. 14, ff.; xviii. 3, ff.; xxiii. 5-12). Now, at first sight, the discrepancy here appears very manifest and somewhat serious. It is worthy of note, however, in the outset, that it is a discrepancy which pervades the book, and on which, consequently, no argument for diversity of authorship, as between the first and the second parts of it, can be built. Is it, then, of such a kind as to prove that the whole book is a compilation of fragments? This will hardly be affirmed by any one who reflects that a discrepancy of this sort is of a kind so obvious, that it is exactly such as a compiler, coolly surveying the materials he is putting together, would at once detect and eliminate; whereas an original writer might write so as to give the appearance of it from looking at the same object from different points of view in the course of his writing. It is on this latter hypothesis alone, we think, that the phenomenon before us is to be accounted for. Viewed in relation to purpose and effect, the land was conquered and appropriated; Israel was settled in it as master and proprietor, the power of the Canaanites was broken, and God's covenant to his people was fulfilled. But through various causes, chiefly the people's own fault, the work was not literally completed; and therefore, viewed in relation to what ought to have been done and what might have been done, the historian could not but record that there yet remained some enemies to be conquered, and some portions of the land to be appropriated. To find in such differences of statement discrepancies fatal to the unity of authorship in the book, seems really being critical overmuch, critical to the extent of being captious. Supposing a historian were to narrate that William the Conqueror subdued all England, and yet afterwards to tell us of the numbers of Anglo-Saxons who refused to acknowledge his rule, and the consequent revolts on the part of the English which disturbed his reign, would any reader be at a loss how to reconcile his statements? or would any candid and intelligent man resort to the violent hypothesis that, because of these diverse statements, the unity of the book must be impeached, and the authorship of it parcelled out among different annalists? Why, then, apply to the sacred historian a test which all would declare unsound and unfair if applied to writers of secular history?

Another apparent discrepancy has been found between xxii. 2 and xxiv. 14, 23. How, it is asked, could there be 'gross idolatry' amongst a people who had in all things conformed to the law of God given by Moses? This difficulty is dealt with by Augustine (Quest. in Jos., qu. 29), who solves it by understanding the injunction of Joshua to refer to alienation of heart on the part of the people from God:—'Non ait Et nunc auferte deos alienos siqui sint in vobis; sed omnino tanquam sciens esse, Qui sunt, inquit, in vobis. Proinde Propheta sanctus in cordibus eorum esse cernebat cogitationes de Deo alienas a Deo, et ipsas admonere auferré.' This explanation is followed in substance by Calvin and others; and it is apparently the true one. Had Joshua known that 'gross idolatry' was practised by the people, he would have taken vigorous measures before this to extirpate it. But against secret and heart idolatry he could use only words of warning and counsel.

Another discrepancy is thus set forth by Dr. Davidson (Introd. i. p. 415)—'It is related that the people assembled at Sichem, 'under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord,' and 'they presented themselves before God,' implying that the tabernacle and ark were there. But we know from xviii. 1 that the tabernacle had been removed from its former place at Gilgal to Shiloh, where it remained for a long period after Joshua's death (1 Sam. iii. 21; iv. 3). Here are several mistakes. The phrase 'before God' (לפני האלהים) does not necessarily mean 'before the ark of the Lord' (comp. Gen. xxvii. 7; Judg. xi. 11; xx. 1; 1 Kings xvii. 1, etc.; Hengstenberg, Beitr., Bd. iii. 43); and it is not related that 'the people assembled under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord,' but that Joshua 'took a great stone and set it up there under the oak that was within the sanctuary of the Lord' (xxiv. 26). The oak referred to was probably a well-known one that stood within the spot which had been the first sanctuary of the Lord in Canaan (Gen. xii. 6, 7), and where the nation had been convened by Joshua, on first entering the promised land, to listen to the words of the law (Josh. viii. 30-35). No place more fitting, as the site of a memorial stone such as Joshua is here said to have set up, could be found.

These are the only discrepancies that have even the appearance of seriously affecting the claim of the book to be regarded as the work of one author throughout. The others, which have been discovered and urged by some recent critics in Germany, are such that it seems unnecessary to take up space by noticing them. The reader will find them noted and accounted for in the Introduction to Keil's Commentary on Joshua, p. 9, ff.

The alleged differences of phraseology and style in different parts of the book might deserve more extended notice, were it not for the very unsatisfactory state in which this method of inquiry as yet is. Without doubt, it is true that, if it can be shewn that these differences are such as to indicate diversity of authorship, the argument must be admitted as legitimate, and the conclusion as valid; but before dealing with such questions, it would be well if it were settled on some scientific basis what is the competent test in such a case, what kind and amount of difference in phraseology and style are sufficient to prove a diversity of authorship. On this head critics seem wholly at sea; they have no common standard to which to appeal; and hence their conclusions are frequently determined by purely personal leanings and subjective affections, and hardly any two of them agree in the judgment at which they arrive. This is remarkably the case with the instances which have been adduced from the book before us. Of these, some are of such a kind as to render an argument from them against the unity of the book little better than puerile. Thus we are told that in some places the word שבט is used for a tribe, while in others מטה is used, and this is employed as a test to distinguish one fragment from another. Accordingly, for instance, in ch. xviii. vers. 2, 4, 7, are pronounced to belong to one writer, and ver. 11 to another; which is just as if an author, in giving an account of the rebellion of 1745, should speak in the same chapter, first of a body of Highlanders as a clan, and then of the same as a sept, and some critic were to come after him and say, 'This could not have been written by one author, for he would not have called the same body by different names.' Could it be shewn that either שבט or מטה is a word introduced into the language for the first time at a date much later than the age of

Joshua, while the other word had then become obsolete, an argument of some weight, and such as a scholar like Bentley might have employed, would have been advanced; but to attempt to assign parts of the same chapter to different authors and to different epochs, simply because synonymous appellations of the same object are employed, is nothing better than sheer trifling. Again, it is said that 'the historical parts have the rare word מַחֲלָקָה, *inheritance (xi. 23; xii. 7;

xviii. 10), which does not appear in the geographical sections' (Davidson, i. 417). Is ch. xviii., then, not in the geographical part of the book? or does a part become geographical or historical as suits the caprice or the preconceived theory of the critic?

Similarly, the geographical portion has יְרֵחוֹ, Jordan by Jericho, xiii. 32; xvi. 1, xx. 8;

a mode of expression wanting in the historical' (Ibid.) True; but suppose there was no occasion to use the phrase in the historical portions, what then? Are they, therefore, from a different pen from that which produced the geographical? Again, in the historical parts occur the words, כֹּהֲנִים etc.); but in the geographical sections the same persons are termed sons of Aaron (xxi. 4, 10, 13, 19) (Ibid.) Is there not, however, a reason for this in the fact that, as it was in virtue of their being descended from Aaron, and not in virtue of their being priests, that the Kohathites received their portion, it was more proper to designate them 'children of Aaron, of the Levites,' than 'priests,' or 'the priests the Levites.' Davidson scouts this explanation as one which 'only betrays the weakness of the cause.' We confess ourselves unable to see this; the explanation is, in our judgment, perfectly valid in itself, and sufficient for the end for which it is adduced; and he has made no attempt to show that it is otherwise. All he says is, 'The former is a Deuteronomistic expression; the latter Elohistic.' What this is meant to convey we are at a loss to determine, for the only other places in which the phrase 'sons of Aaron' occurs is in connection with the names of Nadab and Abihu, who were sons of Aaron by immediate descent, and must have been so described by any writer, whether Deuteronomist or Elohist.

33); or simply כֹּהֲנִים, priests (iii. 6, 15; vi. 4, 6,

A number of other words are adduced by the opponents of the unity of the book of Joshua, for the purpose of showing that it includes fragments from different authors. On these we do not linger. There are two considerations which seem to us entirely to destroy their force as evidences for that which they are adduced to prove. The one of these is that, according to Ewald, 'the later historians imitated the words and phraseology of those who preceded them, and moreover, that they frequently altered the phrases which they found in the earlier documents.' On this Kurz (from whom we borrow the statement) remarks with great force — 'If that was the case, we can no longer think of peculiarities of style as characteristic signs by which the different sources may be distinguished. His entire theory is therefore built on sand' (Comment. on Josh., Intro., p. 9, E. T.) The other observation we would make is, that supposing it made out by indubitable marks that the book of Joshua has undergone a careful revision by a later editor, who has altered expressions and interpolated brief statements that would not seriously impeach the unity of the book, it would still remain substantially the work of one author. We cannot forbear adding that, in all such inquiries, more faith is to be placed on a sound literary perception and taste, than on those minutiae of expression and phraseology on which so much stress has of late been laid by some of the scholars of Germany and their followers in this country. The impression undoubtedly left on the mind of the reader is, that this book contains a continuous and uniform narrative; and its claims in this respect can be brought into doubt only by the application to it of a species of criticism which would produce the same result were it applied to the histories of Livy, the commentaries of Cæsar, or any other ancient work of narrative.

4. Date of Composition.—This can be only approximately determined. Of great value for this purpose is the frequent use of the phrase, 'until this day,' by the writer, in reference to the duration of certain objects of which he writes. The use of such a phrase indicates indubitably that the narrative was written while the object referred to was still existing. It is a phrase, also, which may be used in reference to a very limited period; as, for instance, when Joshua uses it of the period up to which the two tribes and a half had continued with their brethren (xxii. 3), or when he uses it of the period up to which the Israelites had been suffering for the iniquity of Peor (xxii. 17); comp. also xxiii. 8, 9. Now, we find this phrase used by the historian in cases where the reference is undoubtedly to a period either within the lifetime of Joshua, or not long after his death. Thus it is used in reference to the stones which Joshua set up in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the priests had stood as the people passed over (iv. 9), and which we cannot suppose remained in that position for a very long time; it is used also of Rahab's dwelling in the midst of Israel (vi. 25), which must have ceased, at the furthest, very soon after Joshua's death; also of Caleb's personal possession of Hebron (xiv. 14), which of course terminated soon after the time of Joshua. From these notices we infer that the book may have been written during Joshua's lifetime, and cannot have been written long after. With this falls in the use of the first person in the reference to the crossing of the Jordan (v. 1), where one who was present on the occasion is evidently the writer. To the same effect is the fact, that no allusion is anywhere made to anything that is known to have been long posterior to the time of Joshua. From all this we may infer, that the book was written not later than a quarter of a century at furthest, after the death of Joshua.

Several words occurring in this book have been adduced as belonging to the later Hebrew, and as, consequently, indicating a later date of composition for the book than the age of Joshua, or that immediately succeeding. But it strikingly shows the precarious basis on which all such reasoning rests, that words are pronounced archaic or late, just as it suits the purpose of the inquirer; what

De Wette calls late being declared to be ancient by Hävernick and Keil, and what Hävernick and Keil call ancient being again pronounced late by Knobel and Davidson; and with equal absence of any show of reason on both sides. One thing of importance, however, is, that whether the writer has used what modern scholars, judging a priori, call later forms or not, he has undoubtedly made no allusions to later facts, and so has given evidence of antiquity which common sense inquirers can appreciate.

5. Author.—Assuming that the book is the production of one writer, and that it was written about the time above suggested, the question arises, To whom is it to be ascribed? That it is the work of Joshua himself is the tradition of the Jews (Baba Bathra, cap. i. fol. 14, B); and this has been embraced by several Christian writers, and among others in recent times, by König, and, as respects the first half of the book, by Hävernick. That this might have been the case as respects all but the concluding section of the book, cannot be denied; but the reasons which have been adduced in support of it have not appeared sufficient to the great majority of critics. These may be briefly noticed here. From xxiv. 26, where it is said that Joshua 'wrote these words in the book of the law,' it is inferred that whether by 'these words,' we are to understand all the preceding part of the book, or only the things narrated in the last two chapters, it may be alike concluded that Joshua is the author of the book; on the former supposition, from direct assertion; on the latter, from the consideration that, if he wrote the last two chapters in the Torah, the presumption is that he wrote the whole book. But it is probable that it is to the covenant which Joshua made with the people as expressed in his farewell addresses to them, that reference is made in this passage, and not to the preceding narrative, either in whole or in part; and if so, the inference is, that as the writing of that part alone is ascribed to Joshua, the rest of the book is not from his pen. Again, it has been contended that, in the account of the death and burial of Joshua, which must, of course, have been written by some other than Joshua himself, the style is so different as to render it probable that Joshua wrote the rest of the book (Jahn, Intro., p. 243). But an argument of this sort is always very uncertain, especially in the case of a book which has appeared to some critics to present traces of different styles throughout; to say nothing of the consideration that it is assuming more than can be conceded, that, supposing a diversity of style made out, the only way of accounting for that is, that the writer of the book was dead before the concluding portion was added. As for the title of honour given to Joshua, xxiv. 29, where he is called יְהוָה עֲבָדֵינוּ, a title nowhere else bestowed on him throughout the book, one can hardly infer from this that its absence in the earlier part of the book is a proof that that part was written by Joshua himself. He might indeed have from modesty refrained from using such a designation; but such a title comes in more appropriately in connection with the death of one who has faithfully served his generation by the will of God, than it does in the narrative of his exploits, and consequently, whilst the historian, in recording the events of Joshua's life, may have refrained from any such designation, he may have felt himself at perfect liberty to bestow it on him when narrating his death. Stress has also been laid on the use of the first person in v. 1, 6; but though the use of the 'we' in the former passage indicates that the writer was one of those who passed over, it does not necessarily prove that the writer was Joshua; and in the latter passage, the 'us' stands evidently for the nation as such, and might have been used by an Israelite at any period of the national existence. On the other hand, there are statements in the book which seem incompatible with the supposition that it was written by Joshua himself. Such is the account of the capture of Hebron by Caleb, of Debir by Othniel (xv. 13-19), and of Leshem by the Danites; events which, as we learn from Judg. i. 15, did not take place till after Joshua's death. Again, when Josh. xv. 63 is compared with Judg. i. 21, it seems evident that the event narrated took place after the time of Joshua, for, according to the author of Judges, it occurred subsequent to the assault on Jerusalem mentioned Judg. i. 8, and this is distinctly referred to the period after Joshua's death. It is probable, also, that such notices as those contained Josh. xiii. 2-5 (comp. Judg. iii. 3), Josh. xvi. 10 (comp. Judg. i. 29), and Josh. xvii. 11 (comp. Judg. i. 27, 28), relate to a period subsequent to that of Joshua. That the account of Joshua's death and burial, of the interment of the bones of Joseph, and of the burial of Eleazar (xxiv. 29-33), was not written by Joshua, all admit as a matter of course; but, if it be also admitted that Joshua did not write the rest of the book, there is no need for supposing the author of these verses to be different from the author of the book. Who this was we can only conjecture. There seems no serious objection to the suggestion of Keil that he was one of the elders who lived for some time after Joshua, and who had seen all the works of Jehovah which He had done for Israel (xxiv. 31; Judg. ii. 7), 'and who occupied himself at the close of his life with writing down, partly from recollection, and partly also from contemporary documents and other written notices, the things which he himself had witnessed' (p. 47). In this case the title which the book bears must be referred to the principal subject of the book, and not to the author of it.

6. Credibility.—That the narrative contained in this book is to be accepted as a trustworthy account of the transactions it records, is proved alike by the esteem in which it was always held by the Jews; by the references to events recorded in it in the national sacred songs (comp. Ps. xlv. 2-4; lxxviii. 54, 55; lxxviii. 13-15; cxiv. 1-8; Hab. iii. 8-13), and in other parts of Scripture (comp. Judg. xviii. 31; 1 Sam. i. 3, 9, 24; iii. 21; Is. xxviii. 21; Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8; xi. 30-32; Jam. ii. 25); by the traces which, both in the historical and in the geographical portions, may be found of the use by the writer of contemporary documents; by the minuteness of the details which the author furnishes, and which indicates familiar acquaintance with what he records; by the accuracy of his geographical delineations, an accuracy which the results of modern investigation are increasingly demonstrating; by the fact that the tribes never had any dispute as to the boundaries of their respective territories, but adhered to the arrangements specified in this book; and by the general fidelity to historical consistency and probability which the book displays (Hävernicks, Einl., sec. 148, ff.) Some of the narratives, it is true, are of a miraculous kind, but such are wholly in keeping with the avowed relation to the Almighty of the people whose history the book records, and they can be regarded as unhistorical only on the assumption that all miracles are incredible; a question we cannot stop to discuss here [MIRACLES]. In the list of such miraculous interpositions we do not include the standing still of the sun, and the staying of the moon, recorded in ch. x. 12, 13. That passage is apparently wholly a quotation from the book of Jashar, and is probably a fragment of a poem composed by some Israelite on the occasion; it records in highly poetical language the gracious help which God granted to Joshua by the retarding of the approach of darkness long enough to enable him to complete the destruction of his enemies; and is no more to be taken literally than is such a passage as Ps. cxiv. 4-6, where the Red Sea is described as being frightened and fleeing, and the mountains as skipping like rams [JASHAR, BOOK OF]. That God interposed on this occasion to help his people we do not doubt; but that he interposed by the working of such a miracle as the words taken literally would indicate, we see no reason to believe.

The account given, ch. viii. 1, ff., of the taking of Ai has been much dwelt upon as presenting a narrative which is unhistorical. It must be confessed that very considerable obscurity hangs over this portion of the book. It is incredible that Joshua sent two bodies of men, one comprising 30,000 soldiers, the other 5000, to lie in ambush against the city, while he himself advanced on it with the main body of his army; and yet this seems to be what the narrative states. What increases the improbability here is that the larger body is never mentioned as having come into action at all, for the whole exploit was accomplished by the 5000 and those who were with Joshua. If the case were stated thus: That Joshua took 30,000 of his warriors, and of these sent away 5000 to lie in ambush, while he with the remaining 25,000 advanced against the city; the narrative would be perfectly simple and credible. But as the text stands it is impossible to extract such a statement from it. The difficulty here has been often confessed by interpreters; but no satisfactory solution of it has been offered. The suggestion that vers. 12 and 13 are a marginal gloss which has been supposed to creep into the text, leaves the narrative burdened with the improbable statement that 30,000 men could advance on Ai in daylight, and lie concealed in its immediate neighbourhood for several hours without their presence being suspected by the inhabitants. Still less probable seems the suggestion that in these verses we have a fragment of an older record; for unless we suppose the fragment to have inserted itself in the middle of the other narrative, and the whole book to have formed itself by a fortuitous concourse of fragments, much after the manner in which the Epicureans supposed the universe to have been formed from a fortuitous concourse of atoms, we must presume it was inserted intentionally by some intelligent compiler; and such an insertion is just what no intelligent compiler would make. Keil labours to shew that from the peculiar style of Shemitic narrative it is competent to supply, in ver. 3, in thought, from the subsequent narrative, that Joshua selected from the 30,000 whom he took 5000, whom he sent away by night; but there appears to us too much in this of special pleading in order to escape a difficulty to make it acceptable. We prefer to admit our inability to solve the difficulty; at the same time maintaining that it would be unreasonable on this account to relinquish our confidence on the general credibility of the book.

7. Relation to the Pentateuch.—The Pentateuch brings down the history of the Israelites to the death of Moses, at which it naturally terminates. The book of Joshua takes up the history at this point, and continues it to the death of Joshua, which furnishes another natural pause. From resemblance between the language and forms of expression used by the author of the book of Joshua, and those found in Deuteronomy, it has been supposed that both are to be ascribed, in part at least, to the same writer. This, of course, proceeds on the supposition that the book of Deuteronomy is not the composition of Moses; a question on which it would be out of place to enter here [DEUTERONOMY; PENTATEUCH]. It may suffice to observe, that whilst it is natural to expect that many similarities of phraseology and language would be apparent in works so nearly contemporaneous as that of Deuteronomy and that of Joshua; there are yet such differences between them as may seem to indicate that they are not the production of the same writer. Thus, in the Pentateuch, we have the word Jericho always spelt יִרְחֹו, whilst in Joshua it is always יִרְחֹו; * in Deuteronomy we have אֵל קָנָא (iv. 24; v. 9; vi. 15), in Joshua אֵל קָנָא (xxiv. 19); in Deut. the inf. of יָרָא, to fear, is יִרְאָה (iv. 10; v. 26; vi. 24, etc.), in Josh. it is יָרָא (xxii. 25); in Deut. we have warriors described as בְּנֵי חַיִּל (iii. 18), whilst in Josh. they are called בְּנֵי הַחַיִּל (i. 14; vi. 2, etc.). We have also in Joshua the peculiar formula דָּמּוּ בְּרָאשׁוֹ, which nowhere occurs in the Pentateuch, but only דָּמּוּ בּוֹ (Lev. xx. 9, 11, 12, etc.); the expression אָדָם לֵל הָאָרֶץ (iii. 11, 13), which occurs again only in Zech. vi. 5; the phrase, 'the heart melted' (ii. 11; v. 1; vii. 5); etc. In the Pentateuch also we find the usage in respect of the third personal pronoun feminine fluctuating between הִיא and הִיא; in the book of Joshua the usage is fixed down to הִיא, which became the permanent usage of the language. We find also that in the Pentateuch the demonstrative pronoun, with the article, sometimes appears in the form הַזֶּה, while in Joshua and elsewhere it is always הַזֶּה. The evidence here is the same in effect as would accrue in the case of Latin writers from the use of ipsum and ipse, illud and ille.

* In some editions the word is written יִרְחֹו, in ch. ii. 1, 3; iv. 13, etc. Keil calls this in question, saying, 'I have not met with this form in any of the editions issued by J. H. Michaelis and Hahn.' It is found, however, in the edition of Leusden, Amst. 1667, and that of Jablonski, Ber. 1690, and Kennicott reports it as the reading of several codices.

8. Samaritan Book of Joshua.—Hottinger, in his Historia Orientalis, p. 60, ff. (comp. also Fabricius, Codex Apocr. Vet. Test., p. 876, ff.), has given an account of this work from Rabbinical sources. It seems to have been originally composed in Arabic, though alleged to have been translated into Arabic from the Samaritan (see Rödiger in the Hall. Allg. Lit. Zeit. for 1848, No. 217, ff.), and bears evident marks of having been written subsequent to the Coran, probably as late as the 13th century. It contains a compilation from the canonical books of Moses and Joshua, mixed up with much legendary matter. An edition, from the only MS. extant, appeared in 1848 at Leyden, with the title Liber Josue: Chronicum Samaritanum; edidit, latine vertit, etc., T. G. J. Juynboll. It seems never to have been recognised by the Samaritans themselves (De Wette, Eintl., sec. 171).

9. Commentaries.—There is an explanation of the Book of Joshua in the works of Ephraem Syrus (Opp. Syr., vol. i.), also Questions on it in the works of Theodoret and Augustine. The Hebrew commentary of Rashi was published with a Latin translation by Breithaupt, Goth. 1714. The most valuable of the commentaries since the Reformation are those of Masius, 1574; Chytræus, 1592; Calvin, 1667; Osiander, 1681; Corn. a Lapide, 1718; Maurer, 1831; Rosenmüller (in his Scholia, P. ix. vol. 1), 1833; Bush, 1838; Keil, 1847, translated into English by Martin, 1857.—W. JOSHUA, or JESHUA B. JEHUDAH, called in Arabic Abulfarag Forkan Ibn Assad (أَبُو الْفَرَّاسِ فَرْكَانُ بْنُ إِسْحَاقَ), and quoted by Ibn Ezra by the simple name R. Joshua (ר' יושוע), a distinguished Karaite philosopher, grammarian, and commentator, who flourished in the 11th century, and who, from his great piety and extensive knowledge, obtained the honourable appellation of the aged, or presbyter (Ha-Saken, Al-Shaich). He wrote expositions of the whole O. T., which are still in MS. The only fragments printed are given by Ibn Ezra on Gen. xxviii. 12; xlix. 27; Exod. iii. 2, 13; iv. 4; vi. 3, 13; vii. 3, 12; viii. 22; x. 6; xii. 5; xv. 4; xvii. 16; xxi. 37; xxii. 7; xxxv. 5; Lev. xvi. 1; Hos. v. 7; Joel iii. 1; Amos ix. 10; Obad. 17; Jonah iii. 3; Micah ii. 7; vii. 12; Hab. ii. 7; Zeph. iii. 1; Hag. ii. 10; Mal. ii. 6; Dan. i. 3; ii. 4; iv. 17; vi. 9; xii. 2; Ps. lxxxviii. 1; cix. 8; cx. 3; cxix. 160; cxii. 1; cxlix. 6. JOSIAH (יְהוֹשִׁיָּהוּ, Jehovah heals; Sept. Iwoslas).

1. Seventeenth king of Judah, and son of Amon, whom he succeeded on the throne in B.C. 698, at the early age of eight years, and reigned thirty-one years.

As Josiah thus early ascended the throne, we may the more admire the good qualities which he manifested, seeing, as Coquerel remarks, 'qu'il est difficile de recevoir une bonne éducation sur le trône' (Biographie Sacrée, p. 305). Avoiding the example of his immediate predecessors, he 'did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in all the ways of David his father, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left' (2 Kings xxii. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 1, 2). So early as the sixteenth year of his age he began to manifest that enmity to idolatry in all its forms which distinguished his character and reign; and he was not quite twenty years old when he proclaimed open war against it, although more or less favoured by many men of rank and influence in the court and kingdom. He then commenced a thorough purification of the land from all taint of idolatry, by going about and superintending in person the operations of the men who were employed in breaking down idolatrous altars and images, and cutting down the groves which had been consecrated to idol-worship. His detestation of idolatry could not have been more strongly expressed than by ransacking the sepulchres of the idolatrous priests of former days, and consuming their bones upon the idol altars before they were overturned. Yet this operation, although unexampled in Jewish history, was foretold 326 years before Josiah was born, by the prophet who was commissioned to denounce to Jeroboam the future punishment of his sin. He even named Josiah as the person by whom this act was to be performed; and said that it should be performed in Beth-el, which was then a part of the kingdom of Israel (1 Kings xiii. 2). All this seemed much beyond the range of human probabilities. But it was performed to the letter; for Josiah did not confine his proceedings to his own kingdom, but went over a considerable part of the neighbouring kingdom of Israel, which then lay comparatively desolate, with the same object in view; and at Beth-el, in particular, executed all that the prophet had foretold (2 Kings xxiii. 1-19; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3-7, 32). In these proceedings Josiah seems to have been actuated by an absolute hatred of idolatry, such as no other king since David had manifested, and which David had scarcely occasion to manifest in the same degree.

In the eighteenth year of his reign and the twenty-sixth of his age, when the land had been thoroughly purified from idolatry and all that belonged to it, Josiah proceeded to repair and beautify the temple of the Lord. In the course of this pious labour, the high-priest Hilkiah discovered in the sanctuary a volume, which proved to contain the books of Moses, and which, from the terms employed, seems to have been considered the original of the law as written by Moses. [HILKIAH.] It appears that the king was greatly astonished when some parts of this were read to him. It is manifest that he had previously been entirely ignorant of much that he then heard; and he rent his clothes in consternation when he found that, with the best intentions to serve the Lord, he and all his people had been living in the neglect of duties which the law declared to be of vital importance. It is difficult to account for this ignorance. Some suppose that all the copies of the law had perished, and that the king had never seen one. But this is very unlikely; but however scarce complete copies may have been, the pious king was likely to have been the possessor of one. The probability seems to be that the passages read were those awful denunciations against disobedience with which the book of Deuteronomy concludes, and which from some cause or other the king had never before read, or which had never before produced on his mind the same strong conviction of the imminent dangers under which the nation lay, as now when read to him from a volume invested with a character so venerable, and brought with such interesting circumstances under his notice.

The king in his alarm sent to Huldah 'the prophetess,' for her counsel in this emergency [HULDAH]: her answer assured him that, although the dread penalties threatened by the law had been incurred and would be inflicted, he should be gathered in peace to his fathers before the days of punishment and sorrow came.

It was perhaps not without some hope of averting this doom that the king immediately called the people together at Jerusalem, and engaged them in a solemn renewal of the ancient covenant with God. When this had been done, the Passover was celebrated with careful attention to the directions given in the law, and on a scale of unexampled magnificence. But all was too late; the hour of mercy had passed; for 'the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath, wherewith his anger was kindled against Judah' (2 Kings xxii. 3-20; xxiii. 21-27; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8-33; xxxv. 1-19).

That removal from the world which had been promised to Josiah as a blessing was not long delayed, and was brought about in a way which he had probably not expected. His kingdom was tributary to the Chaldean empire; and when Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, sought a passage through his territories, on an expedition against the Chaldeans, Josiah, with a very high sense of the obligations which his vassalage imposed, refused to allow the march of the Egyptian army through his dominions, and prepared to resist the attempt by force of arms. Necho was very unwilling to engage in hostilities with Josiah: the appearance of the Hebrew army at Megiddo, however, brought on a battle, in which the king of Judah was so desperately wounded by arrows that his attendants removed him from the war-chariot, and placed him in another, in which, apparently, he died whilst being taken to Jerusalem (comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 30; 2 Chron. xxxv. 24). No king that reigned in Israel was ever more deeply lamented by all his subjects than Josiah: and we are told that the prophet composed on the occasion an elegiac ode, which was long preserved among the people, but which is not now in existence (2 Kings xxiii. 29-37; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20-27).—J. K.

2. The son of Zephaniah, to whose house the prophet Zechariah was commanded to conduct the delegates from the Israelites in Babylon, that they might assist at the crowning of Joshua the high-priest (Zech. vi. 10). Josiah was probably the treasurer of the temple; and in his house the delegates had apparently deposited their gifts, from which the materials of the crown were to be taken. In ver. 14 Josiah is called Hen, as Heldai is called Helem; both having apparently double names. Some, indeed, would translate הן favour, and explain it of the hospitality shewn by Josiah to the delegates; but this is forced and unnecessary. Josiah's father was probably the Zephaniah mentioned 2 Kings xxv. 18 as a priest of the second rank, and as one of those carried captive to Babylon.—W. L. A.

JOSIPPON B. GORION (יוסיפון בן גוריון), also called JOSEPH B. GORION, the reputed author of the celebrated Hebrew Chronicle entitled ספר יוספון the book of Josippon, or יוסף העברי the Hebrew Josippon. This chronicle consists of six books, begins its record with Adam, explains the genealogical table in Gen. xi., then passes on to the history of Rome, Babylon, Cyrus, and the fall of Babel, resumes again the history of the Jews, describes the times of Daniel, Zerubbabel, Esther, etc.; gives an account of Alexander the Great, his connection with the Jews, his exploits, and expeditions of his successors, and then continues the history of the Jews, of Heliodorus' assault on the Temple, the translation of the O. T. into Greek, the deeds of the Maccabees, the events of the Herodians, and the last war which terminated in the destruction of the Temple by Titus. The authorities quoted in this remarkable book are—1, Nicolaus the Damascene; 2, Strabo of Cappadocia; 3, Titus Livius; 4, Togthas of Jerusalem; 5, Porophius of Rome; 6, The History of Alexander, written in the year of his death by Magi; 7, The book of the antediluvian patriarch Cainan b. Enos; 8, Books of the Greeks, Medians, Persians, and Macedonians; 9, Epistle of Alexander to Aristotle about the wonders of India; 10, Treaties of alliance of the Romans; 11, Cicero, who was in the Holy of Holies of the Temple, during the reign of Pompejus; 12, The intercalary years of Julius Cæsar, composed for the Nazarites and Greeks; 13, The chronicles of the Roman Emperors; 14, The constitutional diploma which Vespasian venerated so highly that he kissed every page of it; 15, The Alexandrian Library with its 995 volumes; 16, Jewish histories which are lost; and 17, The national traditions which have been transmitted orally.

As to the author and date of this book, the greatest divergency of opinions prevails amongst scholars. The writer himself says that he is the priest of Jerusalem, i.e., Flavius Josephus, and that he was appointed governor of the whole Jewish nation by Titus (pp. 68, 157, 164, 367, 673, ed. Breithaupt), and this has been the unanimous opinion of the most learned Jewish writers since the days of Saadia (A. D. 950). It is quoted as the genuine production of Flavius Josephus by the celebrated Rashi (on 2 Kings xx. 13; Is. xxi. 4; xxxix. 2; Ezek. xxvii. 17; Hag. ii. 7; Zech. ix. 14; Dan. v. 1; vi. 29; vii. 6; viii. 11, 21; xi. 2, 4, 16, 17, 29); Ibn Ezra (on Gen. xxxvii. 25; Is. ii. 2; Hos. xiv. 2; Hag. ii. 9; Ps. xlix. 20; cxx. 5; Dan. ii. 39; xi. 3); Kimchi (Lex. art. יְהוֹשֻפִּת); Pseudo-Saadia (on Dan. ix. 27); De Rossi (Meor Enaim, ed. Mantua 1574, c. xix., p. 86, b); and a host of other scholars, both Jewish and Christian. But Zunz (Zeitschrift, Berlin 1822, p. 300) has tried to show that this Josippon is ignorant of history. He says, ex gr., that Titus executed the high-priest Ishmael b. Elisa (p. 888), makes Ptolemy Lagi and Antigonus identical (p.

153), Ptolemy and תלמי separate persons (p. 176), etc.; he sometimes forgets to simulate Josephus (comp. pp. 443, 446, 452, 510, 524, 370, 373, 250, 334, 350, where he quotes the Latin translation of Josephus as belonging to somebody else, and from p. 677 speaks of Josephus as a third person); he speaks of later nations and countries, viz., of Campagna (p. 7), Romagna (p. 20), Sorrento (p. 19), Trani (p. 869), Tessino (p. 6), Po (ibid.), Candia (p. 163), the Danes (p. 745), Turko-

mans (p. 92), the Goths in Spain (p. 221); he also describes the coronation of an emperor, speaks of popes and bishops (p. 671). Zunz therefore concludes that the writer was a French Jew, who flourished in the 9th century, that this deceiver made the fragments of the genuine Josephus which had been translated into Hebrew the basis of his work, and that he made use of other apocryphal writings and his own imagination to fill up the gaps, and that subsequent hands have made all manner of interpolations into it. In his notes on Benjamin of Tudela (ed. Asher, 1841, vol. ii., p. 246), however, Zunz speaks of Josippon b. Gorion in more respectful terms, regards him as 'the [Hebrew] translator and editor of Josephus,' and says that 'he lived in Italy about the middle of the latter half of the 10th century, and that his accounts of several nations of his time are as important as his orthography of Italian towns is remarkable.' Steinschneider, who also assigns its birth to the 10th century and to northern Italy, describes the book as 'the Hebrew edition of the Latin Hegesippus,' and 'as an offshoot from the fully developed Midrash of Arabian and Latin literature' (Jewish Literature, London 1857, p. 77); whilst Graetz maintains that it is a Hebrew translation of an Arabic book of Maccabees, entitled (TARICH AL MAKKABAIN, JUSSUFF IBN G'OR'ON) History of the Maccabees of Joseph b. Gorion, which has partly been published in the Polyglotts (Paris 1645; London 1657) under the title of the Arabic book of Maccabees, and which is to be found complete in two MSS. in the Bodleian (URI Catalogue, Nos. 782, 829), and that the translator, an Italian Jew, has made additions to it and displayed great skill in his Hebrew style (Geschichte der Juden, v. 281).

The first edition of this work appeared in Mantua 1476-1479, with a preface by Abraham b. Salomon Conato. A reprint of this edition (the text vitiated), with a Latin version by Munster, was published at Basle, 1541. There appeared an edition from a MS. containing a somewhat different version of the work, and divided into ninety-seven chapters, edited by Tam Ibn Jachja b. David, Constantinople 1510. New editions of it were published in Venice 1544; Cracow 1589; Frankfurt-on-the-Maine 1689; Amsterdam 1723; Prague 1784; Zolkiew 1805; Vilna 1819. It was partly translated into Arabic by Zechariah ben Said el-Tememi about 1223; and into English by Peter Morwyng, London 1558, 1561, 1575, 1579, 1602. There are two other Latin translations, besides the one by Munster, 1541; one was made by our countryman the learned orientalist John Gagnier, Oxford 1706, and one by Breithaupt, the last has also the Hebrew text and elaborate notes, and will always continue the students' edition. We have German translations by Michael Adam, Zurich 1546; Moses b. Bezaliel, Prague 1607; Abraham b. Mordecai Cohen, Amsterdam 1661; Seligmann Reis, Frankfurt-on-the-Maine 1707. Comp. JOST, ISAAC MARCUS, the ornament of modern Jews, the first Israelite who, since the days of Josephus, wrote the history of God's ancient people, was born in Bernburg, Feb. 22, 1793, of very poor Jewish parents. At the tender age of five, he, being the only brother of eleven sisters, had to become the guide of his blind father, a duty which he performed for five years with the utmost filial affection; and when his father died in 1803, Jost came to Wolfenbüttel, where his grandfather lived, and where he was received into Samson's Institute. Here he spent four years (1803-1807) studying Hebrew and the Talmud under great deprivations and sufferings. A new epoch, however, commenced in the studies of Jost when this institution was entrusted to the management of Ehrenberg, towards the end of 1807. It was then that Jost, at the age of thirteen, was for the first time properly instructed in German, which was his mother tongue, and that his unquenchable desire to learn other languages was kindled. Favoured with the friendship of a fellow-inmate alike poor and thirsting for knowledge, and that no less a youth than Leopold Zunz, Jost and his friend eagerly prosecuted their studies during the winter of 1808-1809 labouring to acquire as much of Latin and Greek as would fit them for entering the Gymnasium. 'Whole nights,' he touchingly records, 'have we laboured by the tapers which we made ourselves from the wax that ran down the big wax candles in the synagogue. By hard study we succeeded in bringing it so far in the course of the six months terminating with April 1809, that we, Zunz in Wolfenbüttel, and I in Brunswick, were put in the senior class in the Gymnasium.' Jost remained in the Gymnasium at Brunswick till 1813, acquiring a wonderful knowledge of Latin and Greek, as well as of some modern languages, during these four years, and then went to the University at Göttingen, where he most diligently devoted himself in 1814-1816 to the study of history, philology, philosophy, and theology. In 1816, at the age of twenty-three, he undertook the management of a civil and commercial school at Berlin, which consisted of both Jewish and Christian youths, and to which he continued to devote his energies till 1833, though all the Christian students were ordered, by a ministerial decree, to leave it in 1819. It was here, during his seventeen years attending to the school, that he published—(1) his gigantic historical work, entitled, Geschichte der Israeliten seit der Zeit der Maccabäer bis auf unsere Tage, 9 vols., Berlin 1820-1828; (2) Allgemeine Geschichte des Israelitischen Volkes, etc., 2 vols., Berlin 1831-1832, being an abridgment, with corrections of the former work; and (3) ששה סדרי משנה, the Mishna, with the Hebrew text and vowel points, accompanied by a German translation, a rabbinic commentary and German annotations, 6 vols., Berlin 1832-1834. His literary fame, as well as the great ability he displayed in the management of the school at Berlin, made the directors of the Jewish High School at Frankfort-on-the-Maine offer to him the office of headmaster, which he accepted in 1835, and held to the end of his life. Whilst discharging his scholastic duties Jost vigorously prosecuted his literary researches, and started in 1839, (4) Israelitische Annalen, a weekly journal for Jewish history, literature, etc., of which appeared three volumes, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1839-1841. It is not too much to say that, in this journal, to which some of the greatest Jewish literati contributed, the student of Biblical exegesis, Hebrew grammar, or of Jewish antiquities and history, will find materials which he will rarely meet with elsewhere, as may be seen from the frequent references to it in this Cyclopædia. The same year in which this journal was discontinued, Jost, in conjunction with Creizenach, started (5) a Hebrew periodical, of which appeared two volumes, entitled, פנח, Ephemerides hebraicae s. collectio dissertationum maxime theologiarum, variorumque hebraicorum scriptorum, ad ordinem mensium lunarium disposita, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1841-1842. This, like the former journal, is a very important contribution to Biblical and Jewish literature, and will always be read with great pleasure by the lover of the sacred language, owing to the beautiful Hebrew style in which it is written. All this time, however, Jost was labouring at his grand history of the Jews, of which he published (6), in 1846-1847, three more parts, under the title Neuere Geschichte der Israeliten, etc., being a continuation, and forming a tenth volume, of his great historical work; and in 1857-1859 he embodied all his historical and critical researches, in which he was engaged the whole of his life, in (7) the Geschichte des Judenthums und seiner Secten, published in three volumes by the Institut zur Förderung der Israelitischen Literatur, in Leipzig. This work is a cyclopædia of Jewish history and Biblical literature, containing the ripest scholarship of the 19th century. It would be impossible to catalogue the numberless articles which Jost contributed to various periodicals, all bearing more or less upon the history of the Jews, and upon Scriptural subjects; some of them are frequently referred to in this Cyclopædia. After enriching the world for upwards of forty years from his abundant stores of sacred literature, this noble descendant of Abraham died November 20, 1860, in his sixty-seventh year.—C. D. G.

JOT AND TITTLE. The force of these expressions, which are used figuratively in Scripture (Matt. v. 18; Luke xvi. 17) to represent the minutest part, will be seen when their form and proverbial use among the rabbins are described. Iod, or Yod, which is the proper meaning of יוֹדָה, being the smallest letter in the Hebrew alphabet (י), is constantly used in the rabbinical writings to denote the smallest, or the most insignificant thing. Thus, the conscious insignificance, and yet the importance, of this small letter י, is beautifully described in one of the Midrashic parables as follows:—'R. Josua b. Karchah said the Iod which God took from the name Sarah was divided [into two Hes], one ה was left for Sarah (שרה), and the other was given to Abram (אברם), when his name was changed into Abraham (אברהם). R. Simon b. Jachai remarked, the Iod, which was thus divided from the name Sarai, complained before the throne of God, saying: Lord of the universe, is it because that I am the smallest of all the letters (סמני קטנות) that thou hast taken me away from the name of the righteous woman? Whereupon the Lord said, hitherto thou hast been in the name of a woman, and wast the last of the letters (שרי), now thou shalt be in the name of a man, and be the first of the letters. This is it which is written, that Moses called Hosea (הושע) Joshua (יהושע), Num. xiii. 16), putting the Iod before it' (comp. Mi- rash Rabba and Jalkut on Gen. xvii. 5). The figurative use of the letter Iod to express that which is small, may also be seen from the fact, that a small city was called Iod, because this is the smallest letter of the alphabet (עיר ששמה י' (ר) comp. Rashi on Taanith 21, b), and from the phrase, 'I saw a city come forth from a Iod' (יוד קרת קא) Kiddushin 16, b). Still more insignificant is the tittle kepalā, or the different ornaments of the letters, called in the Talmud כתרין, and זיונים, and תנין, and קוצים, inasmuch as these ornaments are smaller even than the י', and form no essential part of the letter, which is complete without them. Much stress, however, has been laid upon these ornaments from time immemorial, and the Talmud specifies seven letters, each of which must be ornamented on the top with these זיונים. To shew what these ornaments are, and that they form no part of the letters, we shall give these seven letters, both ornamented and without the ornaments.

ש ע ט נ ז נ ז

Other letters again have the תנינים, and Maimonides gives every word which is to be written with this ornament in the four passages of the Pentateuch to be enclosed in the phylacteries [PHYLACTERY], of which the following is a specimen—והיו ל' וטפות. Now, from this it will be seen that the meaning of our Saviour in Matt. v. 18 and Luke xvi. 17 is, that not only shall the י', the smallest letter of the alphabet, not fail to fulfil its design in the word of God, but even the ornament, this insignificant stroke, which is smaller still both in size and purpose than the י', shall not pass away. A striking illustration of this phrase is given in one of the Talmudic allegories, which is as follows:—Once upon a time the Book of Deuteronomy fell down before the throne of God, and bitterly exclaimed, O Lord of the universe, thou hast laid down in me thy Law, but remember, that if the least thing is altered therein, the whole of it must fall. Now King Solomon labours to expunge the letter י', for it is written, לא ירבה לו נשים, he shall not multiply wives to himself (Deut. xvii. 17), as by the omission of the י' the prohibition ceases. Whereupon the Lord answered, Solomon, and thousands like him, shall perish, but not even the tittle or ornament of the Iod shall pass away from the Law (וקצו של יוד אינו) Jerusalem Sanhedrin 20, b). This passage renders it unnecessary to refute the opinion that kepaia are the little turns of the strokes, the points or the corners of letters by which one letter differs from another similar to it, which is advanced by Origen (comp. Ps. xxxiii.), τῶν στοιχείων παρ' ἑβραίοις, λέγω δὲ τοῦ χάφ καὶ τοῦ βῆθ (כ and ב), πολλὰν ομοιότητα σωζόντων, ὡς κατὰ μηδὲν ἀλλήλων διαλλάττειν ἢ βραχεία κεφαλα μόνη, and has been espoused by almost all modern critics. Comp. Menachoth 29, b; Maimonides, Iod Ha-Chesaka Hilchoth Tefillin, section ii. 8-10; Hilchoth Sepher Torah, section vii.—C. D. G.

JOTAPATA, a fortress in Galilee, in which Josephus, by whom it had been strongly fortified, resisted for a considerable time the assault of the Romans under Vespasian, but was ultimately defeated and taken prisoner (De Bell. Jud. ii. 20, 6; iii. 6. 7; Vita, sec. 37). Josephus describes it as situated on a precipitous rock of great height, and accessible only on the northern side, and as so surrounded by mountains that it cannot be described until it is actually approached (Bell. Jud. iii. 7. 7). It has been identified with Jefat, 'a high round tell perfectly regular and isolated, except that it is connected with the northern hills by a low ridge or neck' (Robinson, Lat. Bib. Res., p. 105). It is shut in by mountains, and lies to the N.E. of Kaukab and about ten miles to the N.W. of Nazareth, in long. 35° 15' E., lat. 32° 52' N. It is the נופתתא, Gopatata, of the Talmud (Reland, Pal. 816, 867). [JIPHTAH-EL].—W. L. A.

JOTBAH (יֹטְבָה; Sept. Iereβα; 'Alex. Ieraxδλ), the residence of Haruz, the father of Meshullemeth, queen of Manasseh, and mother of Amon, king of Judah (2 Kings xxi. 19). Josephus calls it Iabáth (Antiq. x. 3. 2). It is probably the same place as the following.

JOTBATH, OR JOTBATHAH (יֹטְבָתָה; Sept. Ereβathā; Alex. Iereβathán), one of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 33; Deut. x. 7). In the latter passage it is described as 'a land of rivers of waters,' i.e., of gorges or defiles, through which brooks flowed. On the western side of the Arabah there are several spots where the Wadys converge, and one of these is probably the locality indicated.—W. L. A.

JOTHAM (יֹתָם, Jehovah is upright; Sept. Iwáθam). 1. The youngest of Gideon's seventy legitimate sons; and the only one who escaped when the rest were massacred by the order of Abimelech. When the fratricide was made king by the people of Shechem, the young Jotham was so daring as to make his appearance on Mount Gerizim for the purpose of lifting up a protesting voice, and of giving vent to his feelings. This he did in a beautiful parable, wherein the trees are represented as making choice of a king, and bestowing on the bramble the honour which the cedar, the olive, and the vine would not accept. The obvious application, which indeed Jotham failed not himself to point out, must have been highly exasperating to Abimelech and his friends; but the speaker, as soon as he had delivered his parable, fled to the town of Beer, and remained there out of his brother's reach. We hear no more of him; but three years after, if then living, he saw the accomplishment of the malediction he had pronounced (Judg. ix. 5-21).

2. The tenth king of Judah, and son of Uzziah, whom he succeeded in B.C. 758, at the age of twenty-five; he reigned sixteen years. His father having during his last years been excluded by leprosy from public life [UZZIAH], the government was administered by his son. Jotham profited by the experience which the reign of his father, and of the kings who preceded him, afforded, and he ruled in the fear of God, although he was unable to correct all the corrupt practices into which the people had fallen. His sincere intentions were rewarded with a prosperous reign. He was successful in his wars. The Ammonites, who had 'given gifts' as a sort of tribute to Uzziah, but had ceased to do so after his leprosy had incapacitated him from governing, were constrained by Jotham to pay for three years a heavy tribute in silver, wheat, and barley (2 Chron. xxvi. 8; xxvii. 5, 6). Many important public works were also undertaken and accomplished by Jotham. The principal gate of the temple was rebuilt by him on a more magnificent scale; the quarter of Ophel, in Jerusalem, was strengthened by new fortifications; various towns were built or rebuilt in the mountains of Judah; and castles and towers of defence were erected in the wilderness. Jotham died greatly lamented by his people, and was buried in the sepulchre of the kings (2 Kings xv. 38; 2 Chron. xxvii. 7-9).—J. K.

JOZABAD, OR JOSABAD (יֹזָבָד; Sept. Ἰωζαβὰδ; Alex. Ἰωζαβδδ). 1. The Gederathite, one of the mighty men who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4). 2, 3. Two captains of the thousands of Manasseh who went over to David at Ziklag, and aided him to repress the bands of brigands or marauders in the wilderness (1 Chron. xii. 20). The LXX. distinguish the latter of these by calling him Ἰωζαβὰθ, Alex. Ἰωζαβδδ. 4. An overseer, under Cononiah and Shimei, of the chambers in which were deposited the tithes and other offerings collected by order of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13). 5. A chief of the Levites who took part in the preparations for the Passover celebrated by Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 9). The recurrence of the same names here, or in xxxi. 12-15, and the frequent recurrence through the history of the same names, has led to the suggestion that these are not so much personal names as names of Levitical or priestly families (Bertheau, Exeg. Hdb. in loc.) This may account for a double name so frequently occurring for the same person. 6. The son of Jeshua, a Levite who assisted at the weighing of the precious materials belonging to the temple-service which were brought back from Babylon (Ezra viii. 33). In 1 Esdras viii. 63 he is called Josabad (Ἰωσαβδδ; Alex. Ἰωσαβδδς). 7. One of the sons of Pashur, a priest who had married a strange woman after the return from Babylon (Ezra x. 22). In 1 Esdras ix. 22 he is called Ὀυδδῆλος (A. V. Ocidelus). 8. A Levite who had also married a strange woman (Ezra x. 23). He is called Ἰωζαβδδς in 1 Esdras ix. 23, and is probably the person mentioned, Neh. viii. 7, as one of those who interpreted to the people the reading of the law, and, xi. 16, as presiding over the outward work of the temple; perhaps also the same as No. 6, though this is doubtful.—W. L. A.

JOZACHAR (יֹזָכָר; Sept. Ἰεζαχαρ; Alex. Ἰωζαχαρ), one of the two conspirators by whom Joash, king of Judah, was slain (2 Kings xii. 21). In the parallel passage in 2 Chron. (xxiv. 26) he is called Zobad, which is probably a clerical error, the omission of the י being accounted for by preceding it, and the י and כ being confounded with ז and ב. Jozachar was the son of an Ammonite.—†

JUBAL (יובל, jubilum, i.e., music; Sept. Ἰουβὰλ), one of Cain's descendants, son of Lamech and Adah. He is described as the inventor of the כנור, kinnor, and the עוגב, ugab, rendered in our version 'the harp and the organ,' but perhaps more properly 'the lyre and mouth-organ,' or Pandean pipe (Gen. iv. 21). [MUSIC.]—J. K.

JUBILEE, THE YEAR OF (שַׁנַּת הַיּוֹבֵל, or simply יובל, and שַׁנַּת דְּרוֹר; Sept. ἔτος τῆς ἀφέσεως, ἀφέσις; Vulg. annus jubilei, or jubilus), the half centennial festival, the institution of which is contained in Lev. xxv. 8-16, 23-55; xxvii. 16-25.

1. Name and its signification.—The etymology of this word is greatly disputed. According to the reputed Targum of Jonathan* on Josh. vi. 5-9, the Talmud (Rosh Ha-Shana 26, a), Rashi, Ibn Ezra (on Exod. xix. 13), Kimchi (on Josh. v. 6, and Lex. s. v.), Parchon (Lex. s. v.), etc., יובל primarily signifies a ram,† then metonymically stands for קַרְן הַיּוֹבֵל, the horn of a ram (comp. Exod. xix. 13 with Josh. vi. 5), and, like the Latin buccina, denotes also the sound produced by the horn. Thus the name שַׁנַּת יוֹבֵל, the year of blowing the horn, exactly corresponds to יוֹם הַתְּרוּעָה, the day of blowing the horn, the appellation given to the feast of the New Year (Num. xxix. 1), and, like it, is given to this festival, because it is announced by the blast of the horn (עַל שֵׁם תְּקִיעָה, שׁוֹפָר, Rashi). Luther has therefore rightly translated it Halljahr. According to another ancient interpretation, יובל is from יבַל, to emit, to liberate, and, like דְּרוֹר, is primarily used as a concrete for one who is at liberty, and then, like דְּרוֹר, is used abstractly for freedom, liberty (comp. Hitzig on Jer. xxxiv. 8). This suits Lev. xxv. 10, and is given by the Sept. (ἀφείσις), Joseph. (Antiq. iii. 12. 3), Ibn Ezra on Lev. xxv. 13, etc. Others,

* Kalisch's assertion (Historical and Critical Commentary on Exodus, p. 335) that Onkelos takes יובל to mean ram (דְּרֹבָא), is incorrect, as this paraphrast simply renders it by שׁוֹפָר (comp. Onkelos on Exod. xix. 13); it is the reputed Targum of Jonathan which has דְּרֹבָא שְׁפִירָא for the Hebrew שׁוֹפֹרֶת הַיּוֹבֵל (comp. Josh. vi. 5, etc.).

† When Mr. S. Clark, the writer of the article JUBILEE in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, contemptuously rejects this explanation on the supposition that it took its origin 'from the strange nonsense which some of the rabbis in early times began to talk respecting the ram which was sacrificed in the place of Isaac,' and states that 'R. Akiba, to connect this with the jubilee, affirms that יובל is the Arabic for a ram,' we can only say that this explanation has not derived its source from this Hagadic legend, but, on the contrary, that the legend was suggested by it; that R. Akiba, in his remark, 'In going to Arabia I found that they called a ram jubla' אֲמַר רַבִּי יוֹבֵל, does not at all attempt to connect it with the jubilee, since this 'strange nonsense' is not even mentioned in the discussion in the Talmud, as may be seen by a reference to the passage in Rosh Ha-Shana 26, a; that no less an authority than Fürst most unhesitatingly affirms that יובל does mean ram, though he does not derive the name of the festival in question from this sense of the word (comp. Lex. s. v.); and that even Ewald does not treat this explanation with contempt (comp. Die Alterthümer d. Volkes Israel, 1854, p. 417, note).

again, regard יבל as onomatopoetic, like the Latin jubilare, denoting to be jubilant, so the Vulg., Gesenius (Lex. s. v.), etc. Whilst most modern critics derive יבל from יבל, to flow impetuously, and hence assign to it the meaning of the loud or impetuous sound, streaming forth from the trumpet, and proclaiming this festival. This idea, though obtained in a different way, is the same as the traditional one which we have given first. It is also called שנת דרור, the year of freedom (Ezek. xlvi. 17), because every slave was set at liberty at jubilee, and freely returned to his family and the patrimony of his father (comp. Lev. xxv. 10).

2. The laws connected with this festival.—The laws respecting the jubilee embrace the following three main enactments—(1.) Rest for the soil; (2.) Reversion of landed property to its original owner, who had been driven by poverty to sell it; and (3.) Manumission of those Israelites who through poverty or otherwise had become slaves.

The first enactment, which is comprised in Lev. xxv. 11, 12, enjoins that, as on the Sabbatical year, the soil is to be at rest, and that there should be no tillage nor harvest during the jubilee year. The Israelites, however, were permitted to fetch the spontaneous produce of the field for their immediate wants (מן השדה תאכלו את תבואתה), but not to lay it up in their storehouses.

The second enactment, which refers to the reversion of landed property, is comprised in Lev. xxv. 13-34; xxvii. 16-24. The Mosaic law enacted that the promised land should be divided by lots, in equal parts, among the Israelites, and that the plot which should thus come into the possession of each family was to be absolutely inalienable, and for ever continue to be the property of the descendants of the original possessor. When a proprietor, therefore, being pressed by poverty, had to dispose of a field, no one could buy it of him for a longer period than up to the time of the next jubilee, when it reverted to the original possessor, or to his family. Hence the sale, properly speaking, was not of the land, but of the produce of so many years, and the price was fixed according to the number of years (שני תבואת) up to the next jubilee, so as to prevent any injustice being done to those who were compelled by circumstances to part temporarily with their land (Lev. xxv. 15, 16). The lessee, however, according to Josephus, could claim some compensation if he had great outlays on the field just before he was required by the law of jubilee to return it to its owner (comp. Antiq. iii. 12. 3). But even before the jubilee year the original proprietor could recover his field, if either his own circumstances improved, or if his next of kin (נאול) could redeem it for him by paying back according to the same price which regulated the purchase (Lev. xxv. 26, 27). In the interests of the purchaser, however, the Rabbinical law enacted that this redemption should not take place before he had the benefit of the field for two productive years (so the Rabbins understood שני תבואת, exclusive of a Sabbatical year, a year of barrenness, and of the first harvest, if he happened to buy the plot of land shortly before the seventh month, i. e., with the ripe fruit (Erachin, ix. 1; Maimonides, Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Jobel, xi. 10-13). As poverty is the only reason which the law supposes might lead one to part with his field, the Rabbins enacted that it was not allowable for any one to sell his patrimony on speculation (comp. Maimonides, Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Jobel, xi. 3). Though nothing is here said about fields which were given away by the proprietors, yet there can be no doubt, as Maimonides says (Ibid., xi. 10), that the same law is intended to apply to gifts (comp. Ezek. xlvi. 17), but not to those plots of land which came into a man's possession through marriage with an heiress (comp. Num. xxxvi. 4-9; Mishna Berachoth, viii. 10). Neither did this law apply to a house in a walled city. Still the seller had the privilege to redeem it at any time within a full year from the day of the sale. After the year it became the absolute property of the purchaser (Lev. xxv. 29, 30*). As this law required a more minute definition for practical purposes, the Rabbins determined that this right of redemption might be exercised from the very first day of the sale to the last day which made up the year. Moreover, as the purchaser sometimes concealed himself towards the end of the year, in order to prevent the seller from redeeming his house, it was enacted, that the original proprietor should hand over the redemption-money to the powers that be when the purchaser could not be found, break open the doors, and take possession of the house; and, if the purchaser died during the year, the original proprietor could redeem it from the heir (comp. Mishna Erachin, ix. 3, 4; Maimonides, Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Jobel, xii. 1-7). Open places, however, which are not surrounded by walls, belong to landed property, and, like the cultivated land on which they stand, are subject to the law of jubilee, and must revert to their original proprietors (Lev. xxv. 31). But although houses in open places are thus treated like fields, yet, according to the Rabbinic definition, the reverse is not to be the case, i. e., fields or other places not built upon in walled cities are not to be treated as cities, but come under the jubilee law of fields (comp. Erachin, ix. 5). The houses of the Levites, in the forty-eight cities given to them (comp. Num. xxxv. 1-8), were exempt from this general law of house property. Having the same value to the Levites as landed property had to the other tribes, these houses were subject to the jubilee law for fields, and could at any time be redeemed (comp. Lev. xxv. 32; Erachin ix. 8), so that, even if a Levite redeemed the house which his brother Le-

* There is an apparent contradiction in the original Hebrew between verses 29 and 30—for in the former the house is described as being in a walled city (עיר חומה), whilst in the latter it is spoken of as being in a city without a wall (עיר). But this has evidently arisen from a confusion of the relative pronoun הוּ with its homonym הֵן, the negative particle, of which there are many instances (comp. Exod. xxi. 8; Lev. xi. 21; and the article KERI of this Cyclopaedia). The Keri, or the marginal reading, has therefore given the right reading, which is also to be found in the Sept., Chaldee, etc., etc. Some of the Rabbins, however, defend the textual reading, and say that it speaks of cities which had no walls prior to Joshua's conquering the land, but which were walled round afterwards (comp. Rashi on Lev. xxv. 30, 31; Maimonides, Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Jobel, xii. 15).

vite was obliged to sell through poverty, the general law of house property is not to obtain, even among the Levites themselves, but they are obliged to treat each other according to the law of landed property. Thus, for instance, the house of A, which he, out of poverty, was obliged to sell to the non-Levite B, and was redeemed from him by a Levite C, reverts in the jubilee year from C to the original Levitical proprietor A. This seems to be the most probable meaning of the enactment contained in Lev. xxv. 33, and it does not necessitate us to insert into the text the negative particle לֹא before יָשָׁב, as is done by the Vulgate, Houbigant, Ewald (Allerthümer, p. 421), Knobel, etc., nor need we, with Rashi, Ibn Ezra, etc., take יָשָׁב in the unnatural sense of buying. The lands in the suburbs of their cities the Levites were not permitted to part with under any condition, and therefore did not come under the law of jubilee (Ibid., ver. 34). The only exception to this general law were the houses and the fields consecrated to the Lord, or to the support of the sanctuary. If these were not redeemed before the ensuing jubilee, instead of reverting to their original proprietors they at the jubilee became forever the property of the priests (Lev. xxvii. 20, 21). The conditions, however, on which consecrated property could be redeemed were as follows: A house thus devoted to the Lord was valued by the priest, and the donor who wished to redeem it had to pay one-fifth in addition to this fixed value (Lev. xxvii. 14, 15). And a field was valued according to the number of homers of barley which could be sown thereon, at the rate of fifty silver shekels of the sanctuary for each homer for the whole fifty years, deducting from it a proportionate amount for the lapse of each year (Lev. xxvii. 16-18). According to the Talmud the fiftieth year was not counted. Hence, if any one wished to redeem his field, he had to pay one-fifth in addition to the regular rate of a se'la (shekel), and a pundium = 1-48th se'la, per annum, for every homer, the surplus pundium being intended for the forty-ninth year. No one was therefore allowed to sanctify his field during the year which immediately preceded the jubilee, for he would then have to pay for the whole forty-nine years, because months could not be deducted from the sanctuary, and the jubilee year itself was not counted (Mishna Erachin, vii. 1). If one sanctified a field which he had purchased, i. e., not freehold property, it reverted to the original proprietor in the year of jubilee (Lev. xxvii. 22-24).

The third enactment relates to the manumission of those Israelites who had become slaves, and is comprised in Lev. xxv. 39-54. All Israelites who through poverty had sold themselves as slaves to their fellow Israelites or to the foreigners resident among them, and who, up to the time of the jubilee, had neither completed their six years of servitude, nor redeemed themselves, nor been redeemed by their relatives, were to be set free in the jubilee, to return with their children to their family and to the patrimony of their fathers. Great difficulty has been experienced in reconciling the injunction here, that in the jubilee all slaves are to regain their freedom, with Exod. xxv. 6, where it is enacted, that those bondmen who refuse their liberty at the expiration of the appointed six years' servitude, and submit to the boring of their ears, are to be slaves for ever (עַבְדוֹ לְעֹלָם). Josephus (Antiq. iv. 8. 28), the Mishna (Kidushin, i. 3); and Talmud (Ibid. 14, 15), Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Maimonides (Hilchoth Avadim, iii. 6), and most Jewish interpreters, who are followed by Ainsworth, Bp. Patrick, and other Christian commentators, take לְעֹלָם to denote till the jubilee, maintaining that the slaves who submitted to have their ears bored are included in this general manumission, and thus try to escape the difficulty. But against this is to be urged, that, 1. The phrase עַבְדוֹ לְעֹלָם is used in Lev. xxv. 46 for perpetual servitude, which is unaffected by the year of jubilee. 2. The declaration of the slave that he will not have his freedom, in Exod. xxi. 5, unquestionably shews that perpetual slavery is meant. 3. Servitude till the year of jubilee is not at all spoken of in Lev. xxv. 40-42 as something contemptible, and could therefore not be the punishment designed for him who refused his freedom, especially if the year of jubilee happened to occur two or three years after refusing his freedom; and that it is bondage beyond that time which is characterised as real slavery; and 4. The jubilee, without any indication whatever from the lawgiver, is here, according to this explanation, made to give the slave the right to take with him the maid and the children who are the property of the master—the very right which had previously been denied to him. Ewald therefore (Allerthümer, p. 421), and others, conclude that the two enactments belong to different periods, the manumission of slaves in the year of jubilee having been instituted when the law enjoining the liberation of slaves at the expiration of six years had become obsolete; whilst Knobel (Comment. on Exod. xxi. 6) regards this jubilee law and the enactments in Exod. xxi. 5, 6, as representing one of the many contradictions which exist between the Jehovistic and Elohist portions of the Pentateuch. All the difficulties, however, disappear, when the jubilee manumission enactment is regarded as designed to supplement the law in Exod. xxi. 2-6. In the latter case the regular period of servitude is fixed, at the expiration of which the bondman is ordinarily to become free, whilst Lev. xxv. 39-54 institutes an additional and extraordinary period, when those slaves who had not as yet completed their appointed six years of servitude, at the time of jubilee, or had not forfeited their right of free citizenship by spontaneously submitting to the yoke of bondage, and becoming slaves for ever (עַבְדוֹ לְעֹלָם), are once in every fifty years to obtain their freedom. The one enactment refers to the freedom of each individual at different days, weeks, months, and years, inasmuch as hardly any twenty of them entered on their servitude at exactly the same time, whilst the other legislates for a general manumission, which is to take place at exactly the same time. The enactment in Lev. xxv. 39-54, therefore, takes for granted the law in Exod. xxi. 2-6, and begins where the latter ends, and does not mention it because it simply treats on the influence of jubilee upon slavery.

That there must also have been a perfect remission of debts in the year of jubilee is self-evident, for it is implied in the fact that all persons who were in bondage for debt, as well as all the landed property of debtors, were freely returned. Whether debts generally, for which there were no such pledges, were remitted, is a matter of dispute.

Josephus positively declares that they were (Antiq. xiii. 2. 3), whilst Maimonides (Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Jobel, x. 16) as positively denies it.*

3. The time and manner in which the jubilee was celebrated.—According to Lev. xxv. 8-11, it is evident that 49 years are to be counted, and that at the end thereof the fiftieth year is to be celebrated as the jubilee. Hence the jubilee is to follow immediately upon the Sabbatic year, so that there are to be two successive fallow years. This is also corroborated by ver. 21, where it is promised that the produce of the sixth year shall suffice for three years, i. e., 49, 50, and 51, or the two former years, which are the Sabbatic year and the jubilee, and the immediately following year, in which the ordinary produce of the preceding year would be wanting. Moreover, from the remark in ver. 22, it would appear that the Sabbatic year, like the jubilee, began in the autumn, or the month of Tishri, which commenced the civil year [YEAR; SABBATIC YEAR], when it was customary to begin sowing for the ensuing year. At all events, ver. 9 distinctly says, that the jubilee is to be proclaimed by the blast of the trumpet 'on the tenth of the seventh month, on the day of atonement,' which is Tishri [ATONEMENT, DAY OF; FESTIVALS]. The opinion that the Sabbatic year and the jubilee were distinct, or that there were two fallow years, is also entertained by the Talmud (Rosh Ha-Shana, 8 b, 9 a); Philo (On the Decalogue, xxx.); Josephus, and many other ancient writers. It must, however, be borne in mind, that though there was to be no sowing, nor any regular harvest, during these two years, yet the Israelites were allowed to fetch from the fields whatever they wanted (Lev. xxv. 12). That the fields did yield a crop in their second fallow year is most unquestionably presupposed by the prophet Isaiah (xxxvii. 30). Palestine was, at all events, not less fruitful than Albania, in which Strabo tells us (lib. xi. c. iv. sec. 3), 'the ground that has been sowed once produces in many places two or three crops, the fruit of which is even fifty-fold.' It must however be remarked, that many, from a very early period down to the present day, have taken the jubilee year to be identical with the seventh Sabbatic year. Thus the Book of Jubilees, which dates prior to the Christian era [JUBILEES, BOOK OF], divides the Biblical history from the creation to the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan into fifty jubilees of forty-nine years each, which shews that this view of the jubilee must have been pretty general in those days. Some Rabbins in the Talmud (Erachin, 12 b, with 33 a), as well as many Christian writers (Scaliger, Petavius, Usher, Cunæus, Calvinius, Gatterer, Frank, Schroeder, Hug, Rosenmüller), support the same view. As to the remark, 'ye shall hallow the fiftieth year' (ver. 10), 'a jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you' (ver. 11), it is urged that this is in accordance with a mode of speech which is common to all languages and ages. Thus, we call a week eight days, including both Sundays, and the best classical writers called an olympiad by the name of quinquennium, though it only contained four entire years. Moreover, the sacred number seven, or the Sabbatic idea, which underlies all the festivals, and connects them into one chain, the last link of which is the jubilee, corroborates this view, inasmuch as we have—1. A Sabbath of days; 2. A Sabbath of weeks (the seventh week after the passover being the Sabbath week, as the first day of it is the festival of weeks); 3. A Sabbath of months (inasmuch as the seventh month has both a festival and a fast, and with its first day begins the civil year); 4. A Sabbath of years (the seventh year is the Sabbatic year); and 5. A Sabbath of Sabbaths, inasmuch as the seventh Sabbatic year is the jubilee.

As the observance of the jubilee, like that of the Sabbatical year, was only to become obligatory when the Israelites had taken possession of the promised land, and cultivated the land for that period of years, at the conclusion of which the festival was to be celebrated, the ancient tradition preserved in the Talmud seems to be correct, that the first Sabbatical year was in the one-and-twentieth, and the first jubilee in the sixty-fourth, year after the Jews came into Canaan, for it took them seven years to conquer it, and seven years more to distribute it (Erachin, xii. 6; Maimonides, Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Jobel, x. 2). The Bible says nothing about the manner in which the jubilee is to be celebrated, except that it should be proclaimed by the blast of a trumpet. As in many other cases, the lawgiver leaves the practical application of this law, and the necessarily complicated arrangements connected therewith, to the elders of Israel. Now tradition tells us that the trumpets used on this occasion, like those of the feast of trumpets, or new year, were of rams' horns, straight, and had their mouth-piece covered with gold (Mishna Rosh Ha-Shana, iii. 2; Maimonides, Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Jobel, x. 11), that every Israelite blew nine blasts so as to make the trumpet literally 'sound throughout the land' (Lev. xxv. 9); and that 'from the feast of trumpets, or new year [i. e., Tishri 1], till the day of atonement [i. e., Tishri 10], the slaves were neither manumitted to return to their homes nor made use of by their masters, but ate, drank, and rejoiced, and wore garlands on their heads; and when the day of atonement came the judges blew the trumpet, the slaves were manumitted to go to their homes, and the fields were set free' (Rosh Ha-Shana, 8 b; Maimonides, Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Jobel, x. 14). Though the Jews, from the nature of the case, cannot now celebrate the jubilee, yet on the evening of the day of atonement, the conclusion of the fast is announced in all the synagogues to the present day by the blast of the Shophar = horn, which, according to the rabbins, is intended to commemorate the ancient jubilee proclamation (Orach Chajim, cap. DCXXIII. sec. 6, note).

Because the Bible does not record any particular instance of the public celebration of this festival, Michaelis, Winer, etc., have questioned whether the law of jubilee ever came into actual operation; whilst Kranold, Hupfeld, etc., have positively denied it. The following considerations, however, speak for its actual observance:—1. All the other Mosaic festivals have been observed, and it is therefore surpassing strange to suppose that the jubilee which is so organically connected with them, and is the climax of all of them, is the only one that never was observed; 2. The law about the inalienability of landed property, which was to be the result of the jubilee, actually obtained among the Jews, thus shewing that this festival must have been observed. Hence it was with a view of observing the jubilee law that the right of an heiress to marry was restricted (Num. xxxvii. 4, 6, 7); and it was the observance of this law, forbidding the sale of land in such a manner as shall prevent its reversion to the original owner or his heir in the year of jubilee, that made Naboth refuse to part with his vineyard on the solicitation of King Ahab (1 Kings xxi. 1-4). 3. From Ezek. xlvii. 17, where even the king is reminded that if he made a present of his landed property to any of his servants it could only be to the jubilee year, when it must revert to him, it is evident that the jubilee was observed. Allusions to the jubilee are also to be found in Is. lxi. 1, 2; Neh. v. 1-19. 4. This observance of the jubilee is attested by the unanimous voice of Jewish tradition. This unanimity of opinion, however, only extends to the observance of the jubilee prior to the Babylonish captivity, for many of the later rabbins affirm that it was not kept after the captivity. But in the Seder Olam (cap. xxx.), the author of which lived shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem, we are positively assured that it was observed. Josephus too (Antiq. iii. 12, sec. 3) speaks of it as being permanently observed. This is, moreover, confirmed by Diodorus Siculus (lib. xl.), who tell us that the Jews cannot dispose of their own patrimony ἰδιού κλήρου πωλεῖν, as well as by the fact that we have distinct records of the law respecting the redemption of houses in cities without walls, which forms an integral part of the jubilee law, being strictly observed to a very late period (Erachin, 31 b; Baba Kama, 82 b).

* Mr. Clark (Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, s. v. JUBILEE) is mistaken in saying that the Mishna, Shebiith, cap. x., is of the same opinion, viz., 'that the remission of debts was a point of distinction between the Sabbatical year and the jubilee.' The Mishna in the passage referred to does not even mention the name jubilee.

4. Design and importance of the Jubilee.—The design of this institution is that those of the people of God who, through poverty or other adverse circumstances, had forfeited their personal liberty or property to their fellow-brethren, should have their debts forgiven by their co-religionists every half century, on the great day of atonement, and be restored to their families and inheritance as freely and fully as God on that very day forgave the debts of his people and restored them to perfect fellowship with himself, so that the whole community, having forgiven each other and being forgiven by God, might return to the original order which had been disturbed in the lapse of time, and being freed from the bondage of one another might unreservedly be the servants of him who is their redeemer. The aim of the jubilee, therefore, is to preserve unimpaired the essential character of the theocracy, to the end that there be no poor among the people of God (Deut. xv. 4). Hence God, who redeemed Israel from the bondage of Egypt to be his peculiar people, and allotted to them the promised land, will not suffer any one to usurp his title as Lord over those whom he owns as his own. It is the idea of grace for all the suffering children of man, bringing freedom to the captive and rest to the weary as well as to the earth, which made the year of jubilee the symbol of the Messianic year of grace (שנת רצון ליהוה). Is. lxi. 2), when all the conflicts in the universe shall be restored to their original harmony, and when not only we, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, but the whole creation, which groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, shall be restored into the glorious liberty of the sons of God (comp. Is. lxi. 1-3; Luke iv. 21; Rom. viii. 18-23; Heb. iv. 9).

The importance of this institution will be apparent if it is considered what moral and social advantages would accrue to the community from the sacred observance of it. 1. It would prevent the accumulation of land on the part of a few to the detriment of the community at large. 2. It would render it impossible for any one to be born to absolute poverty, since every one had his hereditary land. 3. It would preclude those inequalities which are produced by extremes of riches and poverty, and which make one man domineer over another. 4. It would utterly do away with slavery. 5. It would afford a fresh opportunity to those who were reduced by adverse circumstances to begin again their career of industry, in the patrimony which they had temporarily forfeited. 6. It would periodically rectify the disorders which crept into the state in the course of time, preclude the division of the people into nobles and plebeians, and preserve the theocracy inviolate.

5. Literature.—The Mishna, Erachin, ch. viii. ix., gives very important enactments of a very ancient date respecting the jubilee. In Maimonides, Iod Ha-Chesaku, Hilchoth Shmita Ve-Yobel, ch. x. xiii., an epitome will be found of the Jewish information on this subject, which is scattered through the Talmud and Midrashim. Of the modern productions are to be mentioned the valuable treatises of Cunæus, De Rep. Hebr., ch. 2, sec. iv., in the Critici Sacri, vol. ix., p. 278, sq.; and Meyer, De Tempor. et Diebus Hebræorum, 1755, p. 341-360; Carpov, Apparatus Historico-Criticus, p. 447, sq.; Michaelis, Commentaries on the Laws of Moses, English version, London 1814, vol. i. art. lxxxiii., p. 376, sq.; Ideler, Handbuch der Chronologie, vol. i., Berlin 1825, p. 502, sq.; the excellent prize essays of Kranold, De Anno Hebr. Jubileo, Göttingen 1837, and Wolde, De Anno Hebr. Jubileo, Göttingen 1837; Bahr, Symbolik des Mosaischen Cultus, vol. ii., Heidelberg 1839, p. 572, sq.; Ewald, Die Alterthümer des Volkes Israel, Göttingen 1854, p. 415, sq.; Saalschütz, Das Mosaische Recht, vol. i., Berlin 1853, ch. xiii., p. 141, etc.; and by the same learned author, Archæologie der Hebræer, vol. ii., Königsberg 1856, ch. lxvi., sec. 3, p. 224, etc.; Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. i., Nordhausen 1855, p. 463, etc.; Keil, Handbuch der Biblischen Archæologie, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1858, vol. i. p. 374, etc.—C. JUBILEES, BOOK OF. This Apocryphal or Hagadic book, which was used so largely in the ancient church, and was still known to the Byzantines, but of which both the original Hebrew and the Greek were afterwards lost, has recently been discovered in an Ethiopic version in Abyssinia.

1. Title of the Book, and its signification.—The book is called τὰ Ἰωβηλαία = ספר היובלות, the Jubilees or the book of Jubilees, because it divides the period of the Biblical history upon which it treats, i. e., from the creation to the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, into fifty Jubilees of forty-nine years each, equal to 2450 years, and carefully describes every event according to the Jubilee, Sabbath year, or year in which it transpired, as stated in the inscription: 'These are the words of the division of the days according to the law and the testimony, according to the events of the years in Sabbatic years and in Jubilees, etc.' It is also called by the Fathers ἡ λεπτὴ Γένεσις, λεπτισγενέσις, μικρογενέσις; τὰ λεπτὰ Γενέσεως, = בראשית זוטא, i. e., the small Genesis, compendium of Genesis, because it only selects certain portions of Genesis, although through its lengthy comments upon these points it is actually longer than this canonical book (comp. Epiphanius, Adv. Haer., lib. I., tom. iii., cap. vi., ed. Petav.; G. Syncellus, p. 8); or according to Ewald's rendering of it, τὰ λεπτὰ (subtilia, minuta) Γένεσις, because it divides the history upon which it treats into very minute and small periods (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i. 271); it is called by St. Jerome the Apocryphal Genesis (see below, sec. 3), and it is also styled ἡ τοῦ Μωσέως ἀποκάλυψις, the Apocalypse of Moses, by George Syncellus and Cedrenus, because the book pretends to be a revelation of God to Moses, and is denominated 'the book of the division of days' by the Abyssinian Church, from the first words of the inscription.

2. Design and Contents of the Book.—This Apocryphal book is designed to be a commentary on the canonical books of Genesis and Exodus. (1) It fixes and arranges more minutely the chronology of the Biblical history from the creation to the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan; (2) Solves the various difficulties to be found in the narratives of these canonical books; (3) Describes more fully events which are simply hinted at in the sacred history of that early period; and (4) Expatiates upon the religious observances, such as the Sabbath, the festivals, circumcision, sacrifices, lawful and unlawful meats, etc. etc., setting forth their sacred character, as well as our duty to keep them, by shewing the high antiquity of these institutions, inasmuch as they have been sacredly observed by the patriarchs, as may be seen from the following notice of these four points.

a. In its chronological arrangements we find that it places the deluge in 1353 A.M. (Jubil. vi. 61), and the exodus in the year 2410 A.M. (iv. 10.) This, with the forty years' sojourn in the wilderness, yields fifty jubilees of forty-nine years each from the creation to the entrance into Canaan, i. e. 2450, and also allows a new jubilee period to commence immediately upon the entering of the Israelites into the promised land. Though in the calculations of this period the book of Jubilees agrees in its particulars with the Hebrew text of Genesis and Exodus, yet it differs from the canonical text both as to the time of the sojourn in Egypt and the years in which the ante and post-diluvian patriarchs begat their children. Thus Jared is said to have lived 62 instead of 162 years before Enoch was born, Methuselah was 67 instead of 187 at the birth of Lamech, and Lamech again was 53 instead of 182 when he begat Noah; agreeing partly with the Samaritan Pentateuch, and partly with the Septuagint in their statements about these ante-diluvian patriarchs. In the chronology of the post-diluvian patriarchs, however, the book of Jubilees deviates from these versions, and says that Arphaxad begat Cainan when 74-75; after the deluge, Cainan begat Salah when 57, Salah begat Eber when 67, Eber begat Peleg when 68, Peleg begat Reu when 61, the birth of Serug is omitted, but Serug is said to have begat Nahor in the year 116 after the birth of Reu, and Nahor begat Terah in his 62d year (comp. Jubil. iv. 40, etc.) The going down into Egypt is placed about 2172-2173 A.M. (Jubil. xlv. 1-3), so that when we deduct it from 2410, in which year the exodus is placed, there remains for the sojourn in Egypt 238 years. In the description of the lives of Noah, Abraham (xxiii. 23), Isaac (xxxvi. 49-52), Jacob (xlv. 40-43), and Joseph (xlv. 9-15), the chronology agrees with the Hebrew text of Genesis.

b. Of the difficulties in the sacred narrative which the book of Jubilees tries to solve, may be mentioned that it accounts for the serpent speaking to Eve, by saying that all animals spoke before the fall in paradise (comp. Gen. i. 1 with Jubil. iii. 98); explains very minutely whence the first heads of families took their wives (Jubil. iv. 24, 71, 100, etc.); how far the sentence of death pronounced in Gen. ii. 17 has been fulfilled literally (iv. 99, etc.); shews that the sons of God who came to the daughters of men were angels (v. 3); with what help Noah brought the animals into the ark (v. 76); wherewith the tower of Babel was destroyed (x. 87); why Sarah disliked Ishmael and urged Abraham to send him away (xvii. 13); why Rebecca loved Jacob so dearly (xix. 40-84); how it was that Esau came to sell his birthright for a mess of pottage (xxiv. 5-20); who told Rebekah (Gen. xxvii. 42) that Esau determined to kill Jacob (xxxvii. 1, etc.); how it was that he afterwards desisted from his determination to kill Jacob (xxxv. 29-105); why Rebekah said (Gen. xxvii. 45) that she would be deprived of both her sons in one day (xxxvii. 9); why Er Judah's first-born died (xli. 1-7); why Onan would not redeem Tamar (xli. 11-13); why Judah was not punished for his sin with Tamar (xli. 57-67); why Joseph had the money put into the sacks of his brethren (xlii. 71-73); and how Moses was nourished in the ark (xlvii. 13), and that it was not God but the chief-mastemah, מַסְתֵּמָחָה, the enemy who hardened the hearts of the Egyptians (xlvi. 58).

c. Instances where events which are briefly mentioned or simply hinted at in the canonical book of Genesis, and which seem to refer to another narrative of an earlier or later date, are given more fully in the book of Jubilees, will be found in Jubil. xvi. 39-101, where an extensive description is given of the appearance of the angels to Abraham and Sarah as a supplement to Gen. xviii. 14; in Jubil. xxxii. 5-38, 50-53, where Jacob is described as giving tithes of all his possessions, and wishing to erect a house of God in Bethel, which is a fuller description of that hinted at in Gen. xxviii. 22; in Jubil. xxxiv. 4-25, where Jacob's battle with the seven kings of the Amorites is described, to which allusion is made in Gen. xlviii. 22.

d. As to the religious observances, we are told that the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost (יוֹם הַחֲבוּרִים), is contained in the covenants which God made with Noah and Abraham (comp. Jubil. vi. 56-60 with Gen. ix. 8-17; xiv. 51-54 with Gen. xv. 18-21); the Feast of Tabernacles was first celebrated by Abraham at Beersheba (Jubil. xvi. 61-101); the concluding Festival (שְׁמִינִי עֶצְרָת) which is on the 23d of Tishri, continuing the Feast of Tabernacles [FESTIVALS], was instituted by Jacob (Jubil. xxxii. 87-94) after his vision at Bethel (Gen. xxxv. 9-14); and that the mourning on the Day of Atonement (יוֹם כִּפּוּר) was instituted (Lev. xvi. 29) to commemorate the mourning of Jacob over the loss of Joseph (Jubil. xxxiv. 50-60).

The German version by Dillmann, through which this book has recently been made known to Europeans, has been divided by the erudite translator into fifty chapters, but not into verses. The references in this article are to those chapters, and the lines of the respective chapters.

3. Author and Original Language of the Book.

—That the author of this book was a Jew is evident from—(1) His minute description of the Sabbath and festivals, as well as all the Rabbinic ceremonies connected therewith (l. 19-33, 49-60), which developed themselves in the course of time, and which we are told are simply types described by Moses from heavenly archetypes, and have not only been kept by the angels in heaven, but are binding upon the Jews world without end; (2) The elevated position he ascribes to the Jewish people (ii. 79-91; xvi. 50-56), ordinary Israelites are in dignity equal to angels (xv. 72-75), and the priests are like the presence-angels (xxxi. 47-49), over Israel only does the Lord himself rule, whilst he appointed evil spirits to exercise dominion over all other nations (xv. 80-90); and (3) The many Hagadic elements of this book which are still preserved in the Talmud and Midrashim. Comp. for instance Jubil. i. 116, where the presence-angel, מַטְטָרִן, שֵׁר הַפְּנִיִּים, is described as having preceded the hosts of Israel, with Sanhedrim 38, b; the description of the creation of paradise on the third day (Jubil. ii. 37 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xv.); the twenty-two generations from Adam to Jacob (Jubil. ii. 64, 91, with Bereshith Rabba and Midrash Tadshe, 169); the animals speaking before the fall (Jubil. iii. 98 with the Midrashim); the remark that Adam lived 70 years less than 1000 years in order that the declaration might be fulfilled 'in the day in which thou eatest thereof thou shalt die,' since 1000 years are as one day with the Lord (Jubil. iv. 99 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xix.; Justin. Dial. c. Tryph. p. 278, ed. Otto); the causes of the deluge (Jubil. v. 5-20 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xxxi.); the declaration that the beginning of the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months, are to be celebrated as festivals, being the beginning of the four seasons called תְּקֵפוֹת, and having already been observed by Noah (Jubil. vi. 31-95 with Pirke d. R. Eliezer, cap. viii.; Pseudo-Jonathan on Gen. viii. 22); the statement that Satan induced God to ask Abraham to sacrifice his son (Jubil. xvii. 49-53 with Sanhedrim 89, b); that Abraham was tempted ten times (Jubil. xix. 22 with Mishna, Aboth v. 3; Targum Jerusalem on Gen. xxii. 1, etc.); and that Joseph spake Hebrew when he made himself known to his brothers (Jubil. xliii. 54 with Bereshith Rabba, cap. xciii.) As, however, some of the practices, rites, and interpretations given in this book are at variance with the traditional expositions of the Rabbins, Beer is of opinion that the writer was a Dosithean who was anxious to bring about a fusion of Samaritanism and Rabbinic-Judaism, by making mutual concessions (Das Buch d. Jubiläen, pp. 61, 62); Jelinek again thinks that he was an Essene, and wrote this book against the Pharisees, who maintained that the beginning of the month is to be fixed by observation and not by calculation (קִדְּשׁ הַחֹדֶשׁ עַל פִּי הַרְאִיִּי), and that the Sanhedrim had the power of ordaining intercalary years (HILLEL II.), adducing in corroboration of this view the remark in Jubil. vi. 95-133, the chronological system of the author, which is based upon heptades; and the strict observance of the Sabbath, which as an Essene loving the sacred number seven, he urges upon every Israelite (comp. Jubil. ii. 73-135; iv. 19-61; Bd. Ha-Midrash, iii. p. xi.) Whilst Frankel maintains that the writer was an Egyptian Jew, and a priest at the temple in Leontopolis, which accounts for his setting such a high value upon sacrifices, and tracing the origin of the festivals and sacrifices to the patriarchs (Monatschrift, v. p. 396).

Notwithstanding the difference of opinion as to which phase of Judaism the author belonged, all agree that this book was written in Hebrew, that it was afterwards translated into Greek, and that the Ethiopic, of which Dillmann has given a German version is made from the Greek. Many of the expressions in the book can only be understood by retranslating them into Hebrew. Thus, for instance, the remarks 'und es giebt keine UEBERGEHUNG' (Jubil. vi. 101, 102), 'und sie sollen keinen Tag UEBERGEHEN' (vi. 107), become intelligible when we bear in mind that the original had עִיבּוּר, intercalation. Moreover, the writer designates the wives of the patriarchs from the family of Seth by names which express beauty and virtue in Hebrew, Seth married Azurah, עֲצוּרָה, restrain; Jared married Beracha, בְּרַכָּה, blessing; Enoch and Methuselah married wives of the name of Adni, עֲדְנָה, pleasure; whilst Cain married his sister Avam, אָחַן, vice (Jubil. iv. 24-128). The words בִּי נִשְׁבַּעְתִּי, Gen. xxii. 16, are rendered in the book of Jubil. (xvii. 42), bei meinem Haupte, which is the well-known Palestinian oath, רִאשִׁי, comp. Sanhedrim, 2, 3, al.), and which no Greek writer would use, especially as the Sept. has not got it here. There are also other renderings which shew that the writer had the Hebrew Scriptures before him and not the Sept., a fact which is irreconcilable on the supposition that he was a Greek Jew, or wrote in Greek, as he would undoubtedly have used the Sept. Thus, for instance, the book of Jubil. xiv. 9, 10, has 'der aus DEINEM LEIBE hervorgeht,' which is a literal translation of the Hebrew אֲשֶׁר יָצָא מִמֶּנִּי, Gen. xv. 4; otherwise the Sept. ὅς ἐξ ἐμοῦ ἐκ τῆς σπύης: Jubil. xiv. 29 has 'aber Abram WEHRTE SIE AB,' so the Hebrew וַיִּשָּׁב

אֹתָם אַבְרָם (Gen. xv. 11), not the Sept. καὶ συνέκδυσεν αὐτοῖς Ἀβραμ (comp. also book of Jubil. xv. 17 with Sept. Gen. xvii. 7; xv. 43 with Sept. xvii. 17; xv. 46 with Sept. xvii. 19). To these is to be added the testimony of St. Jerome, who remarks upon וַיִּשָּׁב, hoc verbum, quantum memoria suggerit, nusquam alibi in scripturis sanctis apud Hebræos invenisse me novi, absque libro apocrypho, qui a Græcis uxoriporygeus appellatur. Ibi in edificatione turris pro stadio ponitur, in quo excercitur pugiles et athleteæ et cursorum velocitas comprobatur (comp. In epistola ad Fabiolam de mansionibus, Mansio xviii. on Num. xxxiii. 21, 22); and again (Mansio xxiv. on Num. xxxiii. 27, 28), hoc eodem vocabulo (וַיִּשָּׁב) et iisdem literis scriptum invenio patrem Abraham, qui in supradicto apocrypho Genesios volumine abactis corvis, qui hominum frumenta vastabant, abactoris vel depulsoris sortitus est nomen; as well as the fact that portions of the book are still extant in Hebrew (comp. Jelinek, Bd. Ha-Midrash, vol. iii. p. ix. etc.) The agreement of many passages with the Sept. when the latter deviates from the Hebrew, is as Dillmann observes, to be ascribed to the translator who, when rendering it into Greek, used the Sept. (Ewald, Jahrbuch, iii. p. 90).

4. Date and Importance of the Book.—That this book was written before the destruction of the Temple is evident, not only from its description of the sacrifices and the services performed therein, but from its whole complexion, and this is admitted by all who have written on it. Its exact date, however, is a matter of dispute. Krüger maintains that it was written between 332-320 B.C.; Dillmann and Frankel think that it was written in the first century before Christ; whilst Ewald is of opinion that it originated about the birth of Christ. The medium of the two extremes is the most probable.

The importance of this book can hardly be overrated, when we remember that it is one of the very few Biblical works, written between the close of the O. T. canon and beginning of the N. T., which have come down to us. There are, however, several other considerations which render this book a most important contribution, both to the interpretation of the Bible and to the history of Jewish belief anterior to the Christian era. 1. Many portions of it are literal translations of the book of Genesis, and therefore enable us to see in what state the Hebrew text was at that age, and furnish us with some readings which are preferable to those given in the textus receptus, e.g., Jubil. xvii. 17 shows that the correct reading of Gen.

xxi. 11 is עַל אֶרֶץ בְּנוֹ תֵּל אֶרֶץ אֲמֹתוֹ, which is corroborated by the verse immediately following. 2. It shows us that the Jews of that age believed in the survival of the soul after the death of the body (xxiii. 115), though the resurrection of the body is nowhere mentioned therein; that they believed in the existence of Satan, the prince of legions of evil spirits, respecting which so little is said in the O. T. and so much in the New; and that these evil spirits have dominion over men, and are often the cause of their illnesses and death (x. 35-47; xlix. 7-10). 3. It shows us what the Jews believed about the coming of the Messiah, and the great day of judgment (xxiii. 37-118). 4. It explains the statements in Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2, which have caused so much difficulty to interpreters, by most distinctly declaring that the law was given through the presence angel (i. 99-102). 5. There can hardly be any doubt that it is quoted in the N. T. (comp. 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6, with Jubil. iv. 76; v. 3, 20).

5. Literature.—It has already been remarked that the Hebrew original of this book is lost. Chapters xxv. and xxxv. are, however, preserved from Midrash Vajisau in Midrash Jalut Sabatic, section Bereshith, cxxxiii., as has been pointed out by Jellinek (see below); and Treuenfels has shown parallels between other parts of the book of Jubilees and the Hagada and Midrashim in Literaturblatt des Orients, 1846, p. 81, ff. The Greek version of this book, which was made at a very early period of the Christian era, as is evident from Recognit. Clement., cap. xxx.-xxxii., though Epiphanius (Adv. Haer. lib. i., cap. iv. vi.; lib. ii.; tom. ii., cap. lxxxiii. lxxxiv.) and St. Jerome (In Epistolam ad Fabiolam de mansionibus, Mansio xviii. on Num. xxxiii. 21, 22; Mansio xxiv. on Num. xxxiii. 27, 28) are the first who mention it by name, was soon lost in the Western Church, but it still existed in the Eastern Church, and was copiously used in the Chronographia of Georgius Syncellus and Georgius Credrenus, and quoted several times by Joannes Zonaras and Michael Glycas, Byzantine theologians and historians of the 11th and 12th centuries (comp. Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraph. V. Test., 851-863; Dillmann in Ewald's Jahrb. iii. 94, ff.) From that time, however, the Greek version was also lost, and the book of Jubilees was quite unknown to Europeans till 1844, when Ewald announced in Der Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, pp. 176-179, that Dr. Krapf had found it preserved in the Abyssinian church in an Ethiopic translation, and brought over a MS. copy which was made over to the Tübingen University. This Ethiopic version was translated into German by Dillmann in Ewald's Jahrbücher, vols. ii., pp. 230-256, and iii., pp. 1-96, Göttingen 1851-1853; and Ewald at once used its contents for the new edition of his Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. i., Göttingen 1851, p. 271; vol. ii. (1853), p. 294. This was seasonably followed by Jellinek's edition of the Midrash Vajisau, with an erudite preface; Feth Ha-Midrash, vol. iii., Leipzig 1855; by the learned treatises of Beer, Das Buch der Jubiläen und sein Verhältniss zu den Midraschim, 1856; and Frankel, Das Buch der Jubiläen, Monatschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judenthums, v. pp. 311-316; 380-400; and another masterly production by Beer, entitled Noch ein Wort über das Buch der Jubiläen, in Frankel's Monatschrift, 1857; and strictures on the works of Jellinek, Beer, and Frankel, by Dillmann, in Zeitschrift der Deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, xi., Leipzig 1857, p. 161, ff. Krüger, too, published an article on Die Chronologie im Buche der Jubiläen, Zeitschrift der Deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, vol. xii., Leipzig 1858, p. 279, ff.; and Dillmann has at last published the Ethiopic itself, Kiel and London 1859.—C. D. G.

JUDA. This name occurs three times in the A. V. instead of Judas (Mark vi. 3 [comp. Matt. xiii. 55, where the same person is called Judas in the A. V.]; Luke iii. 26, 30; in all which passages 'Iouda is the genitive of 'Ioudas), and four times for the patriarch Judah (Luke iii. 33; Heb. vii. 14; Rev. v. 3; vii. 5).—†

JUDÆA LEO. [LEO JUDÆA]

JUDÆA AND JUDEA. Ezra employs the Chaldee word Yehūd, יְהוּדָא (= Heb. יְהוּדָה), to denote the whole country in which the Jews settled after the return from captivity (Ezra v. 1; Sept. 'Iouda, Judea); and he calls it the 'province of Judea' (יְהוּדָא מְרִיבָתָא; ἡ τοῦ Ἰουδαίου χώρα; Judeam Provinciam). Daniel uses the word in the same sense, to denote the land of the Jews generally (ch. ii. 25; and v. 13, where it is rendered in our A. V. both Judah and Jewry). In Arabic the word Yehūd, يَهُودَا, is applied exclusively to the Jews as a people.

In the time of Daniel and Ezra this word had no definite and well understood geographical signification. It was the name given by foreigners to the country which was considered the home of the Jews. Its origin is easily traced. When the people were divided under Rehoboam, ten tribes chose Jeroboam for their king, and called his kingdom 'Israel,' the two tribes who held by Rehoboam called their kingdom 'Judah,' because it was mainly made up of the people and possessions of that powerful tribe (1 Kings xii. 20, 23, 27). This kingdom, being so closely connected with the tribe, will be treated of in the Art. JUDAH.

The kingdom of Israel was overthrown by the Assyrians in B.C. 721; Judah survived it 133 years. During this period the name 'Judah' became identified with the Jewish nation, and, among foreigners, with the whole country in which they dwelt, that is, with all Palestine. By the Jews themselves, a distinction was made between Judah and Samaria, but among strangers it was overlooked. Hence, during the captivity the name Yehud (יהודה), or 'Judea,' as it is in the English version, was applied in Babylon to the whole of Palestine. And after the captivity, though a considerable portion of the 'Ten Tribes' returned with the others, and though many of them settled in their ancient country (Ezra i. 5; x. 5; 1 Chron. ix. 3; Neh. vii. 73; see Prideaux, Connection, i. 128), yet the name Judah, or Judea, continued to be applied to all Palestine, and more especially that section west of the Jordan (Joseph. Antiq. xi. 5. 7). The whole province over which the Persian satrap ruled was called 'Judah' (יהודה); Hag. i. 1, 14; ii. 2; cf. Esther viii. 9; Herodot. iii. 91).

These facts will account for the somewhat vague manner in which the Greek word Ἰουδαία, Judæa, is used by Josephus, by classic authors, and even in a few places by the writers of the N. T. Thus Josephus says, 'Canaan inhabited the country now called Judea, and called it from his own name Canaan' (Antiq. i. 6. 2). In another place he speaks of 'Judæa beyond Jordan' (ῥῆς Ἰουδαίας πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου; Antiq. xii. 4. 11; Reland, Pal., p. 32), which is identical with that expression in Matthew about which there has been so much controversy—'Jesus departed from Galilee, and came into the coasts of Judæa beyond Jordan' (τὰ ὄρια τῆς Ἰουδαίας πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, Matt. xix. 1). Ptolemy begins one of his chapters, 'Syrian Palestine, which is also called Judæa (ἥτις καὶ Ἰουδαία καλεῖται, v. 16); and Luke, in Acts xxviii. 21, evidently puts 'Judæa' for Palestine (see Reland, pp. 35, 47, etc., where other examples are cited).

Before the commencement of our era, Palestine was divided into three distinct provinces—Galilee, Samaria, and Judea (John iv. 3-5; Reland, pp. 177, seq.; Strabo, xvi. 2. 34, seq., p. 759); and of these divisions Josephus gives a detailed account (Bell. Jud. iii. 3). Judæa lay on the south, and extended from the Jordan and Dead Sea on the east, to the Mediterranean on the west; and from about the parallel of Shiloh on the north, to the wilderness on the south; and also included, apparently, a strip of coast running as far north as Ptolemais (Josephus, l.c.) This was the province usually meant by the term 'Judea' in the N. T. (Luke v. 17; Matt. iv. 25; John iv. 47, 54, etc.); but sometimes the word is used in a wider sense. Thus, in Luke i. 5, Herod is called king of Judæa; that is, the general name Judea is given to his whole kingdom, which included all Palestine both east and west of the Jordan (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 8. 1, seq.) Josephus also says that part of Idumea was embraced in Judæa (Bell. Jud. iii. 3. 5). The southern part of Palestine, between Hebron, Beersheba, and Gaza, was then called Idumea [IDUMEA], and thus formed part of the proper province of Judæa.

The territory anciently allotted to the tribe of Judah was divided by its natural conformation into three sections:—The Shephelah, the Mountains, and the Arabah (Josh. xi. 16; xv. 6; xviii. 18; xv. 33, 48). In like manner, the later Jews divided Judæa into three corresponding sections—Plain, Mountain, and Valley. The 'Plain' included Philistia and part of Sharon; the 'Mountain' was the central ridge on which Jerusalem stands; and the 'Valley' lay along the shore of the Dead Sea between Engedi and Jericho (Reland, p. 176; see the Jewish authorities there cited).

In the N. T., however, only two natural divisions are mentioned—the mountain or 'hill country of Judæa' (ἐν ὄρει τῇ ὀρεινῇ τῆς Ἰουδαίας, Luke i. 65), and the 'Wilderness of Judæa' (ἐν τῇ ἐρημῇ τῆς Ἰουδαίας, Matt. iii. 1). The 'hill country' embraced the crown of the mountain ridge around Jerusalem, and southwards. This was the native country of the Baptist (Luke i. 39; Alford, in loc.) The 'Wilderness of Judæa,' or, emphatically, 'The Wilderness,' as it is termed in the narrative of our Lord's temptation (τῇ ἐρημῇ, Matt. iv. 1), is that wild and desolate region along the whole eastern slope of the mountains, from the brow of the ridge at Bethany, Bethlehem, and Tekoa, down to the shore of the Dead Sea. For the physical geography of this region, see PALESTINE; and for its history, JERUSALEM (see also DESERT).

That section of Judæa which formed the scene of a part of our Lord's labours, teachings, and sufferings, was 'a hill country,' a land of vineyards, olive groves, and fig-orchards, which flourished luxuriantly in the deep glens and along the terraced sides of the limestone hills. The 'Wilderness,' where he was tempted, and through which he travelled from Jericho to Bethany, was a land of sheep and shepherds, and daring outlaws (Handbook for S. and P., pp. 184, 248). This had a marked effect on our Lord's teaching, and on the illustrations and parables he employed, as is seen by a careful study of the gospel of John, which chiefly relates those incidents that occurred in Judæa. The parables of the vineyard (Matt. xxi. 28), of the fig-trees (xxi. 19; Luke xxi. 29, etc.), of the good Samaritan (Luke x. 30, seq.), and of the good shepherd (John x.), were all told in Judæa, where Christ could point to the scenes, and where the auditors were familiar with every circumstance of the stories; there, too, among the vine-clad hills of Judæa, was given that most beautiful of all his illustrations of divine truth—'I am the true vine, and my father is the husbandman,' etc. (John xv; see Stanley, S. and P., p. 412). Judæa has changed. Its glory and its beauty are departed. Its hills are now scantily clothed with grayish and brown shrubs, intermixed with aromatic plants and bright flowers; and their sides are broken by concentric rings of white rocks, and great piles of white stones, which make them look painfully desolate. Here and there is a deep glen bordered with belts of olives, and its banks above green with the foliage of the oak; but the noble forests are gone; the vegetation that resulted from careful irrigation is gone; the terraces that supported the soil on the hill-sides are broken; and instead of spreading vine and fig-tree, we have now naked rocks, and confused heaps of stones. The ancient populousness of this mountain region is manifest still in the vast number of ruined towns and villages which everywhere stud the landscape. 'In Judah we may now wander for miles together without seeing a vestige of present habitation, save the little goat-pen on the hill-side, and the groups of sheep and goats round the fountains; but there is scarcely a hill-top that is not crowned with ruins, and there is scarcely a fountain where fragments of walls and scattered heaps of stones do not indicate the sites of former dwellings. The light Saracenic arch, the stately Roman column, and the massive Jewish substruction, lead us up by a regular architectural chronology to the rude 'cairns' of the mountain regions, and the rounded tells of the plains—the vestiges of primitive Canaanitic cities' (Handbook for S. and P., p. 184). In addition to the works already referred to, some good descriptions of Judæan scenery and antiquities will be found in Keith on Prophecy, Van de Velde's Travels, Thomson's The Land and the Book, Olin's Travels, and Wilson's Lands of the Bible. Its history is sketched by Robinson, Biblical Researches; and Kitto, Pictorial History of Palestine.—J. L. P.

JUDAH (יְהוּדָה, celebrated; Sept. Ἰούδας), fourth son of Jacob and Leah (B.C. 1755). The narrative in Genesis brings this patriarch more before the reader, and makes known more of his history and character, than it does in the case of any other of the twelve sons of Jacob, with the single exception of Joseph. It is indeed chiefly in connection with Joseph that the facts respecting Judah transpire; and as they have already been given in the articles JACOB and JOSEPH, it is only necessary to indicate them shortly in this place. It was Judah's advice that the brethren followed when they sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites, instead of taking his life. By the light of his subsequent actions we can see that his conduct on this occasion arose from a generous impulse, although the form of the question he put to them has been sometimes held to suggest an interested motive:—'What profit is it if we slay our brother and conceal his blood? Come, let us sell him,' etc. (Gen. xxvii. 26, 27).

Not long after this Judah withdrew from the paternal tents, and went to reside at Adullam, in the country which afterwards bore his name. Here he married a woman of Canaan, called Shuah, and had by her three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. When the eldest of these sons became of fit age, he was married to a woman named Tamar, but soon after died. As he died childless, the patriarchal law, afterwards adopted into the Mosaic code (Deut. xxv. 6), required him to bestow upon the widow his second son. This he did; but as Onan also soon died childless, Judah became reluctant to bestow his only surviving son upon this woman, and put her off with the excuse that he was not yet of sufficient age. Tamar accordingly remained in her father's house at Adullam. She had the usual passion of Eastern women for offspring, and could not endure the stigma of having been twice married without bearing children, while the law precluded her from contracting any alliance but that which Judah withheld her from completing.

Meanwhile Judah's wife died, and after the time of mourning had expired, he went, accompanied by his friend Hirah, to attend the shearing of his sheep at Timnath in the same neighbourhood. These circumstances suggested to Tamar the strange thought of connecting herself with Judah himself, under the guise of a loose woman.

Having waylaid him on the road to Timnath, she succeeded in her object, and when the consequences began to be manifest in the person of Tamar, Judah was highly enraged at her crime, and, exercising the powers which belonged to him as the head of the family she had dishonoured, he commanded her to be brought forth, and committed to the flames as an adulteress. But when she appeared, she produced the ring, the bracelet, and the staff, which he had left in pledge with her; and put him to confusion by declaring that they belonged to the father of her coming offspring. Judah acknowledged them to be his, and confessed that he had been wrong in withholding Shelah from her. The result of this painful affair was the birth of two sons, Zerah and Pharez, from whom, with Shelah, the tribe of Judah descended. Pharez was the ancestor of the line from which David, the kings of Judah, and Jesus came (Gen. xxxviii. ; xli. 12; 1 Chron. ii. 3-5; Matt. i. 3; Luke iii. 33).

These circumstances seem to have disgusted Judah with his residence in towns; for we find him ever afterwards at his father's tents. His experience of life, and the strength of his character, appear to have given him much influence with Jacob; and it was chiefly from confidence in him that the aged father at length consented to allow Benjamin to go down to Egypt. That this confidence was not misplaced has already been shewn [JOSEPH]; and there is not in the whole range of literature a finer piece of true natural eloquence than that in which Judah offers himself to remain as a bond-slave in the place of Benjamin, for whose safe return he had made himself responsible to his father. The strong emotions which it raised in Joseph disabled him from keeping up longer the disguise he had hitherto maintained, and there are few who have read it without being, like him, moved even to tears.

We hear nothing more of Judah till he received, along with his brothers, the final blessing of his father, which was conveyed in lofty language, glancing far into futurity, and strongly indicative of the high destinies which awaited the tribe that was to descend from him.

Addendum.—In character, Judah appears to have been ambitious, designing, and somewhat unscrupulous. He acquired at an early period considerable ascendancy over his brethren, and some influence also over his father. His tact and talent were displayed in obtaining Jacob's consent to send Benjamin to Egypt, and still more in pleading for him before Joseph. Judah was, in fact, the leading man in Jacob's household; and he prepared the way for making his tribe the leading tribe in Israel. There seems to be an acknowledgment of his ascendancy, and a prediction of its continuance, in Jacob's blessing:—'Judah is a lion's whelp . . . who shall rouse him? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come' (Gen. xlix. 9, 10). The knowledge that the Shiloh—the Great Deliverer—was to spring from this tribe, doubtless tended to increase its influence.—J. L. P.

JUDAH, TRIBE AND POSSESSIONS OF. At the Exodus, the tribe of Judah numbered 74,600 adult males, being 11,900 more than the largest of the other tribes, and 1900 more than Ephraim and Manasseh together (Num. i.) When the Israelites were marshalled in the wilderness by the command of God, the tribe of Judah had assigned to it the post of honour, on the east side of the tabernacle; and was made chief of the first of the four grand divisions of the host. In marching, Judah always led the van (Num. ii. 3, 9; x. 14). It is a singular fact, that the two tribes which afterwards became the chief in Israel, were those whose spies brought back a true report of Canaan to Moses in Paran. The spies were Caleb of Judah, and Joshua of Ephraim (Num. xiii. 6, 8, 30; xiv. 6). The faithfulness of Caleb was not left without its reward. The sin of Achan at the taking of Jericho left a stain upon the tribe, and brought calamity on the whole host (Josh. vii.)

Judah was the first tribe which received its allotted possessions west of the Jordan, and its territory is described with more accuracy and greater detail than that of any other. It is remarkable, too, that this territory included fully one-third of the whole land. The boundaries are very minutely given by Joshua, and the principal towns are all named (chap. xv.) Its eastern boundary was the Dead Sea and the Arabah, and its western the Mediterranean (vers. 5, 12). On the north the border ran from the mouth of the Jordan, by Jericho, Jerusalem, Kirjath-jearim, Bethshemesh, Ekron, and Jabneel, to the coast. The southern border cannot now be so accurately defined, because the region through which it ran is to a great extent unexplored, and the sites of the places named are unknown. It is said to begin at 'the shore of the Salt Sea, and from the bay that looks southward;' but it is clear from what follows that the line ran due south from that point, through the Arabah, as far as Kadesh-barnea (35 miles), where it turned westward, and extended apparently in nearly a straight line to the River of Egypt, now Wady-el-Arish, 50 miles south-west from Gaza (vers. 2-4). The country thus defined was 65 miles long, and averaged about 50 in breadth. But while this large tract was nominally allotted to Judah, the portion of it available for actual settlement was comparatively small, not amounting to above one-third of the whole. On the east, extending along the Dead Sea and the Arabah, from north to south, was 'the Wilderness' (מִדְבָּר, Josh. xv. 6), averaging 15 miles in breadth, a wild, barren, uninhabitable region, fit only to afford scanty pasturage for sheep and goats, and a secure home for leopards, bears, wild-goats, and outlaws (1 Sam. xvii. 34; Mark i. 13; 1 Sam. xxii. 1, seq.) Different sections of it were called by different names, as, 'Wilderness of Engedi' (1 Sam. xxiv. 1); 'Wilderness of Judah' (Judg. i. 16); 'Wilderness of Maon' (1 Sam. xxiii. 24; see art. DESERT). It was the training-ground of the shepherd-warriors of Israel, where 'David and his mighty men' were braced and trained for those feats of daring courage which so highly distinguished them. [BETHLEHEM; DAVID.]

On the west of Judah's allotted territory was the Plain of Philistia, called the Shephelah, or 'low country,' in the Bible (Josh. xv. 33, etc.) It extended from Joppa to Gaza, and embraced the whole of that noble plain which constituted far the richest portion of the land. The people of Judah were properly mountaineers, accustomed to light guerilla warfare; and they could not withstand in the open plain the shock of the Philistines' warchariots, and the heavy panoply of their mailed champions. The Shephelah was thus worse than useless to Judah, for it involved the tribe in increasing and devastating wars. They never completely conquered, nor attempted to colonize it.

The real possessions of Judah, therefore, consisted only of the central mountain range, the hill country, with its terraced slopes and peaks all clothed in the rich foliage of the vine; and its long winding glens, running down between rocky ridges into the Shephelah, their sides covered with olives and figs, and their winter brooks running through corn-fields below; and its southern declivities breaking into undulating downs, and broad steppes of pasture-land, out towards Beer-sheba.

And even this comparatively narrow strip of mountain and hill Judah was eventually compelled to share with two other tribes. Dan got a section of the very best of the western declivities, where the mountains break down in long terraced spurs, and rich intervening vales, to the plain beneath Zorah and Bethshemesh [DAN]. In fact, Judah's real border does not seem to have gone farther west in this direction than Kirjath-jearim (Judg. xiii. 25; xviii. 12; Josh. xix. 40-46). Simeon again obtained a large part of that splendid pasture land which Joshua calls the South, and which lay near Beer-sheba, and towards the coast of Edom (xv. 21; xix. 2-8). 'Of the portion of the children of Judah was the inheritance of the children of Simeon; for the part of the children of Judah was too much for them' (ver. 9). These southern pasture-lands were the favourite camping-grounds of the old patriarchs, as they still are of those nomad tribes that frequent the southern border of Palestine (Robinson, B. R.)

These partitions of its allotted territory, while they curtailed its extent, tended in the end greatly to strengthen the position, and increase the power of Judah. Dan defended the western border against the inroads of the Philistines, with a brave and well-trained band of soldiers; having established, as it seems, a permanent camp on the commanding height between Zorah and Eshtaol (Judg. xiii. 25; xvi. 31; xviii. 12; see DAN). Simeon bore the brunt of all attacks and forays made on the southern border by the tribes of the great 'Wilderness of Wandering.' And when the Edomites attempted to penetrate Judah, Simeon could always check them by an attack upon their flank.

The broad summit of the mountain ridge between Jerusalem and Juttah was the home and stronghold of Judah. On every side the approaches to it were difficult, and the passes easily defended. The towns and villages, too, were generally perched on the tops of hills, or on rocky slopes. The resources of the soil were great. The country was rich in corn, wine, oil, and fruits; and the daring shepherds were able to lead their flocks far out over the neighbouring plains and through the mountains. During the wars of Joshua two men distinguished themselves by successful excursions, the aged Caleb, and his nephew Othniel. Caleb took Hebron from the giant Anakim; and Othniel captured Debir, and as a reward for his valour got Caleb's daughter with a rich dowry (Josh. xv. 13-19).

During the rule of the Judges the tribe of Judah was mainly occupied in completing the conquest of the territory. A few strongholds in the mountains still remained in the hands of the Canaanites; these they took, and they also made a successful expedition into Philistia, capturing Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron, though they were unable to establish permanent settlements there. In all these expeditions they were aided by the tribe of Simeon (Judg. i.) In fact, it would seem that both Dan and Simeon, being closely connected with Judah by geographical position, and being to a great extent dependent upon it for aid in times of pressing danger, ranged themselves under Judah's banner, and in the end became to a large extent amalgamated with that tribe. Judah thus began gradually to assume the headship of a southern confederacy, which interfered little, if at all, with the affairs of the more distant tribes, but acted independently in the management of its own. The only case in which Judah appears in its natural place during a period of nearly 400 years, is in the war against Benjamin, when it was divinely appointed to lead the van (Judg. xx. 18). Strongly established amid the fastnesses of its own mountains, and having its frontiers defended by Dan and Simeon, Judah remained at rest, gradually acquiring that power, wealth, and influence which in the end gave it a decided supremacy. When David was banished from the court of Saul he found an asylum in the dominions of his own tribe; and the manner in which he was able to evade the troops of the enraged monarch was probably as much owing to the sympathy of his brethren as to the nature of the country. On the death of Saul David removed to Hebron: 'And the men of Judah came, and there they anointed David king over the house of Judah' (2 Sam. ii. 1-4). They had no consultation with the other tribes; and this was the first step toward the establishment of an independent kingdom. Ephraim was the rival of Judah, and was the only tribe which shewed any disposition to dispute its supremacy. The existence of the sacerdotal establishment at Shiloh may have tended to encourage the claims of Ephraim. But when Judah placed David on the throne, and when the priests and tabernacle were removed to Jerusalem, Judah exulted, and Ephraim was proportionably dissatisfied. Probably the division of Israel into two kingdoms may thus be traced to the rivalry of these powerful tribes. When the kingdom was divided under Rehoboam and Jeroboam, the history of Judah as a tribe lapsed into that of Judah as a kingdom.—J. L. P.

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF. When the territory of all the rest of Israel, except Judah and Benjamin, was lost to the kingdom of Rehoboam, a special single name was needed to denote that which remained to him; and almost of necessity the word Judah received an extended meaning, according to which it comprised not Benjamin only, but the priests and Levites, who were ejected in great numbers from Israel, and rallied round the house of David. At a still later time, when the nationality of the ten tribes had been dissolved, and every practical distinction between the ten and the two had vanished during the captivity, the scattered body had no visible head, except in Jerusalem, which had been re-occupied by a portion of Judah's exiles. In consequence the name Judah (or Jew) attached itself to the entire nation from about the epoch of the restoration. [JEW.] But in this article Judah is understood of the people over which David's successors reigned, from Rehoboam to Zedekiah. [For the dates, see article CHRONOLOGY.]

When the kingdom of Solomon became rent with intestine war, it might have been foreseen that the Edomites, Moabites, and other surrounding nations would at once refuse their accustomed tribute, and become again practically independent; and some irregular invasion of these tribes might have been dreaded. It was a mark of conscious weakness, and not a result of strength, that Rehoboam fortified fifteen cities (2 Chron. xi. 5-11), in which his people might find defence against the irregular armies of his roving neighbours. But a more formidable enemy came in Shishak, king of Egypt, against whom the fortresses were of no avail (xii. 4), and to whom Jerusalem was forced to open its gates; and, from the despoiling of his treasures, Rehoboam probably sustained a still greater shock in its moral effect on the Moabites and Edomites, than in the direct loss; nor is it easy to conceive that he any longer retained the commerce of the Red Sea, or any very lucrative trade. Judged of by the number of soldiers recounted in the Chronicles, the strength of the early kings of Judah must have been not only great, but rapidly increasing. The following are the armies there given:—

Rehoboam gathered 180,000 chosen men (2 Chron. xi. 1). (Shishak attacked him with 60,000 horse, 1200 chariots, besides infantry.) Abijah set in array 400,000 valiant men (xiii. 3, 17), and slew 500,000 of Jeroboam's 800,000 in one battle. Asa had 300,000 heavy armed, and 280,000 light armed men (xiv. 8). (Zerah invaded him with 1,000,000 men and 300 chariots.) Jehoshaphat kept up:—

300,000 under Adnah, 280,000 under Jehohanan,
200,000 under Amasiah,
200,000 (light armed) under Eliadah,
180,000 under Jehozabad (xvii. 14-19).

Total 1,160,000 for field service.

'These waited on the king;' besides the garrisons 'in the fenced cities.'

After Jehoshaphat followed the calamitous affinity with the house of Ahab, and the massacres of both families. Under Jehoiada the priest, and Jehoash his pupil, no martial efforts were made; but Amaziah son of Jehoash, after hiring 100,000 Israelites to no purpose, made war on the Edomites, slew 10,000, and threw 10,000 more down from the top of their rock (xxv. 5, 6, 11, 12). His own force in Judah, from twenty years old and upwards, was numbered at only 300,000 choice men, able to handle spear and shield. His son Uzziah had 2600 military officers, and 307,500 men of war (xxvi. 12, 13). Ahaz lost, in a single battle with Pekah, 120,000 valiant men (xxviii. 6), after the severe slaughter he had received from Rezin king of Syria; after which no further military strength is ascribed to the kings of Judah. As to all these numbers the Vatican Sept. agrees with the received Hebrew text.

These figures have caused no small perplexity, and have suggested to some the need of conjectural emendation. But if they have been corrupted, it is by system, and on purpose; for there is far too great uniformity in them to be the result of accident. It perhaps deserves remark, that in the book of Kings no numbers of such startling magnitude are found. The army ascribed to Rehoboam (1 Kings xii. 21) is, indeed, as in Chronicles, 180,000 men; but if we explain it of those able to fight, the number, though certainly large, may be dealt with historically. See the article on DAVID, vol. i. page 641.

As the most important external relations of Israel were with Damascus, so were those of Judah with Edom and Egypt. Some revolution in the state of Egypt appears to have followed the reign of Shishak. Apparently the country must have fallen under the power of an Ethiopian dynasty; for the name of the Lubim, who accompanied Zerah in his attack on Asa, is generally regarded as proving that Zerah was from Sennaar, the ancient Meroë. But as this invasion was signally repulsed, the attempt was not repeated; and Judah enjoyed entire tranquillity from that quarter until the invasion of Pharaoh-necho. In fact, it may seem that this success assisted the reaction, favourable to the power of Judah, which was already begun, in consequence of a change in the policy of Damascus. Whether Abijah had been in league with the father of Benhadad I. (as is generally inferred from 1 Kings xv. 19) may be doubted; for the address cannot be rendered, 'Let there be a league between me and thee, as there was between my father and thine;' and it possibly is only a hyperbolical phrase of friendship for, 'Let us be in close alliance; let us count our fathers to have been allies.' However this may be, Asa bought, by a costly sacrifice, the serviceable aid of the Damascene king. Israel was soon distressed, and Judah became once more formidable to her southern neighbours. Jehoshaphat appears to have reasserted the Jewish authority over the Edomites without war, and to have set his own viceroy over them (1 Kings xxii. 47). Intending to resume the distant commerce which had been so profitable to Solomon, he built ships suitable for long voyages ('ships of Tarshish' as they are rightly called in 1 Kings xxii. 48—a phrase which the Chronicler has misunderstood, and translated into 'ships to go to Tarshish,' 2 Chron. xx. 36); but not having the advantage of Tyrian sailors, as Solomon had, he lost the vessels by violent weather before they had sailed. Upon this Ahaziah, king of Judah, offered the service of his own mariners, probably from the tribe of Asher, and others accustomed to the Mediterranean; but Jehoshaphat was too discouraged to accept his offer, and the experiment was never renewed by any Hebrew king. The Edomites, who paid only a forced allegiance, soon after revolted from Jehoram, and elected their own king (2 Kings viii. 20, 22). At a later time they were severely defeated by Amaziah (2 Kings xiv. 7), whose son, Uzziah, fortified the town of Elath, intending, probably, to resume maritime enterprise; but it remained a barren possession, and was finally taken from them by Rezin, in the reign of Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 6). The Philistines, in these times, seem to have fallen from their former greatness, their league having been so long dissolved. The most remarkable event in which they are concerned is the assault on Jerusalem, in the reign of Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17).

It is strikingly indicative of the stormy scenes through which the line of David passed, that the treasures of the king and of the Temple were so often plundered or bargained away. First, under Rehoboam, all the hoards of Solomon, consecrated and common alike, were carried off by Shishak (1 Kings xiv. 26). Two generations later, Asa emptied out to Benhadad all that had since accumulated 'in the house of Jehovah or in the king's house.' A third time, when Hazael had taken Gath, and was preparing to march on Jerusalem, Jehoash, king of Judah, turned him away by sending to him all 'that Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, Ahaziah, and Jehoash himself had dedicated, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of Jehovah and in the king's house' (2 Kings xii. 18). In the very next reign, Jehoash, king of Israel, defeated and captured Amaziah, took Jerusalem, broke down the walls, carried off hostages, and plundered the gold and silver deposited in the Temple and in the royal palace (2 Kings xiv. 11-14). A fifth sacrifice of the sacred and of the royal treasure was made by Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvi. 8). The act was repeated by his son Hezekiah to Sennacherib, who had demanded '300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold.' It is added, 'Hezekiah cut off the gold which he had overlaid, from the doors of the temple and from the pillars' (2 Kings xviii. 14-16). In the days of Josiah, as in those of Jehoash, the Temple appears to have been greatly out of repair (xii. and xxii.); and when Pharaoh-necho, having slain Josiah, had reduced Judah to submission, the utmost tribute that could be exacted was 100 talents of silver and one talent of gold. Even this sum was obtained by direct taxation, and no allusion is made to any treasure at all, either in the temple or in the king's house. It is the more extraordinary to find expressions used when Nebuchadnezzar took the city, which at first sight imply that Solomon's far-famed stores were still untouched. 'Nebuchadnezzar carried out all the treasures of the house of Jehovah and of the king's house, and cut in pieces all the vessels of gold which Solomon had made in the temple of Jehovah' (2 Kings xxiv. 13). They must evidently have been few in number, for in 1 Kings xiv. 26, 'all' must, at least, mean 'nearly all.' 'Shishak took away the treasures of the house of Jehovah, and of the king's house; he even took away all.' Yet the vessels of gold and silver taken away by Nebuchadnezzar, and restored by Cyrus, are reckoned 5400 in number (Ezra i. 11).

The severest shock which the house of David received was the double massacre which it endured from Jehu and from Athaliah. After a long minority, a youthful king, the sole surviving male descendant of his great-grandfather, and reared under the paternal rule of the priest Jehoiada, to whom he was indebted not only for his throne, but even for his recognition as a son of Ahaziah, was not in a situation to uphold the royal authority. That Jehoash conceived the priests to have abused the power which they had gained, sufficiently appears in 2 Kings xii., where he complains that they had for twenty-three years appropriated the money, which they ought to have spent on the repairs of the Temple. Jehoiada gave way; but we see here the beginning of a feud (hitherto unknown in the house of David) between the crown and the priestly order; which, after Jehoiada's death, led to the murder of his son Zachariah. The massacre of the priests of Baal, and of Athaliah, grand-daughter of a king of Sidon, must also have destroyed cordiality between the Phœnicians and the kingdom of Judah.

and when the victorious Hazeel had subjugated all Israel and shewed himself near Jerusalem, Jehoash could look for no help from without, and had neither the faith of Hezekiah nor a prophet like Isaiah to support him. The assassination of Jehoash in his bed by 'his own servants' is described in the Chronicles as a revenge taken upon him by the priestly party for his murder of 'the sons' of Jehoiada; and the same fate, from the same influence, fell upon his son Amaziah, if we may so interpret the words in 2 Chron. xxv. 27: 'From the time that Amaziah turned away from following Jehovah they made a conspiracy against him,' etc. Thus the house of David appeared to be committing itself, like that of Saul, to permanent enmity with the priests. The wisdom of Uzziah, during a long reign, averted this collision, though a symptom of it returned towards its close. No further mischief from this cause followed, until the reign of his grandson, the weak and unfortunate Ahaz: after which the power of the kingdom rapidly mouldered away. On the whole, it would appear that, from Jehoiada downward, the authority of the priests was growing stronger, and that of the crown weaker; for the king could not rule successfully, except by submitting to (what we might call) 'the constitutional check' of the priests; and although it is reasonable to believe that the priests became less simple-minded, more worldly, and less religious, as their order advanced in authority (whence the keen rebukes of them by the prophets), it is not the less certain that it was desirable for Judah, both in a temporal and a spiritual sense, to have the despotic power of the king subjected to a strong priestly pressure.

The struggle of the crown against this control was perhaps the most immediate cause of the ruin of Judah. Ahaz was probably less guided by policy than by superstition, or by architectural taste, in erecting his Damascene altar (2 Kings xvi. 10-18). But the far more outrageous proceedings of Manasseh seem to have been a systematic attempt to extirpate the national religion because of its supporting the priestly power; and the 'innocent blood very much,' which he is stigmatized for shedding (2 Kings xxi. 16), was undoubtedly a sanguinary attack on the party opposed to his impious and despotic innovations. The storm which he had raised did not burst in his lifetime; but, two years after, it fell on the head of his son Amon; and the disorganization of the kingdom which his madness had wrought is commemorated as the cause of the Babylonish captivity (2 Kings xxiii. 26; xxiv. 3, 4). It is also credible that the long-continued despotism had greatly lessened patriotic spirit; and that the Jewish people of the declining kingdom were less brave against foreign invaders than against kindred and neighbour tribes or civil opponents. Faction had become very fierce within Jerusalem itself (Ezek. xxii.), and civil bloodshed was common. Wealth, where it existed, was generally a source of corruption, by introducing foreign luxury, tastes, manners, superstitions, immorality, or idolatry; and when consecrated to pious purposes, as by Hezekiah and Josiah, produced little more than a formal and exterior religion.

Thoroughly to understand the political working of the monarchy, we ought to know, 1. What control the king exercised over ecclesiastical appointments; 2. How the Levites were supported when ejected from Israel; 3. What proportion of them acted as judges, lawyers, and scribes, and how far they were independent of the king. The nature of the case, and the precedent of David, may satisfy us that the king appointed the high-priest at his own pleasure out of the Aaronites; but (as Henry II. of England and hundreds of monarchs besides have found) ecclesiastics once in office often disappoint the hopes of their patron, and to eject them again is a most dangerous exertion of the prerogative. The Jewish king would naturally avoid following the law of descent, in order to preserve his right of election unimpaired; and it may be suspected that the line of Zadok was rather kept in the background by royal jealousy. Hilkiyah belonged to that line; and if any inference can be drawn from his genealogy, as given in 1 Chron. vi. 8-15, it is, that none of his ancestors between the reigns of Solomon and Josiah held the high-priesthood. Even Azariah, who is named in 2 Chron. xxxi. 10 as of the line of Zadok, is not found among Hilkiyah's progenitors. Jehoiada, the celebrated priest, and Urijah, who was so complaisant to the innovating Ahaz (2 Kings xvi.), were of a different family. It would seem that too many high-priests gained a reputation for subservience (for it often happens in history that the ecclesiastical heads are more subservient to royalty than the mass of their order); so that, after Hilkiyah, the race of Zadok became celebrated for uprightness, in invidious contrast to the rest of the priests; and even the Levites were regarded as more zealous than the generality of the Aaronites (2 Chron. xxix. 34). Hence in Ezekiel and other late writers, the phrase 'the priests the sons of Zadok,' or even 'the priests the Levites,' is a more honourable title than 'the priests the sons of Aaron.' Hilkiyah's name seems to mark the era at which (by a reaction after the atrocities of Manasseh and Amon) the purer priestly sentiment obtained its triumph over the crown. But the victory came too late. Society was corrupt and convulsed within, and the two great powers of Egypt and Babylon menaced it from without. True lovers of their God and of their country, like Jeremiah, saw that it was a time rather for weeping than for action; and that the faithful must resign themselves to the bitter lot which the sins of their nation had earned. —F. W. N.

JUDAS is merely the Greek form of the Hebrew name JUDAH. The Septuagint, however, represents Judah by Ἰούδα, Juda, and this we find also in the N. T. [JUDA].

1. The son of Mattathias [MACCABEES].

2. The son of Calphi, a Jewish officer under Jonathan (1 Maccab. xi. 70).

3. A Jew high in office at the time when the letter was sent by the Jews in Jerusalem to Aristobulus and to their brethren in Egypt (2 Maccab. i. 10). Some identify this Judas with Judas the Essene mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. xiii. 11. 2; Bell. Jud. i. 3. 5), but Josephus speaks of the letter as Ἰούδας ῥίς, phraseology which he would hardly have applied to one holding so eminent a position as the Judas before us. Grotius makes him a relation of John Hyrcanus and his lieutenant, referring to Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 16. 17; but there is no such passage, nor does Josephus anywhere mention such a person. De Wette concludes that this Judas is otherwise unknown, while a large number of interpreters identify him with Judas Maccabæus. Calovius objects to this that the chronology is against it, Judas Maccabæus having died in 152, that is, thirty-six years before the writing of this letter. This of course would be a fatal objection were it well founded; but no precise date is borne by the letter itself, and from the statement in ver. 11 it seems probable that it was written soon after tidings had come of the death of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. But this occurred in the year 164 B.C., so that Judas was alive at the time the letter was written. Calovius was betrayed into mistake by taking the date in ver. 9 as the date of the second epistle, whereas it belongs to the first (Grimm, Exeg. Handb., in loc.)

4. A son of Simon and brother of John Hyrcanus, who was murdered along with his father, or, according to Josephus, soon afterwards (1 Maccab. xvi. 2, 15, ff.; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 8. 1).

5. One of the twelve apostles, called also LEB-BÆUS or THADDÆUS (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 18), and commonly named Jude. We are not informed as to the time of the vocation of the Apostle Jude to that dignity. Indeed, the only circumstance relating to him which is recorded in the Gospels consists in the question put by him to our Lord (John xiv. 22). 'Judas saith unto him (not Iscariot), Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not unto the world?' Nor have we any account given of his proceedings after our Lord's resurrection, for the traditionary notices which have been preserved of him rest on no very certain foundation. It has been asserted that he was sent to Edessa, to Abgarus, king of Osroene (Jerome, Annot. in Matt.), and that he preached in Syria, Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Persia; in which latter country he suffered martyrdom (Lardner's Hist. of the Apostles). Jude the apostle is commemorated in the Western church, together with the Apostle Simon (the name, also, of one of our Lord's brethren), on the 8th of October.

6. THE LORD'S BROTHER.—It has been disputed whether the person so named is distinct from the Apostle Jude, or the same with him. The question is involved in considerable obscurity, but the balance of evidence seems to be in favour of their being different. [JAMES; JUDE, EP. OF.]

7. Another of the twelve apostles, the son of Simon (John vi. 71; xiii. 2, 26), called also ISCARIOT (Ἰσκαριώτης), probably from Keriōth (Iscariot = קְרִיּוֹת; comp. Ἰσραήλ = אִשְׂרָאֵל, a man of Tob, ap. Joseph. Antiq. vii. 6. 1). According to the reading of John vi. 71; xiii. 26, approved by Lachmann and Tischendorf, his father Simon bore the same designation. In the list of the apostles given by the Synoptists, Judas stands last (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 19; Luke vi. 16); and the evangelists usually fix on him the mark of his great crime by the addition of the words 'the traitor,' or 'who also betrayed him.' According to John (xii. 4-6), he had the charge of the common fund out of which the wants of Christ and his immediate followers were supplied, a trust which he abused for selfish ends. But all his other iniquities are lost in the enormous crime which has affixed a perpetual infamy to his name, the betrayal of his Master to his enemies for thirty ἀργύρια, or shekels of silver—not quite £4 sterling. This money he, shaken with remorse when he saw the result of his treason in the condemnation of his Master, returned to the Sanhedrim; by whom it was expended in the purchase of a piece of land formerly called 'the potters' field,' but after that 'the field of blood' [ACELDAMA]. This name it received from the tragic circumstances connected with the purchase of it, especially the death of Judas himself, who, harassed by remorse, went and hanged himself, and falling headlong (probably from the breaking of the rope by which he was suspended), burst asunder and his bowels gushed out (Acts i. 18).

The extraordinary nature of Judas's crime in betraying his Master, has prompted inquiry as to the motives by which he was actuated to commit it. On this subject the following observations are retained from the first edition of this work:— 'The only conceivable motives for the conduct of Judas are, a sense of duty in bringing his Master to justice, resentment, avarice, dissatisfaction with the procedure of Jesus, and a consequent scheme for the accomplishment of his own views. With regard to the first of these motives, if Judas had been actuated by a sense of duty in bringing his Master to justice for anything censurable in his intentions, words, or actions, he would certainly have alleged some charge against him in his first interview with the chief-priests, and they would have brought him forward as a witness against Jesus, especially when they were at so great a loss for evidence; or they would have reminded him of his accusations when he appealed to them after our Lord's condemnation, saying, 'I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood'—a confession which amounts to an avowal that he had never seen anything to blame in his Master, but everything to approve. Moreover, the knowledge of the slightest fault in Jesus would have served, at least for the present, to tranquillise his own feelings, and prevent his immediate despair. The chief-priests would also most certainly have alleged any charge he had made against Jesus as a justification of their conduct, when they afterwards endeavoured to prevent his apostles from preaching in his name (Acts iv. 15-23; v. 27, 28-40). The second motive supposed, namely, that of resentment, is rather more plausible. Jesus had certainly rebuked him for blaming the woman who had anointed him in the house of Simon the leper, at Bethany (comp. Matt. xxvi. 8-17; John xii. 4, 5); and Matthew's narrative seems to connect his going to the chief-priests with that rebuke (ver. 14). 'Then one of the twelve, called Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief-priests;' but closer inspection will convince the reader that those words are more properly connected with ver. 3. Besides, the rebuke was general, 'Why trouble ye the woman?' Nor was it nearly so harsh as that received by Peter, 'Get thee behind me, Satan' (Matt. xvi. 23), and certainly not so public (Mark viii. 32, 33). Even if Judas had felt ever so much resentment, it could scarcely have been his sole motive; and as nearly two days elapse between his contract with the chief-priests and its completion, it would have subsided during the interval, and have yielded to that covetousness which we have every reason to believe was his ruling passion. St. John expressly declares that Judas 'was a thief, and had the bag, and bare (that is, conveyed away from it, stole, ἐβόσκειν) what was put therein' (xii. 6; comp. xx. 15 in the original, and see a similar use of the word in Apollod. ii. 6. 2; iii. 3. 3; Joseph. p. 402. 39, ed. Huds.) This rebuke, or rather certain circumstances attending it, might have determined him to act as he did, but is insufficient, of itself, to account entirely for his conduct, by which he endangered all his expectations of worldly advancement from Jesus, at the very moment when they seemed upon the verge of being fulfilled. It is, indeed, a most important feature in the case, that the hopes entertained by Judas, and all the apostles, from their Master's expected elevation, as the Messiah, to the throne of Judæa, and, as they believed, to the empire of the whole world, were never more steadfast than at the time when he covenanted with the chief-priests to deliver him into their hands. Nor does the theory of mere resentment agree with the terms of censure in which the conduct and character of Judas are spoken of by our Lord and the evangelists. Since, then, this supposition is insufficient, we may consider another motive to which his conduct is more commonly ascribed, namely, covetousness. But if by covetousness be meant the eager desire to obtain 'the thirty pieces of silver,' with which the chief priests 'covenanted with him' (Matt. xxvi. 15), it presents scarcely a less inadequate motive. Can it be conceived that Judas would deliberately forego the prospect of immense wealth from his Master, by delivering him up for about four pounds ten shillings of our money, upon the highest computation, and not more than double in value, a sum which he might easily have purloined from the bag? Is it likely that he would have made such a sacrifice for any further sum, however large, which we may suppose 'they promised him' (Mark xiv. 11), and of which the thirty pieces of silver might have been the mere earnest (Luke xxii. 5)? Had covetousness been his motive, he would have ultimately applied to the chief-priests, not to bring again the thirty pieces of silver with the confession, 'I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood' (Matt. xxvii. 4), but to demand the completion of their agreement with him. We are now at liberty to consider the only remaining motive for the conduct of Judas, namely, dissatisfaction with the procedure of his Master, and a consequent scheme for the furtherance of his own views. It seems to us likely, that the impatience of Judas for the accomplishment of his worldly views, which we conceive to have ever actuated him in following Jesus, could no longer be restrained, and that our Lord's observations at Bethany served to mature a stratagem he had meditated long before. He had no doubt been greatly disappointed at seeing his Master avoid being made a king, after feeding the five thousand in Galilee. Many a favourable crisis had he seemed to lose, or had not dared to embrace, and now while at Bethany he talks of his burial (John xii. 7); and though none of his apostles, so firm were their worldly expectations from their Master, could clearly understand such 'sayings' (Luke xviii. 34); yet they had been made 'exceeding sorry' by them (Matt. xvii. 23). At the same time, Judas had long been convinced by the miracles he had seen his Master perform that he was the Messiah (John vii. 31). He had even heard him accept this title from his apostles in private (Matt. xvi. 16). He had promised them that when he should 'sit upon the throne of his glory, they should sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel' (Matt. xix. 28). Yet now, when everything seemed most favourable to the assumption of empire, he hesitates and desponds. In his daily public conferences, too, with the chief-priests and Pharisees, he appears to offend them by his reproofs, rather than to conciliate their favour. Within a few days, the people, who had lately given him a triumphal entry into the city, having kept the passover, would be dispersed to their homes, and Judas and his fellow-apostles be, perhaps, required to attend their Master on another tedious expedition through the country. Hence it seems most probable that Judas resolved upon the plan of delivering up his Master to the Jewish authorities, when he would be compelled, in self-defence, to prove his claims, by giving them the sign from heaven they had so often demanded; they would, he believed, elect him in due form as the King Messiah, and thus enable him to reward his followers. He did, indeed, receive from Jesus many alarming admonitions against his design; but the plainest warnings are lost upon a mind totally absorbed by a purpose, and agitated by many violent passions. The worst he could permit himself to expect, was a temporary displeasure for placing his master in this dilemma; but as he most likely believed, judging from himself, that Jesus anticipated worldly aggrandizement, he might calculate upon his forgiveness when the emergency should have been triumphantly surmounted. Nor was this calculation wholly unreasonable. Many an ambitious man would gladly be spared the responsibility of grasping at an empire, which he would willingly find forced upon him. Judas could not doubt his Master's ability to extricate himself from his enemies by miracle. He had known him do so more than once (Luke iv. 30; John viii. 59; x. 39). Hence his directions to the officers to 'hold him fast,' when he was apprehended (Matt. xxvi. 48). With other Jews he believed the Messiah would never die (John xii. 34); accordingly, we regard his pecuniary stipulation with the priests as a mere artful cover to his deeper and more comprehensive design; and so that he served their purpose in causing the apprehension of Jesus, they would little care to scrutinize his motive. All they felt was being 'glad' at his proposal (Mark xiv. 11), and the plan appeared to hold good up to the very moment of our Lord's condemnation; for after his apprehension his miraculous power seemed unabated, from his healing Malchus. Judas heard him declare that he could even then 'ask, and his father would give him twelve legions of angels' for his rescue. But when Judas, who awaited the issue of the trial with such different expectations, saw that though Jesus had avowed himself to be the Messiah, he had not convinced the Sanhedrim; and, instead of extricating himself from their power by miracle, had submitted to be 'condemned, buffeted, and spit upon' by his judges and accusers; then, it should seem, he awoke to a full view of all the consequences of his conduct. The prophecies of the O. T., 'that Christ should suffer,' and of Jesus, concerning his own rejection and death, flashed on his mind in their true sense and full force, and he found himself the wretched instrument of their fulfilment. He made a last desperate effort to stay proceedings. He presented himself to the chief-priests, offered to return the money, confessed that he had sinned in that he had betrayed the innocent blood, and upon receiving their heartless answer, was wrought into a phrenzy of despair, during which he committed suicide. There is much significance in these words of Matt. xxvii. 3, 'Then Judas, when he saw he was condemned,' not expiring on the cross, 'repented himself,' etc. If such be the true hypothesis of his conduct, then, however culpable it may have been, as originating in the most inordinate covetousness, impatience of the procedure of Providence, crooked policy, or any other bad quality, he is certainly absolved from the direct intention of procuring his Master's death. 'The difference,' says Archbishop Whately, 'between Iscariot and his fellow-apostles was, that though they all had the same expectations and conjectures, he dared to act on his conjectures, departing from the plain course of his known duty to follow the calculations of his worldly wisdom, and the schemes of his worldly ambition' (Discourse on the Treason of Judas Iscariot, and Notes, annexed to Essays on some of the Dangers to Christian Faith, Lond. 1839; comp. Lectures on the Characters of the Apostles, by the same; see also Whitby on Matt. xxvii. 3, for the opinions of Theophylact, and some of the Fathers; Bishop Bull's Sermons, ii. and iii., On some Important Points, vol. i., Lond. 1713; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. b. ii. pp. 877, 878; Macknight's Harmony of the Gospels, vol. ii. pp. 427-30, Lond. 1822; Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, in loc.)—[J. F. D.]

8. A Jew of Damascus with whom Paul lodged in a street called 'Straight.' This street has been identified with the 'Street of Bazaars,' the principal street in the modern Damascus, and one of the busiest scenes of commerce within that city (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 351; Porter, Five Years in Damascus, i. 43; Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 412). Robinson seems to speak doubtfully on this point (Lat. Bib. Res., p. 455).

9. Surnamed BARsabAS (Acts xv. 22, 27-35), a disciple who, along with Silas, was appointed to accompany Paul and Barnabas in their tour among the churches, to deliver the decrees of the apostles and elders. He and Silas are described as chosen men of the apostles' own company, as chief men among the brethren, and as prophets. Beyond this notice, nothing is known of Judas, son of Barsabas. Grotius suggests that he may have been a brother of Joseph Barsabas (Acts i. 23), which seems not improbable. Schott supposes that Sabas or Zabas is an abridged form of Zebedee, and that Barsabas, or Son of Zabas, was the designation of Jude, a brother of the elder James and John. The occurrence of the same name, however, in the case of Joseph Barsabas throws doubt on this hypothesis.

10. THE GALILEAN (ὁ Γαλιλαῖος, Acts v. 35; Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 1. 6; xx. 5. 2; De Bell. Jud. ii. 8. 1), called also by Josephus The Gaulonite (Γαυλωνίτης ὄντις, Antiq. xviii. 1. 1); the former designation being derived from the place of his education or usual residence, the latter from the place of his birth, which, Josephus says (l.c.), was the town of Gamala (cf. Krebs, Obs. in N. T. ex Joseph. p. 181). When the property census was ordered by Augustus (A.D. 6) during the prefecture of Pub. Sulp. Quirinus, Judas, in conjunction with one Sadok or Saduk, a Pharisee, headed a revolt against the Roman supremacy, calling upon his countrymen, as the people of God, not ignobly to submit to human despotism. He aimed at nothing short of a complete restoration of the theocratic polity and order of the nation as laid down in the Law of Moses (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 1. 6). A large body of ardent adherents flocked to his standard; but they were easily dispersed by Quirinus, and Judas himself was destroyed (Acts v. 37). His spirit descended, however, on his children, two of whom were crucified under Tiberius Alexander, and a third, who gave himself out as the Messiah, was also put to death (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 5. 2; Bell. Jud. ii. 17. 8, 9). In Judas, also, may be recognised the first outburst of the spirit which afterwards showed itself in the Zealots and the Sicarii; in fact, from his time forward to the destruction of Jerusalem and the scattering of the Jewish race, the outer history of the Jews is chiefly a record of the struggle of those who were zealous for the law against the encroachments of Roman power and Hellenic culture.—W. L. A.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF. The last in order in the Canon of the Catholic epistles.

1. Canonicity.—This epistle is not cited by any of the apostolic Fathers; the passages which have been adduced as containing allusions to it (Herm., Past. Vis., iv. 3; Clem. Rom., Ep. ad Cor., ch. xi.; Polycarp, Ep. ad Phil., ch. iii.) presenting no certain evidence of being such. It is, however, formally quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Pedag., iii., p. 239, ed. Sylburg; Strom. iii. p. 431), and Eusebius testifies (H. E., vi. 14) that he treated it in his Hypotyposes; it is also treated in the Adumbrationes, ascribed to Clement, and preserved in a Latin version. Tertullian refers to the epistle as that of Jude the Apostle (De Habit. Mulieb., ch. iii.). It appears in the Muratori Fragment among the Canonical books. Origen repeatedly refers to it, and occasionally as the work of the Apostle Jude (Hom. in Matt., xiii. 55, Opp., ed. De la Rue, iii. p. 403; Comm. in Ep. ad Rom., Opp. iv. p. 519; Hom. in Jos., Opp. ii. p. 411; De Princip., Opp. i. p. 138, etc.); though in one place he speaks as if doubts were entertained by some as to its genuineness (in Matt. xxii. 23; Opp. iii. p. 814). It is not in the Peshito, and does not appear to have been known to the Syrian churches before the 4th century, near the close of which it is quoted by Ephraem Syrus (Opp. Syr., i. p. 136). Eusebius ranks it among the Antilegomena, but this rather because it was not universally known than because where known it was by any regarded with suspicion (Hist. Eccl., ii. 23; iii. 25). By Jerome it is referred to as the work of an apostle (in Tit. i.; Ep. ad Paulin., iii.), and he states that, though suspected by some, in consequence of containing a quotation from the Apocryphal book of Enoch, it had obtained such authority as to be reckoned part of the canonical Scriptures (Catal. Script. Eccl.). From the 4th century onwards, the place thus conceded to it remained unquestioned (Jessen, De αὐθεντία Ἐπ. Judæ Comm. Crit., Lips. 1821; Arnaud, Recherches Critiques sur l'Ép. de Jude, etc., Strab. 1851).

There is nothing in the epistle itself to cast suspicion on its genuineness; on the contrary, it rather impresses one with the conviction that it must have proceeded from the writer whose name it bears. Another, forging a work in his name, would have hardly omitted to make prominent the personality of Judas, and his relation to our Lord, neither of which comes before us in this epistle (Bleek, Einh. in d. N. T., p. 557).

2. Author.—The writer designates himself Judas,

'the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' The former of these designations affords no help in determining whether the writer was the Apostle Jude or another person of the same name; for the phrase δοῦλος 'I. X. is neither peculiar to an apostle, nor does it exclude the supposition that the party to whom it is applied was an apostle. It is to the other designation that we must look for the decision of this question. Now, were we sure that 'Jude the brother of James' is the same person who is designated 'Jude of James' ('Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου') by Luke (vi. 16; Acts i. 13), the evidence that the writer of this epistle was the Apostle Jude would be conclusive. But there are difficulties in the way of this conclusion. For one thing, the words 'Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου' are more naturally in accordance with the usage of the language, translated 'Jude, the son of James,' than 'Jude, the brother of James.' It is, moreover, extremely improbable that an apostle of the Lord would, in writing an epistle of warning and reproof to Christians, designate himself by his family relationship to a fellow-creature, instead of assuming the authority which his divine commission as an apostle would have at once expressed and claimed. To this it may be added that, in ver. 17th, the writer seems to speak of the apostles of the Lord as a class to which he himself did not belong; for though one of their number might have expressed himself as the writer does here, the probability is on the other side. If on these grounds we conclude that the writer of this epistle was not the Apostle Jude, we are led to inquire whether he may not be the other Jude mentioned in the gospels as among 'the brethren of Jesus' (Matt. xiii. 55), and as a younger brother of James. This would remove all difficulty, were it not that it remains in dispute whether the two brothers, James and Judas, who were apostles, are not identical with the James and Judas who were among the brethren of our Lord. Into this question we cannot enter minutely here, but must refer for details to other articles in this book where both sides of the question are advocated [JAMES, 3; JAMES, EPISTLE OF; JESUS CHRIST]. Our own opinion inclines to the view that the brethren of our Lord were really sons of Joseph and Mary, and consequently, that James the son of Cleophas, and Judas [the son] of James, who were apostles, are not to be identified with the persons bearing the same names among the brethren of our Lord. We incline also to think, that the James who presided over the church at Jerusalem was not the surviving apostle of that name, but the other James, 'the Lord's brother,' as he is expressly termed (Gal. i. 19). The question may be thus briefly stated. Discounting James the son of Zebedee, respecting whom there is no dispute, the other Jameses and the Judes (omitting Judas Iscariot) may be placed thus:—

- | | |
|---|-------------------------|
| I. James, son of Alphaeus | } Apostles. |
| Jude of James | |
| II. James, President of the church at Jerusalem | } Brethren of the Lord. |
| Jude, the brother of James | |

The question is, Are the persons in No. I. the same as, or different from, the persons in No. II.? Two objections occur to their being identified:—

1. That for this purpose we must render 'Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου' in an unusual way, supplying ἀδελφός, and not υἱός; and 2. That we must understand the phrase 'brethren of the Lord,' as meaning his 'cousins,' or 'near relations.' The former of these objections is not of serious weight, because instances can be produced in which other terms of relationship besides that of son were left to be supplied in similar ellipses; and in such a case as that before us, the principle which Winer lays down may be held to operate, 'that where acquaintance with the family circumstances of any is presupposed, the relationship of father, brother, servant, may be so expressed, as well as that of son' (Gramm., sec. 66). The latter of the above objections is of more weight; for though the Hebrew usage admits of a liberal construction of terms of relationship, yet when we find that the brethren of Jesus are associated with his mother and his sisters (Matt. xiii. 55, 56), and when it is expressly mentioned that his brethren believed not on him (John vii. 5), a statement which cannot be meant to apply to persons who were actually of the number of his select disciples; the strong probability is, that the persons so designated were really the sons of Joseph and Mary, and so uterine brothers of Jesus. On the other side, it is objected that James the Lord's brother is called an apostle (Gal. i. 19), and that several of the Fathers speak of Jude, the author of this epistle, as an apostle. On this, however, much cannot be built, for the term 'apostle' is used occasionally in the N. T. in a lax way, as applicable to persons who were associated with the apostles in their work (Acts xiv. 14; Rom. xvi. 7); and persons who sustained the honourable position of being the Lord's brothers, would be especially likely to be regarded by a later age as standing on a par with the apostles, and worthy of receiving that designation. On the whole, we conclude that the writer of this epistle was not Jude the apostle (properly so called), but Jude the Lord's brother, the son of Joseph, as he is expressly designated by Clement of Alexandria (Adumbr., sub init.). His reason for describing himself as 'the brother of James,' was probably that James, from his peculiar position, was more extensively and influentially known than Jude himself was. If any should ask, Why did Jude, if he was indeed the Lord's brother, not present this his higher relationship, rather than that which he bore to James, as a claim upon the regard of those to whom he wrote? the answer may be given in the words of Clement of Alexandria:—'Judas qui catholicam scripsit epistolam frater filiorum Joseph exstans, valde religiosus, cum sciret propinquitatem Domini, non tamen dixit se ipsum fratrem ejus esse, sed quid dixit? Judas servus Jesu Christi, utpote domini; frater autem Jacobi' (Loc. cit.) The Lord Himself had taught his followers that relationship to him according to the flesh was of very inferior importance to spiritual relationship to him (Matt. xii. 48-50; Luke xi. 27, 28); and we may believe that none of those who had imbibed the spirit of his teaching would have so much as thought of resting on their earthly affinity to him for any portion of that authority which they sought to attach to their teaching. So utterly foreign is this from the spirit of the apostolic writers, that, as has been justly remarked, 'had such a designation as ἀδελφός τοῦ κυρίου been found in the address to an epistle, it would have formed a strong à priori objection to its authenticity' (Alford, Gr. Test., iv. 2; Prolegg. 190). Whilst, however, we ascribe the authorship of this epistle to one who was not an apostle, there is nothing in the epistle unworthy of an apostle's pen.

3. Contents and Design.—The epistle commences with an assertion of the necessity of zeal for, and steadfastness in, the faith once delivered to the saints; the writer then warns his readers against some who had crept in unawares, and were insinuating doctrines of an unwholesome kind; instances are adduced of the danger of apostasy, rebellion, and laxity of moral principle; a contrast is instituted between the dogmatism and audacity of the teachers he has in view, and the gentleness and modesty with which the highest of God-fearing beings speak; these wicked persons are then strongly denounced, and their evil end predicted; the believers are exhorted to continue in the faith of the gospel, in humble dependence on promised grace, and in pious efforts to preserve others from the snares of the false teachers; and the whole concludes with a solemn doxology to the only wise God our Saviour. The design of such a train of thought is obviously to put the believers to whom the epistle was addressed on their guard against the misleading efforts of certain persons to whose influence they were exposed. Who these persons were, or to what class of errorists they belonged, can only be matter of conjecture. Some, indeed (De Wette, Schwegler, Bleek), think the persons alluded to held no peculiar opinions, and were simply men of lax morals; but, from the manner in which the writer refers to them, it is evident that they were, to use the words of Dörner (Entwicklungsgesch., i. 104, E. T. i. 72), 'not merely practically corrupt, but teachers of error as well.' Their opinions seem to have been of an antinomian character (vers. 4, 18, 19), but there is nothing to connect them, except in a very vague and distant way, with any of the later gnostic systems. The writer formally charges them with 'denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ,' language which De Wette admits usually applies to error of doctrine, but which here he, without any reason, would understand of feeling and conduct. The licentious courses in which they indulged led Clement of Alexandria to think that they were the prototypes of the Carpocratians and such like: 'Of these, and such as these,' he says, 'I think that Jude spoke prophetically in his epistle' (Strom. iii. p. 431, Sylb.); but this does not imply that they had formed a system like that of the Carpocratians, but only that the notions and usages of the one adumbrated those of the other. Perhaps there have been in all ages persons who have sought by perverted doctrine to gain a sanction for sensual indulgence; and such undoubtedly were found disturbing the peace and corrupting the purity of the churches of Christ in different places as early as the second half of the 1st century. The persons against whom Jude writes were apparently of this class; but in their immorality, the practical element was more prominent than the speculative.

4. The Parties to whom the Epistle is addressed are described by the writer as 'the called who are sanctified' in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ.' Beyond this general intimation that they were Christians, however, nothing more is said to guide us to an acquaintance with them. From the resemblance of some parts of this epistle to the Second of Peter, it has been inferred that it was sent to the same parties in Asia Minor, and with a view of enforcing the apostle's admonitions; whilst others, from the strongly Jewish character of the writing, infer that it was addressed to some body of Jewish Christians in Palestine. But neither of these inferences rests on a strong basis; for one might as well conclude from the resemblances between this epistle and that of Peter, that they were not addressed to the same parties (which would seem to be superfluous), as that they were; and the Jewish colouring of the epistle may be due to the author, and have no relation to his readers. From the fact that the parties addressed seem to have been surrounded by a large and wicked population, some have supposed they may have dwelt in Corinth; while others suggest one of the commercial cities of Syria. But all this, as well as the supposition that they dwelt in Egypt, is mere conjecture.

5. The time when and the place at which the epistle was written, cannot be exactly determined. From the allusion, however, to the preaching of the apostles, we may infer that it was among the later productions of the apostolic age; for it was written whilst persons were still alive who had heard apostles preach, but when this preaching was beginning to become a thing of the past (ver. 17). 'It is not credible,' says Huther (in Meyer's Krit.-Exeg. Commentar., 12th Abt., p. 188), 'that Judas would refer to the preaching of the apostles as already past, if these were still at the height of their apostolic working.' As the writer, in speaking of the divine judgments, makes no allusion to the destruction of Jerusalem, it has been inferred that this catastrophe had not occurred when he wrote; but on this much stress cannot be laid, because the destruction of Jerusalem was not traceable to the divine wrath against the particular class of sins which Jude seeks to expose, and therefore might be passed over by him as not a case exactly in point. Attempts have been made to prove a late date for the epistle, from an alleged quotation in it from the Apocryphal book of Enoch (ver. 13); but it is by no means certain that the passage is a quotation from the book of Enoch, and scholars have yet to settle when the book of Enoch was written; so that from this nothing can be inferred as to the date of this epistle. As to the place where it was written, there is not ground for even a plausible conjecture.

6. Commentaries.—Besides those of Jacques Le Fevre d'Estaples (Antw. 1540), Calvin, and Estius, may be mentioned those of Junius, Leyd. 1599; Perkins, Lond. 1606; Jenkyn, Lond. 1652, new edition by Sherman; Martin, Lips. 1694; Schmidt, Lips. 1768; Semler, 1784; Hase, Jena 1786; Carpov, Hal. 1790; Hartmann, Cöthen 1793; Haenlein, Erl. 1799, 1804; Laurmann, Groning. 1818; Stier, Ber. 1850; Rampf, Sulzb. 1854; and the expositions in the general works of De Wette, Meyer, Alford, and Lange.—W. L. A.

* The reading ἡγαπημένους for that of the T. R. ἡγιασμένους, has been adopted on diplomatic evidence by Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Alford; but the difficulty of giving any just meaning to the clause with this reading has led De Wette and others to reject it.

JUDGES. This name is applied to fifteen persons who at intervals presided over the affairs of the Israelites during the 450 years which elapsed from the death of Joshua to the accession of Saul. The term Judges, used in the English Bibles, does not exactly represent the original שופטים shophetim, i. e., 'rulers of the people,' from שפט, which is not synonymous with דן judicare, but signifies, in its general acceptation, causam alicujus agere, tueri (see Bertholdt, Theolog. Litt. Blatt., vii. 1, sq.; comp. Gesenius, s. v. שפט). The station and office of these shophetim are involved in great obscurity, partly from the want of clear intimations in the history in which their exploits and government are recorded, and partly from the absence of parallels in the history of other nations, by which our notions might be assisted. In fact, the government of the judges forms the most singular part of the Hebrew institutions, and that which appears most difficult to comprehend. The kings, the priests, the generals, the heads of tribes—all these offer some points of comparison with the same functionaries in other nations; but the judges stand alone in the history of the world: and when we think that we have found officers resembling them in other nations, the comparison soon breaks down in some point of importance, and we still find that nothing remains but to collect and arrange the concise intimations of the sacred text, and draw our conclusions from the facts which it records.

The splendid administrations of Moses and of Joshua so fill the mind of the reader of Scripture, that after their death a sense of vacancy is experienced, and we wonder how it happens that no successor to them was appointed, and how the machinery of the government was to be carried on without some similar leaders. But when we come to examine the matter more closely, we perceive that the offices filled by Moses and Joshua, whose presence was so essential for the time and the occasion, were not at all involved in the general machinery of the Hebrew government. These persons formed no part of the system: they were specially appointed for particular services, for the performance of which they were invested with extraordinary powers; but when their mission was accomplished, society reverted to its permanent institutions and its established forms of government. It is, therefore, in the working of these institutions, after the functions of the legislator and the military leader had ceased, that we must look for the circumstances that gave rise to the extraordinary leaders which engage our present attention. Now we shall find that, apart from such offices as those of Moses and Joshua, a very excellent provision existed for the government of the chosen people, both as regarded the interests of the nation generally, as well as of the several tribes.

To this latter branch of the government it is important to draw particular attention, because, as it existed before the law, and is assumed throughout as the basis of the theocratical constitution, we hear but little of it in the books of Moses, and are apt to lose sight of it altogether. This part of the subject belongs, however, to the art. TRIBE; and it suffices to mention in this place that every tribe had its own hereditary chief or 'prince,' who presided over its affairs, administered justice in all ordinary cases, and led the troops in time of war.

His station resembled that of the Arabian emirs, or rather, perhaps, of the Khans of the Tartar tribes inhabiting Persia and the countries further east. He was assisted in these important duties by the subordinate officers, the chiefs of families, who formed his council in such matters of policy as affected their particular district, supported his decisions in civil or criminal inquiries, and commanded under him in the field of battle (Num. xxvi., xxvii.; Josh. vii. 16-18). This was, in fact, the old patriarchal government, to which the Hebrews were greatly attached. It seems to have been sufficient for all the purposes of the separate government of the tribes; but, as we find in similar cases, it was deficient in force of cohesion among the tribes, or in forming them into a compacted nation. In fact, it was an institution suited to the wants of men who live dispersed in loosely connected tribes, and not to the wants and exigencies of a nation. It was in principle segregative, not aggregative; and although there are traces of united agreement through a congress of delegates, or rather of national chiefs and elders of the tribes, this was an inefficient instrument of general government, seeing that it was only applicable or applied to great occasions, and could have no bearing on the numerous questions of an administrative nature which arise from day to day in every state, and which there should somewhere exist the power to arrange and determine. This defect of the general government it was one of the objects of the theocratical institutions to remedy.

Jehovah had taken upon himself the function of king of the chosen people, and he dwelt among them in his palace-tabernacle. Here he was always ready, through his priest, to counsel them in matters of general interest, as well as in those having reference only to particular tribes; and to his court they were all required by the law to repair three times every year. Here, then, was the principle of a general administration, calculated and designed to unite the tribes into a nation, by giving them a common government in all the higher and more general branches of administration, and a common centre of interest for all the political and ecclesiastical relations of the community.

It was on this footing that the law destined the government of the Hebrews to proceed, after the peculiar functions of the legislator and the conqueror had been fulfilled.

The fact is, however, that, through the perversity of the people, this settlement of the general government on theocratical principles was not carried out in its proper form and extent; and it is in this neglect we are to seek the necessity for those officers called Judges, who were from time to time raised up to correct some of the evils which resulted from it. It is very evident, from the whole history of the judges, that after the death of Joshua the Israelites threw themselves back upon the segregative principles of their government by tribes, and all but utterly neglected, and for long periods did utterly neglect, the rules and usages on which the general government was established. There was, in fact, no human power adequate to enforce them. They were good in themselves, they were gracious, they conferred high privileges; but they were enforced by no sufficient authority. No one was amenable to any tribunal for neglecting the annual feasts, or for not referring the direction of public affairs to the Divine King. Omissions on these points involved the absence of the divine protection and blessing, and were left to be punished by their consequences. The man who obeyed in this and other things, was blessed; the man who did not, was not blessed; and general obedience was rewarded with national blessing, and general disobedience with national punishment. The enormities and transgressions into which the people fell in consequence of such neglect, which left them an easy prey to idolatrous influences, are fully recorded in the book of Judges. The people could not grasp the idea of a Divine and Invisible King: they could not bring themselves to recur to him in all those cases in which the judgment of a human king would have determined the course of action, or in which his arm would have worked for their deliverance. Therefore it was that God allowed them judges, in the persons of faithful men, who acted for the most part as agents of the divine will, regents for the Invisible King; and who, holding their commission directly from him, or with his sanction, would be more inclined to act as dependent vassals of Jehovah than kings, who, as members of royal dynasties, would come to reign with notions of independent rights and royal privileges, which would draw away their attention from their true place in the theocracy. In this greater dependence of the judges upon the Divine King we see the secret of their institution. The Israelites were disposed to rest upon their separate interests as tribes; and having thus allowed the standing general government to remain inoperative through disuse, they would in cases of emergency have been disposed 'to make themselves a king like the nations,' had their attention not been directed to the appointment of officers whose authority could rest on no tangible right apart from character and services; which, with the temporary nature of their power, rendered their functions more accordant with the principles of the theocracy than those of any other public officers could be. And it is probably in this adaptation to the peculiar circumstances of the Hebrew theocracy that we shall discover the reason of our inability to find any similar office among other nations. In being thus peculiar it resembled the Dictatorship among the Romans; to which office indeed that of the judges has been compared; and perhaps this parallel is the nearest that can be found. But there is this great difference, that the dictator laid down his power as soon as the crisis which had called for its exercise had passed away, and in no case could this unwonted supremacy be retained beyond a limited time (I.iv. ix. 34); but the Hebrew judge remained invested with his high authority during the whole period of his life; and is therefore usually described by the sacred historian as presiding to the end of his days over the tribes of Israel, amid the peace and security which his military skill and counsels had, under the divine blessing, restored to the land.

Having thus traced the origin of the office to the circumstances of the times and the condition of the people, it only remains to inquire into the nature of the office itself, and the powers and privileges which were connected with it. This is by no means an easy task, as the nature of the record enables us to perceive better what they were not than what they were, what they could not than what they could accomplish.

It is usual to consider them as commencing their career with military exploits to deliver Israel from foreign oppression; but this is by no means invariably the case. Eli and Samuel were not military men; Deborah judged Israel before she planned the war against Jabin; and of Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, it is at least uncertain whether they ever held any military command. The command of the army can therefore be scarcely considered the distinguishing characteristic of these men, or military exploits the necessary introduction to the office. In many cases it is true that military achievements were the means by which they elevated themselves to the rank of judges; but in general the appointment may be said to have varied with the exigencies of the times, and with the particular circumstances which, in times of trouble, would draw the public attention to persons who appeared suited, by their gifts or influence, to advise in matters of general concernment, to decide in questions arising between tribe and tribe, to administer public affairs, and to appear as their recognised head in their intercourse with their neighbours and oppressors. As we find that many of these judges arose during times of oppression, it seems to us that this last circumstance, which has never been taken into account, must have had a remarkable influence in the appointment of the judge. Foreigners could not be expected to enter into the peculiarities of the Hebrew constitution, and would expect to receive the proposals, remonstrances, or complaints of the people through some person representing the whole nation, or that part of it to which their intercourse applied. The law provided no such officer except in the high-priest; but as the Hebrews themselves did not recognise the true operation of their theocracy, much less were strangers likely to do so. On the officer they appointed to represent the body of the people, under circumstances which compelled them to deal with foreigners mightier than themselves, would naturally devolve the command of the army in war, and the administration of justice in peace. This last was among ancient nations, as it is still in the East, regarded as the first and most important duty of a ruler, and the interference of the judges was probably confined to the cases arising between different tribes, for which the ordinary magistrates would find it difficult to secure due authority to their decisions.

In nearly all the instances recorded, the appointment seems to have been by the free unsolicited choice of the people. The election of Jephthah, who was nominated as the fittest man for the existing emergency, probably resembled that which was usually followed on such occasions; and probably, as in his case, the judge, in accepting the office, took care to make such stipulations as he deemed necessary. The only cases of direct divine appointment are those of Gideon and Samson, and the last stood in the peculiar position of having been from before his birth ordained 'to begin to deliver Israel.' Deborah was called to deliver Israel, but was already a judge. Samuel was called by the Lord to be a prophet, but not a judge, which ensued from the high gifts which the people recognised as dwelling in him; and as to Eli, the office of judge seems to have devolved naturally, or rather ex officio, upon him; and his case seems to be the only one in which the high-priest appears in the character which the theocratical institutions designed for him.

The following clear summary of their duties and privileges is from Jahn (Biblisches Archæologie, th. ii. bd. 1, sec. 22; Stowe's translation, ii. 86):— 'The office of judges or regents was held during life, but it was not hereditary, neither could they appoint their successors. Their authority was limited by the law alone; and in doubtful cases they were directed to consult the Divine King through the priest by Urim and Thummim (Num. xxvii. 21). They were not obliged in common cases to ask advice of the ordinary rulers; it was sufficient if these did not remonstrate against the measures of the judge. In important emergencies, however, they convoked a general assembly of the rulers, over which they presided and exerted a powerful influence. They could issue orders, but not enact laws; they could neither levy taxes nor appoint officers, except perhaps in the army. Their authority extended only over those tribes by whom they had been elected or acknowledged; for it is clear that several of the judges presided over separate tribes. There was no income attached to their office, nor was there any income appropriated to them, unless it might be a larger share in the spoils, and those presents which were made them as testimonials of respect (Judges viii. 24). They bore no external marks of dignity, and maintained no retinue of courtiers, though some of them were very opulent. They were not only simple in their manners, moderate in their desires, and free from avarice and ambition, but noble and magnanimous men, who felt that whatever they did for their country was above all reward, and could not be recompensed; who desired merely to promote the public good, and who chose rather to deserve well of their country than to be enriched by its wealth. This exalted patriotism, like everything else connected with politics in the theocratical state of the Hebrews, was partly of a religious character, and those regents always conducted themselves as the officers of God; in all their enterprises they relied upon Him, and their only care was, that their countrymen should acknowledge the authority of Jehovah, their invisible king (Judges viii. 22, sq.; comp. Heb. xi.) Still they were not without faults, neither are they so represented by their historians; they relate, on the contrary, with the utmost frankness, the great sins of which some of them were guilty. They were not merely deliverers of the state from a foreign yoke, but destroyers of idolatry, foes of pagan vices, promoters of the knowledge of God, of religion, and of morality; restorers of theocracy in the minds of the Hebrews, and powerful instruments of Divine Providence in the promotion of the great design of preserving the Hebrew constitution, and, by that means, of rescuing the true religion from destruction.'

The same writer, in the ensuing section, gives a clear view of the general condition of the Hebrews in the time of the judges. 'By comparing the periods during which the Hebrews were oppressed by their enemies, with those in which they were independent and governed by their own constitution, it is apparent that the nation in general experienced much more prosperity than adversity in the time of the judges. Their dominion continued four hundred and fifty years; but the whole time of foreign oppression amounts only to one hundred and eleven years, scarcely a fourth part of that period. Even during these one hundred and eleven years, the whole nation was seldom under the yoke at the same time, but for the most part separate tribes only were held in servitude; nor were their oppressions always very severe; and all the calamities terminated in the advantage and glory of the people, so soon as they abolished idolatry and returned to their King, Jehovah. Neither was the nation in such a state of anarchy at this time as had been generally supposed. There were regular judicial tribunals at which justice could be obtained; and when there was no supreme regent, the public welfare was provided for by the ordinary rulers' (Ruth iv. 1-11; Judges viii. 22; x. 17, 18; xi. 1-11; 1 Sam. iv. 1; vii. 1-2).

'These times would certainly not be considered so turbulent and barbarous, much less would they be taken, contrary to the clearest evidence and to the analogy of all history, for a heroic age, if they were viewed without the prejudices of a preconceived hypothesis. It must never be forgotten that the book of Judges is by no means a complete history. This no impartial inquirer can ever deny. It is, in a manner, a mere register of diseases, from which, however, we have no right to conclude that there were no healthy men, much less that there were no healthy seasons; since the book itself, for the most part, mentions only a few tribes in which the epidemic prevailed, and notices long periods during which it had universally ceased. Whatever may be the result of more accurate investigation, it remains undeniable that the condition of the Hebrews during this period perfectly corresponds throughout to the sanctions of the law; and they were always prosperous when they complied with the conditions on which prosperity was promised them; it remains undeniable that the government of God was clearly manifested, not only to the Hebrews, but to their heathen neighbours; that the fulfilling of the promises and threatenings of the law were so many sensible proofs of the universal dominion of the Divine King of the Hebrews; and, consequently, that all the various fortunes of that nation were so many means of preserving the knowledge of God on the earth. The Hebrews had no sufficient reason to desire a change in their constitution; all required was, that they should observe the conditions on which national prosperity was promised them.'

The chronology of the period in which the judges ruled is beset with great and perhaps insuperable difficulties. There are intervals of time the extent of which is not specified; as, for instance, that from Joshua's death to the yoke of Cushan Rishathaim (ii. 8); that of the rule of Shamgar (iii. 31); that between Gideon's death and Abimelech's accession (viii. 31, 32); and that of Israel's renewal of idolatry previous to their oppression by the Ammonites (x. 6, 7). Sometimes round numbers seem to have been given, as forty years for the rule of Othniel, forty years for that of Gideon, and forty years also for the duration of the oppression by the Philistines. Twenty years are given for the subjection to Jabin, and twenty years for the government of Samson; yet the latter never completely conquered the Philistines, who, on the contrary, succeeded in capturing him. Some judges, who are commonly considered to have been successive, were in all probability contemporaneous, and ruled over different districts. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to fix the date of each particular event in the book of Judges; but attempts have been made to settle its general chronology,

The whole period of the judges, from Joshua to Eli, is usually estimated at 299 years, in order to meet the 480 years which (1 Kings vi. 1) are said to have elapsed from the departure of the Israelites from Egypt to the foundation of the temple by Solomon. But St. Paul says (Acts xiii. 20), 'God gave unto the people of Israel judges about the space of 450 years until Samuel, the prophet.' Again, if the number of years specified by the author of our book, in stating facts, is summed up, we have 410 years, exclusive of those years not specified for certain intervals of time above mentioned. In order to reduce these 410 years and upwards to 299, events and reigns must, in computing their years of duration, either be entirely passed over, or, in a most arbitrary way, included in other periods preceding or subsequent. This has been done by Archbishop Usher, whose peculiarly faulty system has been adopted in the Authorized Version of the Scriptures. He excludes the repeated intervals during which the Hebrews were in subjection to their enemies, and reckons only the years of peace and rest which were assigned to the successive judges. For example, he passes over the eight years of servitude inflicted upon the Hebrews by Cushan-rishathaim, and, without any interruption, connects the peace obtained by the victories of Othniel with that which had been conferred on the land by the government of Joshua; and although the sacred historian relates in the plainest terms possible that the children of Israel served the king of Mesopotamia eight years, and were afterwards delivered by Othniel, who gave the land rest forty years, the archbishop maintains that the forty years now mentioned began, not after the successes of this judge, but immediately after the demise of Joshua. Nothing certainly can be more obvious than that in this case the years of tranquillity and the years of oppression ought to be reckoned separately. Again, we are informed by the sacred writer, that after the death of Ehud the children of Israel were under the oppression of Jabin king of Hazor for twenty years, and that afterwards, when their deliverance was effected by Deborah and Barak, the land had rest forty years. Nothing can be clearer than this; yet Usher's system leads him to include the twenty years of oppression in the forty of peace, making both but forty years. All this arises from the obligation which Usher unfortunately conceived himself under of following the scheme adopted by the Masoretic Jews, who, as Dr. Hales remarks, have by a curious invention included the four first servitudes in the years of the judges who put an end to them, contrary to the express declarations of Scripture, which represents the administrations of the judges, not as synchronising with the servitudes, but as succeeding them. The Rabbins were indeed forced to allow the fifth servitude to have been distinct from the administration of Jephthah, because it was too long to be included in that administration; but they deducted a year from the Scripture account of the servitude, making it only six instead of seven years. They sank entirely the sixth servitude of forty years under the Philistines, because it was too long to be contained in Samson's administration; and, to crown all, they reduced Saul's reign of forty years to two years only.

The necessity for all these tortuous operations

has arisen from a desire to produce a conformity with the date in 1 Kings vi. 1, which, as already cited, gives a period of only 480 years from the exode to the foundation of Solomon's temple. As this date is incompatible with the sum of the different numbers given in the book of Judges, and as it differs from the computation of Josephus and of all the ancient writers on the subject, whether Jewish or Christian, it is not unsatisfactory to find grounds which leave this text open to much doubt and suspicion. We cannot here enter into any lengthened proof; but that the text did not exist in the Hebrew and Greek copies of the Scripture till nearly three centuries after Christ, is evident from the absence of all reference to it in the works of the learned men who composed histories of the Jews from the materials supplied to them in the sacred books. This may be shewn by reference to various authors, who, if the number specified in it had existed, could not fail to have adduced it. In particular, it is certain that it did not exist in the Hebrew or Greek Bibles in the days of Josephus; for he alludes to the verse in which it is contained without making the slightest observation in regard to it, although the period which he, at the same time, states as having elapsed between the exode and the foundation of the temple, is directly at variance with it to the extent of not less than 112 years (Antiq. viii. 3). If the number '480 years' had then existed in the text, he could not, while referring to the passage where it is now inserted, have dared to state a number so very different. Then we have the testimony of St. Paul (Acts xiii. 20), who makes the rule of 'the judges until Samuel' extend over 450 years, which, with the addition of ascertained numbers, raises the amount for the whole period to 592 years. This evidence seems so conclusive that it is scarcely necessary to add any other; but it may be mentioned that Origen, in his Commentary on St. John, cites 1 Kings vi. 1, and even mentions the year of Solomon's reign, and the month in which he began to build the temple, without the slightest notice of the number of years (as now stated in the text) which intervened between that event and the exode. It has consequently been inferred, with good reason, that in A.D. 230, when Origen wrote, the interpolation of the date in question had not yet taken place. Eusebius, however, in his Chronicon, written about A.D. 325, does use the date as the basis of a chronological hypothesis; whence it is inferred that the date was inserted about the beginning of the 4th century, and probably under the direction of the Masoretic doctors of Tiberias. It is also to be remarked that Eusebius, in the Præp. Evangelica, a work written some years after the Chronicon, and in all his other works, uses the more common and ancient system of dates.

It may also be remarked that even the ancient versions, as they at present exist, do not agree in the number. The present copies of the Septuagint, for instance, have 440, not 480 years; on which and other grounds some scholars, who have hesitated to regard the text as an interpolation, have deemed themselves authorized to alter it to 592 years instead of 480, producing in this way the same result which would be obtained if the text had no existence. This, it has been already remarked, is the number given by Josephus (Antiq. viii. 3. 1), and is in agreement with the statement of St. Paul. The computation of the Jews in China has also been produced in support of it (see Isaac Voss, Dissert. de LXX. Interp. eorumque translatione et chronologia, Hagæ Comit. 1664. 4; Michaelis, Orientalische Bibliothek, v. 81). There would then be for the period from Moses's death to Saul's accession 468 years, and the whole period of the judges from the death of Joshua to that of Samuel might be estimated at 450 years, agreeably to Acts xiii. 20. If we add to these 450 years forty years for the march in the desert, eighty-four years for the reign of Saul, David, and Solomon, until the foundation of the temple, the amount would be 574 years. For the time when Joshua acted as an independent chieftain, eighteen years may be counted, which added to 574 would make up the above number of 592 years (comp. Michaelis, Orientalische Bibliothek, v. 228, whose arrangement of years differs in some points from the above). It must, however, be observed that the number of 450 years represents only the sum total of all chronologically specified facts of our book down to the death of Eli, and does not include the intervals of time of which the years are not given. The statement of Josephus above referred to rests only on his own individual computation, and is contrary to another statement of the same author (Antiq. xx. 10; Cont. Apion., ii. 2).

One of the latest attempts towards settling the chronology of the Judges is that of Dr. Keil, in his work Dörptsche Beiträge zu den Theologischen Wissenschaften, or, 'Contributions towards the furtherance of the theological sciences,' by professors of the university of Dorpat. He supports the number of 480 years in 1 Kings vi. 1, and from the invasion of Cushan-rishathaim to Jair (Judg. iii. x.) retains the chronological statements of our book for events which he considers successive. But the period of the domination of the Philistines over the (western) Israelites until the death of Saul, a space of seventy-nine years, he considers contemporaneous with the time of oppression and deliverance of the eastern and northern tribes, for which (Judg. x. 12) are reckoned forty years. He next estimates the period from the distribution of the land under Joshua to the invasion by the king of Mesopotamia at ten years, and the period from the time when the Philistines were conquered until the death of Saul at thirty-nine years, thus making up the above number of 480 years. In this attempt at settling the chronology of the book of Judges Dr. Keil evinces great ingenuity and learning; but it appears that his computations rest on historical and chronological assumptions which can never be fully established. In order satisfactorily to settle the chronology we lack sufficient data, and the task has therefore been abandoned by the ablest modern critics, as Eichhorn, De Wette, and others. Nothing beyond general views is attainable on this subject.

Having explained this matter, it only remains to arrange the different systems of the chronology of this period so as to exhibit them in one view to the eye of the reader. It has been deemed right, for the better apprehension of the differences, to make the table embrace the whole period from the exode to the building of Solomon's temple. The headings are taken from Hales, simply because, from being the most copious, they afford a framework within which all the explanations may be inserted.

JUDGES, BOOK OF, the third in the list of the historical compositions of the O. T. It consists of two divisions, the first comprising chaps. i.-xvii.; the second, being an appendix, chaps. xvii.-xxi.

1. Plan of the Book.—That the author, in composing this work, had a certain design in view, is evident from ch. ii. 11-23, where he states the leading features of his narrative. † He introduces it by relating (ch. i.) the extent to which the wars against the Canaanites were continued after the death of Joshua, and what tribes had spared them in consideration of a tribute imposed; also by alluding (ch. ii. 1-10) to the benefits which Jehovah had conferred on them, and the distinguished protection with which he had honoured them. † Next he states his leading object, namely, to prove that the calamities to which the Hebrews had been exposed since the death of Joshua were owing to their apostasy from Jehovah, and to their idolatry. † 'They forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashtaroth' (ch. ii. 13); for which crimes they were deservedly punished and greatly distressed (ch. ii. 15). Nevertheless, when they repented and obeyed again the commandments of the Lord, he delivered them out of the hand of their enemies by the Shophetim whom he raised up, and made them prosper (ch. ii. 16-23). To illustrate this theme, the author collected several fragments of the Hebrew history during the period between Joshua and Eli. Some episodes occur; but in arguing his subject he never loses sight of his leading theme, to which, on the contrary, he frequently recurs while stating facts, and shows how it applied to them; the moral evidently being, that the only way to happiness was to shun idolatry and obey the commandments of the Lord. The design of the author was not to give a connected and complete history of the Hebrews in the period between Joshua and the kings; for if he had intended a plan of that kind, he would also have described the state of the domestic affairs and of the government in the several tribes, the relation in which they stood to each other, and the extent of power exercised by a judge; he would have further stated the number of tribes over whom a judge ruled, and the number of years during which the tribes were not oppressed by their heathen neighbours, but enjoyed rest and peace. The appendix, containing two narratives, further illustrates the lawlessness and anarchy prevailing in Israel after Joshua's death. In the first narrative (chaps. xvii.-xviii.), a rather wealthy man, Micah, dwelling in Mount Ephraim, is introduced. He had a 'house of gods,' and molten and graven images in it, which he worshipped. After having, at an annual salary, engaged an itinerant Levite to act as his priest and to settle in his family, the Danites, not having as yet an inheritance to dwell in, turn in thither, seize the images, and take the priest along with them. They then establish idolatry at Leshem, or Laish, in Cœle-Syria, which they conquered, smiting the quiet and secure inhabitants with the edge of the sword. † The second narrative (chaps. xix.-xxi.) first gives an account of the brutal and criminal outrage committed by the Benjamites of Gibeah against the family of a Levite dwelling, in the age immediately subsequent to Joshua's death, on the side of Mount Ephraim; and next relates its consequence, a bloody civil war, in which all the tribes joined against the tribe of Benjamin and nearly destroyed it. The appendix then does not continue the history of the first sixteen chapters, and may have an author different from him who composed the first division of the book, to which inquiry we now turn.

2. Author.—If the first and second divisions had been by the same author, the chronological indications would also have been the same. Now the author of the second division always describes the period of which he speaks thus: 'In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes' (ch. xvii. 6; xviii. 1; xix. 1; xxi. 25); but this expression never once occurs in the first division. If one author had composed both divisions, instead of this chronological formula, we should rather have expected, 'In the days of the Shophetim,' 'At a time when there was no Shophet,' etc., which would be consonant with the tenor of the first sixteen chapters. The style also in the two divisions is different, and it will be shewn that the appendix was written much later than the first part. All modern critics, then, agree in this, that the author of the first sixteen chapters of our book is different from him who composed the appendix (see L. Bertholdt, Historisch-Kritische Einleitung in die sämtlichen Schriften des A. und N. T., p. 876; Eichhorn's Einleitung in das A. T., iii. sec. 457). The authorship of the first sixteen chapters has been assigned to Joshua, Samuel, and Ezra. That they were not written by Joshua appears from the difference of the method of relating subjects, as well as from the difference of the style. In the book of Joshua there is a continual reference to the law of Moses, which is much less frequent in the book of Judges; and in Joshua, again, there are no such inferences from history as are common in Judges (ch. iii. 1, 4; viii. 27; ix. 56). The style of the book of Joshua is neater than that of Judges; the narration is more clear, and the arrangement is better (comp. ch. i. 10, 11, 20, with Josh. xiv. 6-15, and xv. 13-19; also ch. ii. 7-10, with Josh. xxiv. 29-31). That the book of Judges was composed by Samuel is an invention of the Talmudists, unsupported by any evidence; nor will the opinion that it was written by Ezra be entertained by any who attentively peruses the original. For it has a phraseology of its own, and certain favourite ideas, to which it constantly reverts, but of which there is not a trace in Ezra. If Ezra had intended to continue the history of the Hebrews from Joshua down to Eli in a separate work, he would not have given a selection of incidents to prove a particular theme, but a complete history. The orthography of the book of Ezra, with many phases characteristic of his age, do not appear in the book of Judges. The prefix ו occurs, indeed (ch. v. 7; vi. 17; vii. 12; viii. 26); but this cannot be referred to in proof that the language is of the time of Ezra, for it belonged to the dialect of North Palestine, as Ewald and others have proved. ו, instead of אשר, is found also in Deut. xxiii. 3. Forms like עממים, ver. 14, and יבב, ver. 28, סדן, ver. 10, תנה, ver. 11, resemble Chaldaisms, but may be accounted for by the poetical style of the song of Deborah. The forms אח (ch. xvii. 2), and פלנש (ch. xix. 1), belonging to a late age of the Hebrew language, may be considered as changes introduced by copyists (see Ottmar, in Heike's Magazin, vol. iv.; W. M. L. de Wette, Lehrbuch der Einleitung in die Bibel, Berlin 1833-39, 2 vols. 8vo).

But though we cannot determine the authorship of the book of Judges, still its age may be determined from internal evidence. The first sixteen chapters must have been written under Saul, whom the Israelites made their king in the hope of improving their condition. Phrases used in the period of the Judges may be traced in them, and the author must consequently have lived near the time when they were yet current. He says that in his time 'the Jebusites dwelt with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem' (ch. i. 21); now this was the case only before David, who conquered the town and drove out the Jebusites. Consequently, the author of the first division of the book of Judges must have lived and written before David, and under king Saul. If he had lived under David, he would have mentioned the capture of Jerusalem by that monarch, as the nature of his subject did not allow him to pass it over in silence. The omission, moreover, of the history, not only of Samuel but also of Eli, indicates an author who, living in an age very near that of Eli, considered his history as generally known, because so recent. The exact time when the appendix was added to the book of Judges cannot indeed be determined, but its author certainly lived in an age much later than that of the recorded events. In his time the period of the events which he relates had been long forgotten: which may be inferred from the frequent chronological formula, 'in those days there was no king in Israel' (ch. xvii. 6); and certain particulars of his narrative could no longer be ascertained, which caused him to omit the name of the Levite whose history is given in ch. xix. In his time also the house of God was no longer in Shiloh (ch. xviii. 31); and it will be recollected that it was David who brought the ark to Jerusalem. The author knew also that the posterity of Jonathan were priests of the graven image in Dan, or Laish, 'until the day of the captivity of the land,' על יום גלות הארץ (ch. xviii. 30). This latter circumstance proves, as already observed by Le Clerc and others, that the appendix was not published until after the Babylonian captivity, or at least until after that of Israel by Shalmaneser and Esar-haddon. It cannot be understood of the domination of the Philistines over the Israelites, which would very improperly be called גלות הארץ, this expression always implying the deportation of the inhabitants of a country. The circumstance that the author in mentioning Shiloh, adds, 'which is in the land of Canaan' (ch. xxi. 12), and that the topographical description of the site of Shiloh is given (ch. xxi. 19), has led some interpreters to assert that the author of the appendix must have been a foreigner, as to an Israelite such remarks would have appeared trivial (see Briefe einiger Holländischen Gottesgelehrten über R. Simon's kritische Geschichte des A. T., edited by Le Clerc at Zurich, p. 490). The inference is certainly specious, but to judge of it duly we must look at the context. The first passage runs thus: 'And they found among the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead four hundred young virgins that had known no man, and they brought them unto the camp to Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan.' The second passage is: 'There is a feast of the Lord in Shiloh yearly, in a place which is on the north side of Bethel, on the east side of the highway that goes up from Bethel to Shechem, and on the south of Lebonah.' It appears that in the first passage Shiloh is opposed to Jabesh in Gilead, a town without the land of Canaan, and that this led the author to add to Shiloh that it was in Canaan. The second passage describes not the site of Shiloh, but of a place in its neighbourhood, where an annual feast was celebrated, when the daughters of Shiloh came out to dance, to sing, and to play on instruments of music. The author thus enabled his readers, and all those who had never been at Shiloh, to form a distinct idea of the festival, and to find its scene without the employment of a guide; his topographical observation was calculated to raise the interest of his narrative, and was consequently very proper and judicious. It cannot, therefore, authorize us to infer that he was a foreigner.

3. Character of the Book.—Parts of the work are undoubtedly taken from ancient records and genealogies, others from traditions and oral information. From ancient authentic documents are probably copied the song of Deborah (ch. v.), the beautiful parable of Jotham (ch. ix. 8-15), and the beginning of Samson's epic, or triumphal poem (ch. xv. 16). In their genealogies the Hebrews usually inserted also some historical accounts, and from this source may have been derived the narrative of the circumstances that preceded the conception of Samson, which were given as the parents related them to others (ch. xiii.). These genealogies were sometimes further illustrated by tradition, and several incidents in the history of Samson appear to have been derived from this kind of information. But on many points tradition offered nothing, or the author rejected its information as not genuine, and unworthy of belief. Thus it is that of Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, the author gives only the number of years that they governed and the number of their children, but relates none of their transactions (ch. x. 1-5; xii. 8, 9, 11, 13). In some instances the very words of the ancient documents which the author used seem to have been preserved; and this proves the care with which he composed. Thus in the first division of our book, but nowhere else, rich and powerful men are described as men riding on ass-colts רִכְבִּים עַל עֲצִירִים (ch. x. 4; xii. 14, etc.) It is remarkable that this phrase occurs also in the song of Deborah, which is supposed to have been written out in her time (ch. v. 9, 10): 'My heart is towards the governors of Israel, that offered themselves willingly among the people. Speak ye that ride on white asses, ye that sit in judgment.' In the appendix also of this book, but nowhere else, a priest has the honorary title of father given him (ch. xvii. 10; xviii. 19). But though the author sometimes retained the words of his sources, still the whole of the composition is written in a particular style, distinguishing it from all other books of the O. T. The idea of the Israelites being overcome by their enemies, he expresses often in this way: 'The anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he sold them into the hands of their enemies,' יָחַר אֵי יְהוָה בְּיִשְׂרָאֵל וַיִּמְכְּרֵם בְּיַד אוֹיְבֵיהֶם (ch. ii. 14; iii. 8; iv. 2; x. 7). A courageous and valiant warrior is described as a person upon whom rests the spirit of Jehovah, רָחַץ יְהוָה אֶת זְרַעוֹ or as a person whom the spirit of Jehovah clothed, רָחַץ יְהוָה לְבָשָׁה אֶת זְרַעוֹ (ch. vi. 34; xi. 29; xiv. 6, 19; xv. 14, etc.)

4. Authority of the Book.—It was published at a time when the events related were generally known, and when the veracity of the author could be ascertained by a reference to the original documents. Several of its narratives are confirmed by the books of Samuel (comp. Judg. iv. 2; vi. 14; xi., with 1 Sam. xii. 9-12; Judg. ix. 53 with 2 Sam. xi. 21). The Psalms not only allude to the book of Judges (comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 11 with Judg. vii. 25), but copy from it entire verses (comp. Ps. lxxviii. 8, 9; xcvi. 5 with Judg. v. 4, 5). Philo and Josephus knew the book, and made use of it in their own compositions. The N. T. alludes to it in several places (comp. Matt. ii. 13-23 with Judg. xiii. 5; xvi. 17; Acts xiii. 20; Heb. xi. 32). This external evidence in support of the authority of the book of Judges is corroborated by many internal proofs of its authenticity. All its narratives are in character with the age to which they belong, and agree with the natural order of things. We find here that shortly after the death of Joshua the Hebrew nation had, by several victories, gained courage and become valorous (ch. i. and xix.); but that it afterwards turned to agriculture, preferred a quiet life, and allowed the Canaanites to reside in its territory in consideration of a tribute imposed on them, when the original plan was that they should be expelled. This changed their character entirely; they became effeminate and indolent—a result which we find in the case of all nations who, from a nomadic and warlike life, turn to agriculture. The intercourse with their heathen neighbours frequently led the uncultivated Hebrews to idolatry; and this, again, further prepared them for servitude. They were consequently overpowered and oppressed by their heathen neighbours. The first subjugation, indeed, by a king of Mesopotamia, they endured but eight years; but the second, more severe, by Eglon, lasted longer: it was the natural consequence of the public spirit having gradually more and more declined, and of Eglon having removed his residence to Jericho with a view of closely watching all their movements (Joseph. Antiq. v. 4). When Ehud sounded the trumpet of revolt, the whole nation no longer rose in arms, but only the inhabitants of Mount Ephraim (ch. iii. 27); and when Barak called to arms against Sisera, many tribes remained quietly with their herds (ch. v. 14, 15, 26, 28). Of the 32,000 men who offered to follow Gideon, he could make use of no more than 300, this small number only being, as it would seem, filled with true patriotism and courage. Thus the people had sunk gradually, and deserved for forty years to bear the yoke of the Philistines, to whom they had the meanness to deliver Samson, who, however, loosed the cords with which he was tied, and killed a large number of them (ch. xv.) It is impossible to consider such an historical work, which perfectly agrees with the natural course of things, as a fiction: at that early period of authorship, no writer could have, from fancy, depicted the character of the Hebrews so conformably with nature and established facts. All in this book breathes the spirit of the ancient world. Martial law we find in it, as could not but be expected, hard and wild. The conquered people are subjected to rough treatment, as is the case in the wars of all uncivilized people; the inhabitants of cities are destroyed wholesale (ch. viii. 16, 17; xx.). Hospitality and the protection of strangers received as guests is considered the highest virtue: a father will rather resign his daughter than allow violence to be done to a stranger who stops in his house for the night (ch. xix.; comp. Gen. xix.).

In the state of oppression in which the Hebrews often found themselves during the period from Joshua to Eli, it was to be expected that men, filled with heroism, should now and then rise up and call the people to arms in order to deliver them from their enemies. Such valiant men are introduced by our author, and he extols them indeed, highly; but, on the other hand, he is not silent respecting their faults, as may be seen in the instances of Ehud, whom he reports to have murdered a king to recover liberty for his country (ch. iii. 16, sq.); of Gideon, who is recorded to have punished the inhabitants of Succoth and Peniel cruelly, for having refused bread to his weary troops (ch. viii. 16, 17); and of Jephthah, who vows a vow that if he should return home as a conqueror of the Ammonites, he would offer as a burnt-offering whatever should first come out of the door of his house to meet him: in consequence of this inconsiderate vow, his only daughter is sacrificed by a savage father, who thus becomes a gross offender against the Mosaic law, which expressly forbids human immolations (ch. xi. 34). This cannot be a fiction; it is no paenegyric on Israel to describe them in the manner the author has done. And this frank, impartial tone pervades the whole work. It begins with displaying the Israelites as a refractory and obstinate people, and the appendix ends with the statement of a crime committed by the Benjamites, which had the most disastrous consequences. At the same time due praise is bestowed on acts of generosity and justice, and valiant feats are carefully recorded.

But are not the exploits of its heroes exaggerated in our book, like those of Sesostrius, Semiramis, and Hercules? Their deeds are, no doubt, often splendid; but they do not surpass belief, provided we do not add to the narrative anything which the original text does not sanction, nor give to particular words and phrases a meaning which does not belong to them. Thus, when we read that 'Shamgar slew of the Philistines 600 men' (ch. iii. 31), it would have been more correct if the Hebrew שָׁמְגָר had been rendered by 'put to flight'; and it should be further recollected, that Shamgar is not stated to have been alone and unassisted in repelling the enemy: he did it, no doubt, supported by those brave men whose leader he was. It frequently happens that to the leader is attributed what has been performed by his followers. We find (1 Sam. xiii. 3) that Jonathan repulsed the Philistines, and no one doubts that it was done by the 1000 men mentioned in the beginning of the chapter. We read also (1 Sam. xviii. 7) that 'Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands,' but of course with the assistance of troops; and many more passages of the O. T. are to be interpreted on the same principle, as 1 Sam. xviii. 27; 2 Sam. viii. 2. Nor can it offend when, in the passage quoted above, it is said that Shamgar repulsed the Philistines with an ox-goad; for this was exactly the weapon which an uncultivated Oriental warrior, who had been brought up to husbandry, would choose in preference to other instruments of offence. From the description which travellers give of it, it appears to have been well suited to such a purpose [AGRICULTURE]. It is, however, chiefly the prodigious strength of Samson which to very many readers seems exaggerated, and surpassing all belief. He is, e. g., reported to have, unarmed, slain a lion (ch. xiv. 5, 6); to have caught 300 jackals

(שָׁחַלִּים), bound their tails to one another, put a firebrand between two tails, and let them go into the standing corn of the Philistines, which was thus burnt up (ch. xv. 4, 5, 8); to have broken, with perfect ease, the new cords with which his arms were bound, etc. (ch. xv. 14; xvi. 7-9, 11). Now, there is in these and other recorded feats of Samson nothing which ought to create difficulty, for history affords many instances of men of extraordinary strength, of whom Goliath among the Philistines is not the least remarkable; and for others we refer to T. Ludolf, Historia Æthiopiae, i. 10; to the Acta Dei per Francos, i. 75, 314; and to Schillinger, Missionsbericht, iv. 79. Lions were also slain by other persons unassisted, as by

David (1 Sam. xvii. 36) and Benaiah (2 Sam. xxiii. 20). The explanation of Samson's other great exploits will be found under his name [SAMSON]. It will be easy to show that, when properly understood, they do not necessarily exceed the limits of human power. Extraordinary indeed they were; but they are not alleged by the Scripture itself to have been supernatural. Those, however, who do hold them to have been supernatural cannot reasonably take exception to them on the ground of their extraordinary character. A cautious reader may, perhaps, resolve on abstaining entirely from giving his views of Samson's feats; but, at all events, he will not presume to say that they exceed human power, and are fabulous. He may say that they do not necessarily exceed human power, and are therefore neither supernatural on the one hand, nor fabulous on the other; or if he believes them above human power, he must admit that they are supernatural, and will have no right to conclude that they are fabulous. Considering the very remote period at which our book was written—considering also the manner of viewing and describing events and persons which prevailed with the ancient Hebrews, and which very much differs from that of our age—taking, moreover, into account the brevity of the narratives, which consist of historical fragments, we may well wonder that there do not occur in it more difficulties, and that not more doubts have been raised as to its historical authority (see Herder, Geist der Hebräischen Poesie, ii. 250, 59; Eichhorn, Repertorium der Biblischen und Morgenländischen Literatur, vii. 78).—J. v. JUDGMENT-HALL. ΠΡΑΤΩΡΙΟΝ occurs Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16; John xviii. 28, 33; xix. 9; Acts xxiii. 35; Phil. i. 13; in all which places the Vulgate has prætorium. The English version, however, uses prætorium but once only, and then unavoidably, Mark xv. 16, 'The hall called Prætorium.' In all the other instances it gives an explanation of the word rather than a translation: thus, Matt. xxvii. 27, 'the common hall;' margin, 'or governor's house;' John xviii. 28, 33, 'the judgment-hall;' margin, 'or Pilate's house;' Philip. i. 13, 'the palace;' margin, 'or Cæsar's court.' The object of the translators, probably, was to make their version intelligible to the mere English reader, and to exhibit the various senses in which they considered the word to be used in the several passages. It is plainly one of the many Latin words to be found in the N. T. [LATINISMS], being the word prætorium in a Greek dress, a derivative from prætor; which latter, from præto, 'to go before,' was originally applied by the Romans to a military officer—the general. But because the Romans subdued many countries and reduced them to provinces, and governed them afterwards, at first by the generals who had subdued them, or by some other military commanders, the word prætor came ultimately to be used for any civil governor of a province, whether he had been engaged in war or not; and who acted in the capacity of Chief Justice, having a council associated with him (Acts xxv. 12). Accordingly the word prætorium, also, which originally signified the general's tent in a camp, came at length to be applied to the residence of the civil governor in provinces and cities (Cic. Verr. ii. v. 12); and being properly an adjective, as is also its Greek representative, it was used to signify whatever appertained to the prætor or governor; for instance, his residence, either the whole or any part of it, as his dwelling-house, or the place where he administered justice, or even the large enclosed court at the entrance to the prætorian residence (Bynæus, De Morte Jes. Christ., ii. 407, Amst. 1696).

These observations serve to elucidate the several uses of the word in the N. T., which have, however, much exercised the ingenuity and research of many eminent scholars, as may be seen upon referring to Pitisci, Lex. Antig. Roman., s. v. 'Prætorium.' Upon comparing the instances in which the evangelists mention the prætorium, it will be seen, first, that it was the residence of Pilate; for that which John relates in ch. xviii. 28, 'Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas into the prætorium,' etc., is most certainly the same incident which Luke relates in ch. xxiii. 1, 'And the whole multitude arose and led him to Pilate,' etc. A collation of the subsequent verses in each passage will place this point beyond doubt. Nonnus says, that leaving the house of Caiaphas, they took Jesus εἰς δῶμον ἡγεμόνος, 'to the governor's house.' This residence of Pilate seems to have been the magnificent palace built by Herod, situated in the north part of the upper city, west of the temple (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 9. 3), and overlooking the temple (xx. 8. 11). The reasons for this opinion are, that the Roman procurators, whose ordinary residence was at Cæsarea (Acts xxiii. 23, etc.; xxv. 1, etc.), took up their residence in this palace when they visited Jerusalem, their tribunal being erected in the open court or area before it. Thus Josephus states that Florus took up his quarters at the palace (ἐν τοῖς βασιλείοις ἀνέστηται); and on the next day he had his tribunal set up before it, and sat upon it (De Bell. Jud. ii. 14. 8). Philo expressly says that the palace, which had hitherto been Herod's, was now called τῆς οἰκίας τῶν ἐκτελεστών, 'the house of the prætors' (Legat. ad Caium, p. 1033, ed. Franc.) Secondly, the word is applied in the N. T., by synecdoche, to a particular part of the prætorian residence. Thus, Matt. xxvii. 27, and Mark xv. 16, 'And the soldiers led Jesus away into the hall called Prætorium, and gathered unto them the whole band, and they clothed him with purple,' etc.; where the word rather refers to the court or area in front of the prætorium, or some other court where the procurator's guards were stationed. In John xix. 9, the word seems applied, when all the circumstances are considered, to Pilate's private examination room. In like manner, when Felix 'commanded Paul to be kept in Herod's prætorium' (Acts xxiii. 35), the words apply not only to the whole palace originally built at Cæsarea by Herod, and now most likely inhabited by the prætor, but also to the keep or donjon, a prison for confining offenders, such as existed in our ancient royal palaces, and grand baronial castles. Thirdly, in the remaining instance of the word, Phil. 13, 'So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the prætorium,' 'palace,' it is, in the opinion of the best commentators, used by hypallage to signify the prætorian camp at Rome, a select body of troops constituted by Augustus to guard his person and to have charge of the city, the 'cohortes prætorianæ' (Suet. Tib. 37; Claud. 10; Ner. 8; Tacitus, Annal. xii. 69); so that the words of the apostle really mean, 'My bonds in Christ are manifest to all the prætorians, and by their means to the public at large' (Bloomfield's Recensio Synopt., in loc.) The præfect of this camp was the στρατοπεδάρχης to whose charge Paul was committed (Acts xxviii. 16), as the younger Agrippa was once imprisoned by this officer at the express command of the emperor Tiberius (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6. 6; Olshausen, Topogr. des alt. Jerusalem, sec. iii. 9; Perizonius, De Origine et Significatione et usu vocum Prætoris et Prætorii, Frank. 1690; Perizonius, Disquisitio cum Ulrico Hubero, Lugdun. JUDITH (יִדְיָהּ; 'Ioudib, 'Ioudibh = JEWESS, the feminine of יִדְיָהּ, comp. Jer. xxxvi.

14. 21), the widow of Manasses of Bethulia, and heroine of the apocryphal book which bears her name and describes her as a lineal descendant of Simeon the second son of Jacob (viii. 1, 2; ix. 2). Like her progenitor, Judith, who is so celebrated for piety (viii. 6), beauty (xi. 21), chastity, and valour (xvi. 22, etc.), made no scruple whatever of employing unworthy means to avenge the honour of the Jewish nation. This, however, did not deter St. Jerome and others from regarding her victory as a type of the church overcoming the devil (cf. Ep. xxii. 21, p. 105; lxxix. 11, p. 508). According to the Vulg., Judith was the daughter of Merari, or more properly Beeri (מְעָרִי), as the Hebrew recension has it; the latter also places her in the days of Maccabæus, which is undoubtedly correct [JUDITH, BOOK OF].—C. D. G.

JUDITH, THE BOOK OF, is one of the most interesting of the Apocryphal books, and has called forth a greater variety of opinions amongst interpreters since the days of the Reformation, than almost any other of the Deutero-canonical productions.

1. Title and position of the Book.—The book is called Judith, 'Ioudib, or Judeth, 'Ioudibh, after its heroine, whose name is described as יִדְיָהּ = Jewess. St. Jerome's opinion, that it is so called because Judith was the authoress of it (Comment. in Agg., i. 6), is rightly rejected by every scholar. In the MSS. of the Alexandrine version, the Vulgate, and in Wycliff's translation, Judith is placed between Tobit and Esther. This is followed by Coverdale, the Geneva version, the Bishops' Bible, and the A. V., where, from the nature of the division, it is put between Tobit and the Apocryphal Esther. In the Vatican copies it is placed between Tobit and the Wisdom of Solomon; in the Zurich Bible, between Baruch and the Apocryphal Esther; whilst Luther puts it at the head of the Apocryphal books.

2. Design and contents of the Book.—The design of this book is to shew that as long as God's people walk in his commandments blamelessly, no matter how distressing the circumstances in which they may temporarily be placed, the Lord will not suffer the enemy to triumph over them, but will in due time appear for their deliverance, and cause even those who are not Jews to acknowledge that the God of Israel is the only true God. To see the development of this design, as well as to enable the reader to enter into the difficulties of the book, we give the following analysis of its contents:—

In the twelfth year of his reign, Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria in Nineveh, assisted by the nations who dwelled in the hill-country, by Euphrates, Tigris, Hydaspes, and by the plain of Arioch, king of the Elymeans, made war against Arphaxad, king of Media, who had fortified himself in Ecbatana (i. 1-7); and, despite the inhabitants of the countries of the west, Persia, Libanus, Anti-libanus, Carmel, Galaad, Galilee, Esdrælon, Samaria, etc., refusing their aid (8-12), conquered Arphaxad, and returned home to Nineveh in the seventeenth year of his reign (13-16). The following year, determined to carry out his resolution to wreak his vengeance on those nations who refused their aid, he dispatched his chief general Holofernes, at the head of 120,000 infantry and 12,000 cavalry (ii. 1-22), who soon subdued Mesopotamia, Syria, Libya, Cilicia, and Idumæa (ii. 23; iii. 8), and marched on Judæa (9, 10). But the children of Israel, who had newly returned from the captivity, having heard of Holofernes' atrocities, and being afraid of his despoiling the temple, determined to resist the enemy. They at once took possession of the high mountains, and fortified villages (iv. 1-5), whilst the inhabitants of Bethulia and Betomestham, according to the command of the high-priest Joachim, guarded the passes of the mountains near Dothaim (6-8); and, having made all the necessary preparations, held a solemn fast and prayed to God for protection (9-15). Enraged at their audacity in preparing to fight against him, Holofernes made inquiries of the chiefs of Ammon and Moab who this people was (v. 1-4). Achior, the leader of the Ammonites, then gives him the history of the Jews, and tells him that no power could vanquish them unless they sin against their God (5-21). The proud army, however, becomes exceedingly angry with this statement (vi. 1-9), and Holofernes orders Achior to be thrown into the Jewish camp, in order that he may be destroyed in the general destruction which was impending over the people whom he described as invincible (10-13). The Jews pick him up, and lead him to the governor of Bethulia, to whom he relates this, and who comforts him (14-21). The next day Holofernes marches against Bethulia, takes the mountain passes, seizes all the supplies of water (vii. 1-7), and lays siege to the city (8-19), which lasts forty days, when the famishing people urge upon the governor Ozias to surrender it, and he decides to do so unless relieved within five days (20-32). The pious widow Judith, however, denounces this decision as tempting the Almighty (viii. 1-31), and conceives a plan for delivering the people (32-36). Having prayed to the God of her fathers for the overthrow of the enemy (ix. 1-14), she arrays herself in rich attire, and, accompanied by her maid, who carries a bag of provision, goes to the camp of Holofernes (x. 1-11). The guards, seeing this beautiful woman, and hearing her story, conduct her to the general (12-23), whom she tells that the Jews would now be vanquished, because they had sinned against God in eating the victuals consecrated to the Temple (xi. 1-15); that she had fled from the impending destruction, and would shew him the access to the city, only requesting that she should be permitted to go out of the camp to pray in the night (16-19). Holofernes, smitten with her charms, gives her a sumptuous entertainment, and invites her to remain within the tent that night (xii. 1-20). When heavily asleep in consequence of having drunk too freely, Judith seizes his falchion, strikes off his head, gives it to her maid outside, who puts it in the bag which contained the provisions; they both leave the camp as usual under the pretence of devotion, and return to Bethulia, displaying the head of Holofernes, amidst the rejoicings and thanksgivings of the people (xiii. 1-20). Achior, hearing of this wonderful deliverance, is at once converted to Judaism, whilst Judith counsels the Israelites to surprise the enemy next morning (xiv. 1-10), who, being panic-stricken at the loss of their general, are soon discomfited, leaving immense spoil in the hands of the Jews (xiv. 11-xv. 11). The women of Israel then express their gratitude to their sister (12-13), whilst Judith bursts forth in a sublime song of praise to the God of their salvation (xvi. 1-17), whereupon all of them go up to Jerusalem to worship the Lord with sacrifices and feastings (18-20). Judith afterwards returns to her native place, Bethulia, manumits her maid, and dies at the advanced age of 105 years, greatly lamented by all the nation, whose peace no enemy dared to disturb for a long time (21-25).

3. Original language, versions, condition of the texts, &c.—That this book was originally written in Hebrew or Syro-Chaldaic, is distinctly declared by St. Jerome, who says that 'Judith is read by the Jews among the Hagiographa . . . and, being written in Chaldee (Chaldeo sermone conscriptus), is reckoned among the histories,' and that he had used a Chaldee codex to correct thereby the vitiated readings of the MSS. (Præf. ad Jud.) This is, moreover, corroborated by the Byzantine historian John Malalas (fl. circa A.D. 880), who, having embodied the contents of Judith in his Chronographia, remarks, Ταῖς δὲ ἐν ταῖς Ἑβραϊκαῖς ἐπιφύεται γραφαῖς (tom. i., p. 203, ed. Oxon., 1691). Besides, the Greek contains unmistakable indications that it was made from a Hebrew or Aramæan original, e.g., giving the Hebrew use of the relative ἐν ᾧ διέτριβεν ἐν αὐτῷ (x. 2), ὡν τὸ πλῆθος αὐτῶν (xvi. 4), the literal rendering of בְּנִיכְבָּד, ἐν τῇ παρεμβολῇ (xii. 7), which has occasioned so much difficulty to interpreters, but which is easy enough when it is borne in mind that the Hebrew preposition ב signifies at, by, near; the many Hebraisms (i. 7, 16; ii. 5, 7, 18, 23; iii. 3, 10; iv. 2, 6, 11, 13; v. 9, 12, 14, 16, 18; vii. 15, 18; ix. 8; x. 7, 23; xi. 5, 16; xii. 13, 20; xiv. 19); and the mistranslations of the Hebrew (i. 8; ii. 2; iii. 1, 9, 10; v. 15, 18; viii. 27; xv. 11). Origen was therefore misinformed when he was told that Judith did not exist in Hebrew (περὶ Τωβία καὶ Ἑχρήν ἐγγινέσθαι οὐκ ἐν Τωβία οὐ χρώνται οὐδὲ τῆς Ἰουδαίας οὐδὲ γὰρ ἔχουσιν αὐτὰ καὶ ἐν Ἀποκρύφους Ἑβραϊστικαί, ὡς ἀπ' αὐτῶν μαθόντες ἐγγυκαμεν, Ep. ad Afric., sec. 13). The Old Latin and the Syriac versions were made from the Sept., which, however, does not represent a fixed Hebrew or Aramaean original text, as may be seen from the various recensions of it differing greatly from each other. This is moreover corroborated by the fact that the Old Latin, the MSS. of which also deviated greatly from each other, and which St. Jerome corrected according to an Aramaean codex, differs materially from the Sept., sometimes having more than the latter (comp. Vulg. iv. 8-15 with Sept. iv. 10; Vulg. v. 11, 12 with Sept. v. 11-16; Vulg. v. 26-29 with Sept. v. 23-25; Vulg. vi. 15-19 with Sept. vi. 19; Vulg. vii. 18-20 with Sept. vii. 29): sometimes less (comp. Vulg. vii. 9, ff., with Sept. vii. 8-15; Vulg. v. 11, ff., with Sept. v. 17-22; Vulg. ix. 5-7, 11, ff., with Sept. ix. 7, 10). Sometimes the names are different (comp. i. 6, 8, 9; iv. 5; viii. 1); and sometimes the numbers (i. 2; ii. 1; vii. 2, etc.)* There are also extant several Hebrew recensions of Judith. Three of these have been published by Jellinek in his Beth Ha-Midrash, vols. i. and ii., Leipzig 1853, and the one which comes nearest to the Greek and Latin versions certainly removes all the difficulties against the historical character of the book contained in those versions.† Coverdale and the Bishops' Bible, following Luther and the Zurich Bible, have translated from the Vulgate, whilst the Geneva version, which is followed by the A. V., has a translation of the Greek text. The analysis in this article is also of the Greek text.

4. Historical character of the Book.—There are three theories about the nature of this book—a. That it records actual history; b. That it is pure fiction; and c. That it is a mixture of history and fiction.

a. Up to the time of the Reformation the view that this book records actual history was universally entertained. The difference of opinion which obtained during those fifteen centuries, and which still exists among the defenders of its historical character, is about the precise time when these events occurred, involving as a necessary consequence the identification of the principal characters, etc. etc. The limits of the range of time within which they have been alternately placed are 784 B.C.—117 A.D. The most ancient opinion, however, is, that the circumstances here described occurred after the Babylonish captivity, which is supported by the book itself (comp. iv. 3; v. 18, 19, Sept.; v. 22, 23, Vulg.) Still, as it does not tell who this Nebuchadnezzar was, the advocates of this view have tried to identify him with every Persian monarch in succession. Thus, St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xviii. 16), and others, take him to be Cambyses; Julius Africanus and Georgius Syncellus regard him as Xerxes; Mercator, Estius, etc., make him to be Darius Hystaspes; whilst Sulpi-cius, Severus, and others, identify him with Artaxerxes Ochus (comp. Suidas, s. v. JUDITH; Bellarm., de Verb. Dei, i. 12; Scholz, Einleitung; in die Heiligen Schriften, ii. 588, ff.) Against this view, however, is to be urged, that, 1. All these monarchs inherited the provinces which are described in this book as having been conquered for them by Holofernes, thus precluding the identity of any one of them with Nebuchadnezzar. 2. Nineveh, which is here mentioned as the capital of Nebuchadnezzar's, or the Assyrian empire, was destroyed before the Babylonish captivity, and no Assyrian or Median kingdom existed during the post-exile period. 3. The Persians, Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and Egyptians, are described as subject to the Assyrians, which could not have been after the captivity of Judah, when the Assyrian empire was wholly extinguished, and the Persians, instead of being subject to the Assyrians, had made themselves lords over them, and all the other nations of the East, from the Hellespont to the river Indus. 4. There is no point of time except the Maccabæan period when the events here recorded could possibly have occurred, since the Jews were subject to the Persians for 207 years, then were under the dominion of Alexander the Great, and finally under the Ptolemies and the kings of Syria till they obtained their independence through Judas Maccabæus, B.C. 164. To escape these difficulties, and more especially to obtain a point of time suitable for these events, Usher, Lloyd, Calmet, Montfaucon, Prideaux, Whiston, Wolff, etc., maintain that they occurred before the exile, either in the reign of Zedekiah, Manasseh, Amon, Josiah, or Jehoiakim. The general opinion, however, is, that the story is to be placed under Manasseh, and as Calmet, Montfaucon, Prideaux, Whiston, and others, will have it, after this monarch's return from Babylon. Accordingly, the events recorded in the book of Judith, and the collateral circumstances, occurred in the following order of time:—

	A.M.	B.C.
Birth of Judith	3285	719
Manasseh begins to reign	3306	698

* A very minute collation of the variations between the Vulgate and the Sept. is given by Capellus, Commentarii et Notæ Criticæ in V. T., Amstel. 1689, p. 574, etc.; and Eichhorn, Einleitung in die apokryphischen Schriften, p. 318, etc.

† They are called מדרש לחנוכה יהודית (Beth Ha-Midrash, i. p. 130-136), and מעשה יהודית (vol. ii. p. 12-22).

The Nebuchadnezzar of this book is, according to this theory, Saosduchinus, who succeeded his father Esarhaddon in the kingdom of Assyria and Babylon in the 31st year of Manasseh's reign, and Arphaxad is Deioeces king of Media. But this pre-exile view again incurs the following objections:

1. It makes Judith to be sixty-three years old at the time when she is described as 'a fair damsel' (ἡ καιρομένη ἡ καλή) captivating Holofernes (xii. 13) and ravishing the hearts of many who desired to marry her (xvi. 22). 2. It is absolutely inconsistent with chap. xvi. 23, where we are expressly told that 'there was none that made the children of Israel afraid in the days of Judith, nor a long time after her death.' For even if we take the words 'a long time after her death' to mean no more than twenty years, this would bring Judith's death to twenty years before the disastrous battle of Megiddo, wherein Josiah was mortally wounded, whereas this hypothesis places her death only four years before this calamitous event. This inconsistency is still more glaring according to the calculations of Prideaux, who maintains that Judith could not have been more than forty-five years of age when she captivated Holofernes, as this carries down her death to the 4th year of Zedekiah, when the state of the Jews had been exceedingly disturbed for several years by the Babylonians, and actually brings the period involved in the 'long time after her death' beyond the total subversion of the Jewish state. 3. Judith affirms that there was no Jew to be found in any city who worshipped idolatry (viii. 17, 18), which is incompatible with the reign of Manasseh, Amon, and the first eight years of Josiah (comp. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14-17); 4. Holofernes, the chief officer of the Assyrian army, who had only recently invaded Judæa and taken Manasseh prisoner, must surely have known something about the Jews, yet he is described as being utterly ignorant of the very name of this Jewish monarch, as not knowing the people and the city of Jerusalem, and being obliged to ask for some information about them from the Amorite chief (v. 1-3); 5. The Jewish state is represented as being under the government of a high-priest and a kind of Sanhedrim (vi. 6-14; xv. 8), which is only compatible with the post-exile period, when the Jews had no king; and, 6. The book itself distinctly tells us in chap. iv. 3, and v. 18, that the events transpired after the captivity, as is rightly interpreted by the compilers of the marginal references of the A. V., who, on this passage, refer to 2 Kings xxv. 9-11, and Ezra i. 1-3.

b. The difficulty of taking the book to record, either pre-exile or post-exile history, made Luther view it as 'a religious fiction or poem, written by a holy and ingenious man, who depicts therein the victory of the Jewish people over all their enemies, which God at all times most wonderfully vouchsafes. . . . Judith is the Jewish people, represented as a chaste and holy widow, which is always the character of God's people. Holofernes is the heathen, the goddess or unchristian lord of all ages, whilst the city of Bethulia denotes a virgin, indicating that the believing Jews of those days were the pure virgins' (Vorrede aufs Buch Judith). Grotius, elaborating upon this idea, regards it as a parabolic description of Antiochus Epiphanes' assault on Judæa—'Judith is the Jewish people (יהודית) ; Bethulia is the temple (בית אליה), the sword which went out of it, the prayers of the saints; Nebuchadnezzar signifies the devil; Assyria is pride, the devil's kingdom; Holofernes is the devil's instrument (הלפר נחש, lictor serpentis, minister diaboli);

the widow is the helplessness of the Jewish people under the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes; Joachim or Eliakim signifies God will arise (יוחם) or אל יקום) to defend Judæa and cut off the instrument of the devil who would have her corrupted.' Many of the modern writers who regard it as containing pure fiction call it either drama (Buddeus), epopee (Artropæus, Moreus, von Niebuhr, etc.), apologue (Babor), didactic poem (Jahn), moral fiction (Bauer), or romance (Berthold).

c. As the book itself, however, gives no intimation whatever that it is a fiction or an allegory, but, on the contrary, purports to be real history, as is evident from its minute geographical (i. 7; ii. 21, ff.; iii. 9, ff.; iv. 4, 6, ff.), historical (i. 5, ff.), and chronological (i. 13, 16; viii. 4; xvi. 23) descriptions, Gutmann, Herzfeld, Keil, and others, take it to contain a substance of truth embellished with fiction. And this view is supported by the fact that, 1. Notwithstanding the arbitrary and uncritical manner in which the Deutero-canonical historians dispose of their materials, they have always a certain amount of truth, around which they cluster the traditional embellishments; 2. A summary of the contents of Judith is given in the ancient Jewish prayers for the first and second Sabbaths of the Feast of Dedication—beginning with אוד כי

אין משה ונאל—and amongst the events which occurred in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and it cannot be supposed that the Jews would make it the basis of thanksgiving when the deliverance was never wrought, and the whole of it was nothing but a fiction; and, 3. There are ancient Midrashim which record the facts independently of the book of Judith. There is one in particular which gives a better recension of this book than either the Sept. or the Vulg., bears as much resemblance to the Sept. and Vulg. as these two versions bear to each other, and removes many of the difficulties against its historical truthfulness, inasmuch as it begins with chap. v. 5, and thus shews that the Sept., from which the other versions were made, has put together two different records.

5. Author and Date.—The difference of opinion upon this subject is as great as it is upon the character of the book. Whilst Wolff and others ascribe the authorship to Achior, B.C. 636-629; Huetius (in Præp. Evang. p. 217), Calmet (Dissert. Prelim. p. 142), etc., to Joshua, the son of Josedech, the companion of Zerubbabel, B.C. 536-515; St. Jerome, etc., to Judith herself; Ewald, Vaihinger, etc., to the time of John Hyrcanus, B.C. 130-128; Volkmar, who takes it to be an allegorical description of the victory of Judæas over Quietus, the delegate of Trajan, maintains that it was written for the twelfth of Adar A.D. 117-118 to commemorate this day (יום טווייניס). The fact, however, that there are several records or recensions of the events contained in the book of Judith proceeding from different authors, and deviating materially from each other, precludes the possibility of ascertaining whose productions they are. All that can be said with certainty is, that they all emanate from a Palestinian source. As the circumstances recorded are most plainly declared by the more trustworthy Hebrew copies, and in the Jewish prayers, to have occurred in the Maccabæan struggles for independency (circa 170-160 B.C.), the first and shortest record of them which was used for liturgical purposes must be contemporary with the events themselves. The poetical genius of the nation, however, soon embellished the facts in various ways, and hence the different recensions. The Greek version contained in the Sept. must have been made at a much later period, since the author of it was already ignorant of the time when these circumstances occurred, and, as we have seen, mixed up two totally different records narrating events of different periods of the Jewish history.

6. Canonicity of the Book.—Though the events recorded in Judith are incorporated in the hymnal service of the Jews called יְצִירָה, yet the book itself was never in the Jewish canon. The distinction, however, which the Jewish synagogue kept up between treating the book with respect and putting it into the canon, could not be preserved in the Christian church. Hence Judith, which was at first quoted with approbation by Clemens Romanus (Ep. c. 55), was gradually cited on an equality with other Scripture by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. iv.), Tertullian (De Monog. c. 17), Ambrose (De Offi. Minist. iii. 13), and Augustine (De Doctrina Christiana, ii. 8), and finally was canonised, in the councils of Carthage, by Innocent I. of Rome, under Gelasius, and of Trent. Some will have it that this book is quoted in the N. T. (comp. Judith viii. 4, ff., with I Cor. ii. 10, ff.; Judith ix. 12 with Acts iv. 24; Judith xvi. 17 with Matt. xii. 42, 50).

JULIA (Ἰουλίᾱ, a name common among the Romans), a Christian woman of Rome, to whom St. Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi. 15); she is named with Philologus, and is supposed to have been his wife or sister. Some have supposed this to be the name of a man, but the analogy of the following words, 'Nereus and his sister,' is against this.

JULIUS (Ἰούλιος), the centurion who had the charge of conducting Paul as a prisoner to Rome, and who treated him with much consideration and kindness on the way (Acts xxvii. 1, 3). [AUGUSTUS' BAND.]

JUNIAS (Ἰουνίας), a person who is joined with Andronicus in Rom. xvi. 7. It is disputed whether Ἰουνίας here is the name of a woman (Junia), or of a man (Junius or Junianus). Both names were common, and there is nothing in the passage to determine which should be preferred here. Grotius follows Chrysostom in adopting the former, but the majority of interpreters prefer the latter. The apostle describes the party named as, with Andronicus, a relation of his own, and as held in esteem among the apostles. They also shared with the apostle in one of his imprisonments, but which is unknown.—W. L. A.

JUNIPER. [ROTHEM.]

JUNIUS, FRANÇOIS DU JON, a French scholar and theologian, was born at Bourges, May 1st, 1545. Having studied jurisprudence in his native town, he repaired to Lyons, hoping to join there the ambassador whom the king sent to Constantinople. But he was too late. Having remained some time in the place, he returned to Bourges. He then repaired to Geneva, with the intention of devoting himself to the study of theology. In 1565 he became minister of the Walloon Church at Antwerp; and was afterwards Protestant pastor at Limbourg, whence he went to Heidelberg, and superintended a small church in the neighbourhood. In 1568 he went to the Low Countries, and officiated as chaplain to the Prince of Orange. Returning to his church in the Palatinate, he remained there till 1573, when the elector Palatine Frederick III. called him to Heidelberg to work upon a Latin version of the O. T. along with Tremellius. In 1578 he was sent to Neustadt, where he taught in the college newly established by the elector, for sixteen months. Repairing thence to Otterbourg, in order to found a Reformed Church, he returned to Neustadt, whence he was called to the chair of theology at Heidelberg. Having been taken to France by the Duke de Bouillon, he was charged by Henry IV. with a mission to Germany. Returning to his native country with the purpose of settling at Bourges, he was requested by the magistrates of Leyden, as he passed through their city, to accept the chair of theology. He died there of the plague, October 13th, 1602.

Junius was a man of extensive erudition. He was well acquainted with the ancient languages; and as a theologian, was distinguished by good judgment, moderation, and tolerance. His disposition was kindly and benevolent. The number and character of his works shew vast industry and multifarious learning.

His principal work, which he executed in conjunction with Tremellius, was his Latin translation of the O. T. It appeared in five parts, the first containing the five books of Moses, Frankfurt 1575, folio; the second, embracing the historical books, 1576; the third, the poetical books, 1579; the fourth, the prophets, 1579; and the fifth, the Apocryphal books, 1579. After the death of Tremellius, the translation was revised by his colleague and printed at London, 1584, 8vo. In the course of twenty years it passed through twenty editions, and was printed for the last time at Zurich, 1764, 8vo. Junius lived to superintend a third edition, 1596, folio; but the best is that called the seventh, published in 1624, folio, containing a good index by Paul Tossanus. The index was published in a volume by itself at Frankfurt, 1687, folio, and repeatedly after. The translation cannot be called elegant. It is too literal, and is sometimes obscure on that account. It is also disfigured with useless glosses and rabbinical traditions. He wrote besides, Apocalypses Analysis, 1592; Grammatica Linguae Hebraeae, 1593, 3d edition; Acta Apostolorum et epistola 2 S. Pauli ad Corinth. ex Arabica translatione Latine reddita; Procataclema ad V. T. interpretationem; Prælectiones in 3 priora capita Geneseos; Explicatio 4 priorum psalmorum; Psalms 101, seu principis Christiani institutio; Comment. in Ezechielem; Expositio Danidis; Lectiones in Jonam; Sacra Parallela; Nota in epistolam S. Jude. His Opera theologica appeared at Geneva, 1613, 2 vols. folio, containing an autobiography written about 1592, with curious particulars of his life.—S. D.

JUNIUS, FRANCIS, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg, 1589. In early life he studied mathematics with a view to the military profession; but the peace of 1609 caused him to turn his attention to literature and theology. After finishing his studies he went to France to visit his parents. In 1620 he came over to England, and was received into the house of the Earl of Arundel, where he lived as his librarian for thirty years. In 1650 he returned to the Continent, in order to pass some time in the bosom of his family. For two years he lived in Friesland, in a district where the ancient Saxon tongue was preserved, that he might study the language. In 1675 he returned to England, and in 1676 went to Oxford, whence he retired to Windsor, to his nephew Isaac Vossius, and died there, November 19, 1677.

Junius the younger was a very learned philologist, simple and pure in his manners, without ambition. He is said to have studied fourteen hours a day, and to have suffered no inconvenience from so sedentary a life. He wrote De pictura Veterum, libri iii., Amsterdam 1637, 4to; Observationes in Willeramii Paraphrasim Francicam Cantici Canticorum, 1655, Amsterdam, 8vo; Annotationes in harmoniam latino-francicam quatuor evangelistarum latine a Tatiano confectam, Amsterdam 1655, 8vo; Quatuor D. N. J. C. Evangeliorum Versiones perantiquæ duæ, gothica scilicet et anglo-saxonica, etc.; Accedit et glossarium gothicum: cui præmittitur alphabetum gothicum runicum, anglo-saxonicum, etc., Dordrecht 1655, 4to; Cædemonis Paraphrasis poetica Geneseos, Amsterdam 1655, 4to. His Etymologicum Anglicanum was edited by Edward Lye, Oxford 1743, folio.—S. D.

JUPITER (Ζεύς, LXX.), the father and king of gods and men, and the supreme ruler of the Hellenic race, to whom the Jews, under Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, were to be compelled to do honour. It is stated in 2 Maccab. vi. 1, 2, 'that the king sent an old man of Athens' (Ἀθηναῖον, LXX.; Antiochenum, Vulg.) to compel the Jews to depart from the laws of their fathers, and not to live after the laws of God; and to pollute also the Temple in Jerusalem, and to call it the temple of Jupiter Olympius (Διὸς Ὀλυμπίου), and that in Gerizim, of Jupiter the defender of strangers (Διὸς Ξενίου, LXX.; hospitator, Vulg.), as they did desire that dwell in the place. Olympius was a very common epithet of Zeus, and he is sometimes simply called Ὀλύμπιος (Hom. Il., xix. 108).

* Some say 'an old man, Athenæus' (cf. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. JERUSALEM, vol. i., p. 1000); but Grotius, following the Latin, suggests instead of Ἀθηναῖον to read Ἀντιόχειον.

Olympia was the name of the temple and sacred grove of Zeus Olympius, and it was here that the famous statue of gold and ivory, the work of Pheidias, was erected. Caligula attempted to have this statue transferred to Rome, and it was only preserved in its place by the assurance that it would not bear removal (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 1. 1). Antiochus Epiphanes, as related by Athenæus, surpassed all other kings in his worship and veneration of the gods, so that it was impossible to count the number of the statues he erected. His especial favourite was Zeus. He commenced, in B.C. 174, the completion of the temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens (Polyb. Reliq. xxvi. 10; Livy, Hist. xli. 20), and associated the worship of Jupiter with that of Apollo at Daphne, erecting a statue to the former god resembling that of Pheidias at Olympia (Amm. Marcell., xxii. 13. 1). Games were celebrated at Daphne by Antiochus, of which there is a long account in Polybius (Reliq. xxxi. 3) and Athenæus (v. 5). Coins also were struck referring to the god and the games (Mionnet, vol. v., p. 215; Müller, Antiq. Antioch., pp. 62-64). On the coins of Elis the wreath of wild olive (κόρυμβος) distinguishes Zeus Olympius from the Dodonæan Zeus, who has an oak wreath.

Antiochus, after compelling the Jews to call the temple of Jerusalem the temple of Jupiter Olympius, built an idol altar upon the altar of God. Upon this altar swine were offered every day, and the broth of their flesh was sprinkled about the temple (1 Maccab. i. 47; 2 Maccab. vi. 5; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 5. 4; xiii. 8. 2; Bell. Jud. i. 1. 2). The idol altar which was upon the altar of God (τὸν βωμὸν δὲ ἡν ἐπὶ τοῦ θνατοῦστος) was considered by the Jews to be the 'abomination of desolation' (βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως, 1 Maccab. i. 54) foretold by Daniel (xi. 31; xii. 11) and mentioned by our Lord (Matt. xxiv. 15). Many interpretations of the meaning of this prophecy have been given. [ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.]

The grove of Daphne was not far from Antioch (Ἀδφνη ἡ πρὸς Ἀντιόχειαν, 2 Maccab. iv. 33; Joseph. Bell. Jud. i. 12. 15), and at this city Antiochus Epiphanes erected a temple for the worship of Jupiter Capitolinus [DAPHNE]. It is described by Livy as having its walls entirely adorned with gold (xli. 20). To Jupiter Capitolinus the Jews, after the taking of Jerusalem, in whatever country they might be, were compelled by Vespasian to pay two drachmæ [DRACHM], as they used to pay to the temple at Jerusalem (Joseph. Bell. Jud. vii. 6. 6; Dion Cass. lxxvi. 7). Hadrian, after the second revolt of the Jews, erected a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in the place where the temple of God formerly stood (Dion Cass. lxxix. 12). There is, probably, reference made to Jupiter Capitolinus in Dan. xi. 38, alluding to Antiochus Epiphanes. 'But in his estate shall he worship the god of forces' (fortresses, מְצֻדָּה, cf. Gesen. s. v. מְצֻדָּה, p. 1011), for under this name Jupiter was worshipped by the victorious general on his return from a campaign, and it was in honour of Jupiter Capitolinus that he celebrated his triumph. Other conjectures have been made relative to this passage, but the opinion of Gesenius seems most probable. [MAUZZIM.]

In the passage from 2 Maccab. above quoted a temple was also ordered to be set up to Zeus Xenius on Mount Gerizim. Josephus gives a different account. He relates that the Samaritans, who, when it pleased them, denied that they were of the kindred of the Jews, wrote to Antiochus the god (θεός on coins) Epiphanes, begging him to allow the temple on Mount Gerizim, which had no name (ἀνώνυμος ἱερόν; cf. 'Ye worship ye know not what,' John iv. 22), to be called the temple of Jupiter Hellenius (Antiq. xii. 5. 5). This petition is said to have been granted. The epithet ἑλληνος is given to Zeus as the supporter of hospitality and the friend of strangers (Plutarch, Amator. 20; Xen. Anab. iii. 2. 4; Virg. Æn. i. 735, etc.), and it is explained in 2 Maccab. by the clause 'as they did desire (A. V.; καθὼς ἐθύσαντο, as they were; prout erant hi, Vulg. [as they were]) who dwelt in the place.' Ewald supposes that Jupiter was so called on account of the hospitable disposition of the Samaritans (Geschichte, iv. p. 339, note), whilst Jahn suggests that it was because the Samaritans in their letter to Antiochus Epiphanes said that they were strangers in that country (Hebrew Commonwealth, vol. i. p. 319). Grotius says because the dwellers of the place were pilgrims from the regions of Mysia and Mesopotamia, specially referring to their idolatrous practices (2 Kings xvii. 24, sq.)

The appearance of the gods upon earth was very commonly believed among the ancients. Accordingly we find that Jupiter and Mercury are said to have wandered in Phrygia, and to have been entertained by Baucis and Philemon (Ov. Met. viii. 611, sq.) Hence the people of Lyconia, as recorded in the Acts (xiv. 11), cried out 'The gods have come down to us in the likeness of men; and they called Barnabas, Jupiter, and Paul, Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker.' Barnabas was probably identified with Jupiter, not only because Jupiter and Mercury were companions (Ov. Fast. v. 495), but because his personal appearance was majestic (Chrysostom, Hom. xxx.; Alford, Acts xiv. 12). Paul was identified with Mercury as the speaker, for this god was the god of eloquence (Horat. lib. i. od. x. 5, etc.) [MERCURIUS]. The temple of Jupiter at Lystra appears to have been outside the gates (τοῦ ἁδὸς τοῦ ὄρους πρὸ τῆς πόλεως, Acts xiv. 13), as was frequently the custom (Strab. xiv. 4; Herod. i. 26), and the priest being summoned, oxen and garlands were brought, in order to do sacrifice with the people to Paul and Barnabas, who, filled with horror, restrained the people with great difficulty. It is well known that oxen were wont to be sacrificed to Jupiter (Il. ii. 402; Virg. Æn. iii. 21; ix. 627; Xen. Cyrop. vii. 3, 11, etc.)

The word εὐδία (fair or fine weather) is derived from εὖ and Δία. Jupiter, as lord of heaven, had power over all the changes of the weather. The Latins even used his name to signify the air—sub Dio (Hor. lib. ii. od. iii. 23), sub Jove frigido (Hor. lib. i. od. i. 25, etc.; comp. 'the image which fell down from Jupiter,' A. V.; καὶ τοῦ διωκερός, Acts xix. 35). The word εὐδία occurs in Matt. xvi. 2, and in Ecclus. iii. 15. (For a full account of Jupiter and Zeus, see Smith's Dict. of Biography, s. vv.; and for a list of the epithets applied to this god, see Rawlinson, Herod. vol. i., appendix, p. 680.)—F. W. M.

JURIEU, PIERRE, was born at Mer, near Blois, December 24, 1637, of which place his father was Protestant minister. He commenced his studies at Saumur, where he became M.A. when barely nineteen, and continued them in Holland and England, in which latter country, according to Moréri, he received Episcopal ordination, but on being recalled to succeed his father in the pastorate at Mer, was reordained according to the Genevan form. He was already known as a distinguished scholar, and was chosen professor of theology in the university of Sedan in 1674, where he shortly afterwards obtained the chair of philosophy for the famous Bayle, whose correspondence with his favourite pupil Basnage had caused him to entertain a high opinion of his abilities. The university of Sedan having been suppressed by Louis XIV. in 1681, Jurieu followed his colleague Bayle to Rotterdam, where he became pastor of the Walloon Church, and then, by Bayle's influence, professor of theology in the newly established academy. While resident in France he had made himself known as one of the ablest and most zealous defenders of the reformed faith, though the ardour with which he maintained the necessity of baptism for salvation had displeased the leaders of the Protestant Church, by whom his thesis was condemned at the synod of Saintonge. His natural irritability was much exasperated by the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685, which deprived him of all hope of returning to France, and his life was thenceforward one perpetual scene of varying controversy, in which friend or foe, Protestant or Catholic, received the same severe handling, and were denounced with a rancorous hostility very unbecoming a Christian minister. His suspicious irritability at last amounted to a disease, under which both his mental and bodily powers gradually gave way, and after a languishing illness of some years, he died at Rotterdam, January 11, 1713, at the age of seventy-five. His private life was characterised by many virtues. His beneficence exceeded his means, and he employed his considerable influence with foreign courts for the relief of the sufferings of his exiled Protestant brethren.

As an author, his fame rests chiefly on his controversial writings, which, apart from their undue harshness, sometimes amounting to rancour towards his adversaries, merit much commendation. His learning was profound; his quotations exact; and his acuteness in discovering the weak points in the writings of his antagonists very considerable. None of his works deal with Scripture definitely, but they are held in esteem by theologians of every school as a storehouse of exact learning to be used with advantage in illustration and exposition of Holy Writ. The principal of them are—(1.) Préservatif contre le changement de religion, Rouen 1680, in reply to Bossuet's Exposition de la Foi; (2.) Politique du clergé de France pour détruire la religion protestante, Amst. 1681; and its sequel (3.) Les derniers efforts de l'innocence affligée, Rott. 1682; (4.) Histoire de Calvinisme et du Papisme mise en parallèle, a reply to Maimbourg, Rott. 1682; (5.) L'Esprit de M. Arnauld, Rott. 1684; and (6.) Justification de la morale des Réformés, Hag. 1685; (7.) L'accomplissement des prophéties, Rott. 1686, a commentary on the Apocalypse, fixing the downfall of the Papacy in less than three years and a half; followed in 1688 by (8.) Lettres Pastorales aux fidèles de France; (9.) Le Tableau du Socinianisme, Hague 1691, answered by Jaquelot; (10.) La religion du Latitudinaire, Rott. 1696.

a violent attack on Saurin for supposed antitrinitarian views; (11.) Examen de l'Eucharistie de l'Eglise Romain, Rott. 1683; (12.) Traité de morale, Hague 1687; (13.) Traité de l'amour de Dieu, Rott. 1700; (14.) Histoire critique des dogmes et des cultes, Amst. 1704, perhaps his most valuable work, which has been translated into English. Jurieu also condensed Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent, which was published at Geneva in 1682.—E. V.

JUSHAB-HESED (יֵשׁוּב־הֶסֶד, Mercy is returned; LXX. 'Ασσηδ; Alex. 'Ασσηδωδ; Vulg. Josab-hesed), usually regarded as the proper name of one of the returned captives, son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 20); and if so, given most probably in anticipation of the return of the captivity, and expressive, therefore, of faith in the divine promise and prophecy, as well as designed to mark and commemorate the mercy of God returned to Israel to restore them to their own land.

Why the five children of this verse should be reckoned separately from the three named in the 19th has been considered a great difficulty; and it has been suggested that these five were sons of Zerubbabel by a different wife, or that they were born after the return from captivity. A more likely conjecture is, that the text in this place is corrupt, which derives confirmation from the circumstance that the conjunction and, is omitted before Jushab-Hesed, although occurring before every other name in the two verses. Dathe makes two names of Jushab-Hesed. It is probably not a proper name at all, but a phrase expressive of gratitude. And we hazard the additional conjecture, that יֵשׁוּב־הֶסֶד, five, of ver. 20, has, by a blunder of the scribe, changed places with יֵשׁוּב־שֶׁשׁ, six, of ver. 22; for Shemaiah has in reality only five sons, while, if we take Jushab-Hesed as just proposed, Zerubbabel has six.—L. J.

JUSTI, KARL WILHELM, a Protestant theologian, was born at Marburg, 14th January 1767. After studying for some years in his native place and at Jena, he became a private tutor at Metzlar, whence he removed to Marburg as a preacher in one of the churches there, 1790. In 1793 he was chosen professor of philosophy in the university. In 1801 he was appointed archdeacon; soon after Superintendent and Consistorialrath. In 1814 he was made Oberpfarrer; and in 1822 professor of theology. He died 7th August 1846. Justi devoted himself to the explanation of the O. and N. T., after the method of Eichhorn and Herder, to whom he was by no means equal in genius. He was a man of erudition, taste, and liberality, superficial rather than profound. The prophets of the O. T. occupied his chief attention. He published Nationalgesänge der Hebräer, 1803-1818, 3 vols.; an enlarged edition of Herder's Geist der Hebräischen poesie, 1829, 2 vols.; Blumen althebräischer Dichtkunst, 1809, 2 vols.; and Sionitischen Harfenklänge, 1829.—S. D.

JUSTUS (Ἰούστος). 1. Surnamed Barsabas. [JOSEPH.] 2. A Christian at Corinth, with whom Paul lodged (Acts xviii. 7). 3. Called also JESUS, a believing Jew, who was with Paul at Rome when he wrote the Colossians (Col. iv. 11). The apostle names him and Marcus as being at that time his only fellow-labourers.

JUTTAH (יֻטָּה; 'Irāy; Alex. Ierrā; Jota in Josh. xxi. 16, יֻטָּה; Tav; Jeta—perhaps 'inclined' from יָנַח, an ancient town of Judah, mentioned in the group with Maon and Carmel (Josh. xv. 55). It was allotted to the priests (xxi. 16). Reland suggests that this may be the πόλις Ἰούδα of Luke, the native place of John the Baptist (i. 39). Reland would translate the phrase 'city of Jutah,' the Greek δ taking the place of the Hebrew ב, or perhaps Ἰούδα being adopted as a softer form than Ἰούρα (Reland, Pal., p. 870). Jutta was a sacerdotal city, and Zacharias was of the priestly line. Joshua says that Jutta was in the 'mountains' of Judah (xv. 48); and Luke states that Mary went into 'the hill country' (ἐς τὴν ὄρειν). So far Reland's view appears probable. But it is only a hypothesis; and it seems more natural to render ἐς πόλιν Ἰούδα, 'to a city of Judah,' than 'to the city of Jutah' (cf. Matt. ii. 6), especially as no place of residence is mentioned for Zacharias in ver. 23 (Alford, in loc.). In the time of Eusebius and Jerome, Jutta (called by them 'Ierrāy, and Jetan; Onomast., s. v.) was a very large village, eighteen miles from Eleuthropolis southward, on the road to Darom. There can be no doubt of its identity with the modern Yutta (يُطَّا), a large village situated on the declivity of a hill about five miles south of Hebron (Robinson, B. R., i. 494, note; ii. 206, note).—J. L. P.

KAB. [CAB; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.]

KABBALAH (קַבָּלָה), the celebrated system of religious philosophy, or more properly theosophy, which has played so important a part in the theological and exegetical literature of both Jews and Christians ever since the middle ages.

1. Name and its signification.—The term קַבָּלָה (from קָבַל, to receive), properly denotes reception, then a doctrine received by oral tradition. The difference between it and the word מַסּוּרָה (from מָסַר, to deliver) is, that the former expresses the act of receiving, whilst the latter denotes the act of giving over, surrendering, transmitting. The Kabbalah is also called by some נִסְתָּרָה, secret wisdom, because it pretends to be a very ancient and secret tradition, and יָדוּעַ, grace, from the initials of these two words.

2. The fundamental doctrines of the Kabbalah.—The cardinal doctrines of the Kabbalah are as follows:—God is above everything, even above being and thinking. It cannot, therefore, be said of him that he has either a will, intention, desire, thought, language, or action, since these properties, which adorn man, have limits, whereas God is in every way boundless, because he is perfect. Owing to this boundlessness of his nature, which necessarily implies absolute unity and immutability, and that there is nothing without him, i. e., that the רוּחַ is in him, he is called EN SOPH = without end, boundless, and can neither be comprehended by the intellect nor described with words, for there is nothing which can grasp and depict him to us. In this incomprehensibility or boundlessness, God, or the En Soph (אֵן סוֹפִי), is in a certain sense not existent (אֵין); since, as far as our mind is concerned, that which is incomprehensible does not exist. Hence, without making himself comprehensible, his existence could never have been known. He had, therefore, to become active and creative in order that his existence might become perceptible.

But since, on the one hand, the will to create, which implies limit, and the circumscribed and imperfect nature of this world, preclude the idea of taking it as the direct creation of him who can have no will, nor produce anything but what is like himself, boundless and perfect; and since, on the other hand, the beautiful design and order displayed in the world, which plainly indicate an intelligent and active will, forbid us to regard it as the offspring of chance, the En Soph must be viewed as the Creator of the world in an indirect manner, through the medium of ten Sephiroth (סְפִירוֹת) * or intelligences, which emanated from the En Soph in the following manner.

From his infinite fulness of light the En Soph sent forth at first one spiritual substance or intelligence; this intelligence, which existed in the En Soph from all eternity, and which became a reality by a mere act, contained the nine other intelligences or Sephiroth. Great stress is laid upon the fact that the first Sephira was not created, but was simply an emanation (אֵצִיּוּלָה); and the difference between creation and emanation is thus defined, that in the former a diminution of strength takes place, whilst in the latter this is not the case. From the first Sephira emanated the second, from the second the third, from the third the fourth, and so on, one proceeding from the other, till the number ten. These ten Sephiroth form among themselves, and with the En Soph, a strict unity, and simply represent different aspects of one and the same Being, just as the flame and sparks which proceed from the fire, and which appear different things to the eye, form only different manifestations of one and the same fire. Differing thus from each other simply as different colours of the same light, all the ten emanations alike partake of the perfections of the En Soph. They are boundless, and yet constitute the first finite things, so that they are both infinite and finite. They are infinite and perfect like the En Soph when he imparts his fullness to them, and finite and imperfect when that fullness is withdrawn from them. The finite side in the emanation of the Sephiroth is absolutely necessary, for thereby the incomprehensible En Soph makes his existence known to the human intellect, which can only grasp that which has measure, limit, and relation. From their finite side the Sephiroth may even be called bodily, and this renders it possible for the En Soph, who is immanent in them, to assume a bodily form.

The ten Sephiroth, every one of which has its own name, are divided into three groups of three Sephiroth each, respectively operating upon the three worlds, viz., the world of intellect (עוֹלָם הַשֵּׁל), the world of souls (עוֹלָם הַנְּפֹשׁ), and the world of matter (עוֹלָם הַמַּבְע). The first group operates upon the intellectual world, and consists of Sephiroth 1, denominated כְּתֹרֶת מְעֻלָּה, the inscrutable height or the crown; 2, called חֲכָמָה, the creative wisdom; and 3, called בִּינָה, the conceiving intellect. From the first Sephira the divine power proceeds, from the second the angelic beings, as well as the Jewish revelation (תּוֹרָה), and from the third the prophetic inspiration. The second group exercises its power upon the moral world, and consists of Sephiroth 4, called חֶסֶד, infinite love; 5, called נְבוֹרָה, divine justice, or judicial power; and 6, which is called תְּפָאֶרֶת, beauty, and is the connecting link between the opposite Sephiroth 4 and 5. The third group exercises its power upon the material world, and consists of Sephiroth 7, called נִצְחָה, firmness; 8, called רִדְּהָ, splendour; and 9, which is called יְסוֹד, the primary foundation, and is the connecting link between the two opposite Sephiroth, 7 and 8. Sephira 10 is called מַלְכוּת, kingdom, and denotes Providence or the revealed Deity (שְׂכִינָה) which dwells in the midst of the Jewish people, goes with them and protects them in all their wanderings and captivities. The first triad is placed above, and the second and third triads, with the unit, are put below, in such a manner that the four Sephiroth called crown, beauty, foundation, and kingdom, form a central perpendicular line denominated the middle pillar (עֶמֶד אֲמֻנָּה). This division yields three different forms in which the ten Sephiroth are represented by the Kabbalists, and which we subjoin in order to make the description more intelligible.

The first represents an inverted tree called עֵץ חַיִּים, the tree of life, whilst the second and third are human figures called אָדָם קֶדְמֹן, the primeval man. Yet, notwithstanding the different appearance of these three forms, the Sephiroth are so arranged that the three triads and the middle pillar are to be distinguished in each one of them.

These Sephiroth, or God through them, created the lower and visible world, of which everything has its prototype in the upper world. 'The whole world is like a gigantic tree full of branches and leaves, the root of which is the spiritual world of the Sephiroth; or it is like a firmly united chain, the last link of which is attached to the upper world; or like an immense sea, which is being constantly filled by a spring everlastingly gushing forth its streams.' The Sephiroth, through the divine power immanent in them, uphold the world which they have created, and transmit to it the divine mercies by means of twelve channels (צְנֻרוֹת). This transmission of the divine mercies can be accelerated by prayer, sacrifices, and religious observances; and the Jewish people, by virtue of the revelation, and the 613 commandments given to them [EDUCATION], have especially been ordained to obtain these blessings (שְׂפָעָה) for the whole world. Hence the great mysteries of the Jewish ritual

* Both the etymology and the exact meaning of the word סְפִירוֹת (plur. סְפִירוֹת) are matter of dispute. R. Asariel, the first Kabbalist, derives it from סָפַר, to number, whilst later Kabbalists derive it in turn from סָפִיר, Saphir, from השָׁמַיִם אֱלֹהִים (Ps. xix. 1), and from the Greek σφαῖραι, and are not at all certain whether to regard the Sephiroth as principles (ἀρχαί), or as substances (ὕποστασις), or as potencies, powers (δυνάμεις), or as intelligent worlds (κόσμοι νοητικοί), or as attributes, or as entities (οὐσιότητες), or as organs of the Deity (כלים).

NOTE.—The first Sephira is also called מַעֲלָם, the inscrutable height; the fourth גְּדוּלָּה, greatness; the fifth גְּבוּרָה, judicial power; and the tenth שְׁכִינָה, Shechinah.

(סוד התפילה); hence the profound secrets contained in every word and syllable of the formulary of prayers; and hence the declaration that 'the pious constitute the foundation of the world' (צדיקים יסוד עולם). Not only does the En Soph reveal himself through the Sephiroth, but he also becomes incarnate in them, which accounts for the anthropomorphisms of Scripture and the Hagada. Thus, when it is said that 'God spake, descended upon earth, ascended into heaven, smelled the sweet smell of sacrifices, repented in his heart, was angry,' etc., or when the Hagadic works describe the body and the mansions of God, etc., all this does not refer to the En Soph, but to these intermediate beings. These Sephiroth again became incarnate in the patriarchs, ex. gr., Sephira 4, love was incarnate in Abraham; 5, power in Isaac; 6, beauty in Jacob; 7, firmness in Moses; 8, splendour in Aaron; 9, foundation in Joseph; 10, kingdom in David; and constitute the chariot throne (מרכבה). Hence the remark of the Hagada, 'the fathers form the chariot-throne of the Lord.'

The psychology of the Kabbalah is one of its most important features. All human souls are pre-existent in the world of the Sephiroth, and are, without an exception, destined to inhabit human bodies, and pursue their course upon earth for a certain period of probation. If, notwithstanding its union with the body, the soul resists all earthly trammels, and remains pure, it ascends after death into the spiritual kingdom, and has a share in the world of Sephiroth. But if, on the contrary, it becomes contaminated by that which is earthly, the soul must inhabit the body again and again (נילוול, עיבור) till it is able to ascend in a purified state, through repeated trial.* The apparently undeserved sufferings which the pious have sometimes to endure here below are simply designed to purify their souls. Hence God's justice is not to be impugned when the righteous are afflicted and the wicked prosper. This doctrine of the transmigration of souls is supported by an appeal to the injunction in the Bible, that a man must marry the widow of his brother if he died without issue, inasmuch as by this is designed, say the Kabbalists, that the soul of the departed one might be born again, and finish its earthly course. Very few new souls enter into the world, because many of the old souls which have already inhabited bodies have to re-enter those who are born, in consequence of their having polluted themselves in their previous bodily existence. This retards the great redemption of Israel, which cannot take place till all the pre-existent souls have been born upon earth, because the soul of the Messiah, which, like all other souls, has its pre-existence in the world of the spirits of the Sephiroth, is to be the last born one at the end of days, which is supported by an appeal to the Talmud (אין בן דוד בא עד שיכלו כל הנשמות) שבת 63, a. Then the great jubilee year (יובל הנדול) will commence, when the whole pleroma of souls (אוצד הנשמות), cleansed and purified and released from earth, shall ascend, in glorious company, into heaven.

3. Origin, date, and design of the Kabbalah, and its relation to Platonic and Neo-Platonic philosophy.—The origin and date of this theosophy have been greatly obscured by modern writers, who, in their description of the Kabbalah, confound its doctrines with the Jewish mysticism propounded in the works called the Alphabet of R. Akiba

(אותיות דר עקיבא or אלפא ביתא דר עקיבא), the description of the body of God (שיעור קומה), and the delineation of the heavenly temples (היכלות). Even the book Yetzira (צורה) * does not contain the doctrines of the Kabbalah. All these productions, and others of a similar nature so frequently quoted by writers who give an analysis of the Kabbalah, know nothing of the Sephiroth, and of the speculations about the En Soph, or the being of God, which constitute the essence of the Kabbalah. Nevertheless, these works are unquestionably to be regarded as having called the Kabbalah into existence, by the difficulty in which they placed the Jews in the south of France, and in Catalonia, who believed in them almost as much as in the Bible, and who were driven to contrive this system whereby they could explain to themselves, as well as to their assailants, the gross descriptions of the Deity, and of the plains of heaven, given in these Hagadic productions. Being unable to go to the extreme of the rigid literalism of the north of France and Germany, who, without looking for any higher import, implicitly accepted the difficulties and anthropomorphisms of the Bible and Hagada in their most literal sense; or to adopt the other extreme of the followers of Maimonides, who rejected altogether the Hagadic and mystical writings, and rationalized the Scriptures, Isaac the blind contrived (רעצקא סני נהור אבי הקבלה), and his two disciples, Ezra and Azariel of Lerona, developed, the Kabbalah (about 1200-1230), which steers between these two extremes. By means of the Sephiroth all the anthropomorphisms in the Bible, in the Hagada, and even in the Shiur Koma, are at once taken from the Deity, and yet literally explained; whilst the sacrificial institutions, the precepts, and the ritual of the Bible and Talmud, receive at the same time a profound spiritual import. The Kabbalah is therefore a hermeneutical system, which originated about 1200-1230 to oppose the philosophical school of Maimonides.

The relationship between the Kabbalah and Neo-Platonism is apparent. The Kabbalah elevates

* The Othijoth of R. Akiba and He-Chaloth have been published by Jellinek, Beth Ha-Midrash, vol. ii., Leipzig 1853, p. 40-47; vol. iii., Leipzig 1855, p. 12-64, 83-108; Shiur Koma is contained in the Sepher Rasiel, published in Amsterdam 1701. A masterly dissertation on these works, and on Jewish mysticism in general, written by Graetz, has been published in Frankel's Monatschrift, vol. viii., Leipzig 1859, p. 67, ff.; 103, ff.; 140, ff. The book Yetzira has been published, with five commentaries, in Mantua 1562; with a Latin translation and notes by Rittangelius, Amsterdam 1642; and with a German translation and notes by Meyer, Leipzig 1830. Comp. also Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodliciana Col., 335-337, 552, 639-641.

* Nachmanides (on Job xxxviii. 29) and later Kabbalists restrict the transmigration of the soul into another body to three times, and appeal to the words הן כל אלה יפעל אל פעמים שלוש עם נבר (Job xxxviii. 29) in support of this restriction.

God above being and thinking; so Neo-Platonism (ἐπεκείνα οὐσίας, ἐνεργείας, τοῦ καὶ νοήσεως). The Kabbalah denies all divine attributes; so Neo-Platonism. The Kabbalah, like Neo-Platonism, places intelligent principles or substances between the Deity and the world. The Kabbalah teaches that the Sephiroth which emanated from God are not equal to God. Neo-Platonism teaches that the substances νοῦς, ψύχη, and φύσις, which proceeded from one being, are not equal to their origin (οὐκ ἴσων δὲ τὸ προϊόν τῷ μελλαντι). In classifying the Sephiroth, the Kabbalah has adopted the division into three great world spheres, νοῦς, ψύχη, and φύσις (עולם הנפש, עולם החכמה, and עולם השכל), and employs the forms מורנש, מוטבע, and מושכל. The comparison between the emanation of the Sephiroth from the En Soph, and the rays proceeding from light to describe immanency and perfect unity, is the same as the Neo-Platonic figure employed to illustrate the emanations from the one Being (ὅλον ἐκ φωτός τὴν ἐξ αὐτοῦ περιλαμψῶν). The doctrine of the Kabbalah, that most of the souls which enter the world have occupied bodies upon this earth before, is Neo-Platonic (comp. Zeller, Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. iii., part ii., p. 944).

These works are most essential to a proper understanding of the Kabbalah, inasmuch as Asariel was the first Kabbalist. KABZEEL (קַבְזֵאֵל, 'God gathers; Baṣselel and Καβσεήλ; Alex. Κασθεήλ; Cabseel), a town on the south-eastern frontier of Judah, near the border of Edom (Josh. xv. 21). It could not have been far distant from Kadesh. It is probably the same town which is mentioned as the native place of Benaiah, one of David's 'mighty men' (2 Sam. xliii. 20; 1 Chron. ii. 22). There is a Jekabzeel (קַבְזֵאֵל), omitted in the Vat. text of the Sept.; Alex. Καβσεήλ; Cabseel) mentioned by Nehemiah among the villages of Judah reoccupied after the captivity, which seems to be identical with the Kabzeel of Joshua (Neh. xi. 25). The name does not again appear in history, and the site has not been identified. It was apparently one of those shepherd settlements which the Israelites held on the borders of the desert; and the name may have indicated the 'gathering' of the flocks.—J. L. P.

KADES (Κάδης; Syr. ܟܕܝܫ), a place mentioned, Judith i. 9, among those to which Nebuchadnezzar sent a summons to the people to join him against Arphaxad, king of the Medes. It was probably the Kadesh mentioned Josh. xv. 23 [KADESH 1].—W. L. A.

KADESH and KADESH-BARNEA (קַדֵּשׁ, 'Holy' or 'Holy-places; קַדֵּשׁ בַּרְנֵא; Κάδης, Κάδης Βαρνή; Cades, Cades-barne). This ancient place has given rise to much controversy. Some maintain that Kadesh and Kadesh-barnea are different places, and that even the single name Kadesh is not always applied in Scripture to the same place. One Kadesh, they say, was situated in the wilderness of Paran, and is mentioned in Num. xii. 26; another in the wilderness of Zin, mentioned in Num. xx. 1, and xxxiii. 36; and the former is identical with Kadesh-Barnea (Num. xxxii. 8), from which the spies were sent out (Wells's Geography of the O. T., i. 274; Reland, Pal. p. 115). The site of Kadesh, too, has been disputed by those who admit that there is only one place of that name. Mr. Rowlands, who is followed by Williams (Holy City, i. 465, seq., 2d ed.) and Professor Tuch (Zeitschr. der Morgenl. Gesellsch. i. 179), locates it in the midst of the desert of Tih, about forty-five miles south of Beersheba. He was evidently misled, however, by a fancied resemblance in names (see Bibliotheca Sacra for May 1849, p. 377, seq.). Raumer places it at Ain Hasb, in the Arabah, twenty miles south of the Dead Sea (see Keil on Josh. x. 41); Robinson at Ain el-Weibeh (B. R. ii. 195); and Stanley at Petra (S. and P., p. 95; Jewish Church, p. 180). The points at issue will be best solved by a careful examination of the topographical notices of Kadesh given in the Bible. The identification of Kadesh is highly important in a geographical point of view, as it enables us to trace with considerable exactness the routes of the Israelites. Next to Sinai it was unquestionably the most important stage in their journeyings, and the scene of some of the most remarkable events. At Kadesh the spies were sent out; there the first expedition against the Canaanites was marshalled, which resulted in such calamities; there the Israelites turned back disheartened to the desert again. To Kadesh they again returned after an interval of thirty-eight years' wandering; there Miriam died; and there, after a long residence, the people turned back a second time, being refused a passage through Moab (Num. xiii. 26; xx. 1, seq.).

The first notice of Kadesh occurs in the story of the capture of Sodom by the eastern kings (Gen. xiv.) The 'four kings' first invaded Bashan, taking Ashteroth-Karnaim; then they marched southward through Moab to Mount Seir, or Edom, and having overrun the whole of that country, they turned back 'and came to En-Mishpat, which is Kadesh;' and then they continued northward up the Arabah to the plain of Sodom. En-Mishpat, 'spring of judgment' (עֵין מִשְׁפָּט; τὴν πηγὴν τῆς κρίσεως; fontem Misphat), was doubtless a noted gathering-place of the southern nomads, where they perhaps had an oracle, and where they assembled to consult the deity and to pay their vows; hence it came to be called Kadesh, 'the Holy Place.' Its position is indicated in the sacred narrative. Having traversed all Mount Seir 'unto Paran,' which lay on the west side of the Arabah, the kings evidently turned northward toward So-dom, and would thus naturally follow the course of the Arabah; in it, therefore, Kadesh appears to have been situated. It continued to be a place of note during the whole period of the patriarchs (Gen. xvi. 14; xx. 1).

There is some difficulty in connection with the next notice we find of Kadesh. We read, in Num. xii. 16, that 'the people removed from Hazeroth, and pitched in the wilderness of Paran.' From thence the twelve spies were sent out (xiii. 3); 'and they returned from searching the land after forty days. And they went and came to Moses, and to all the congregation of the children of Israel, unto the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesh' (vers. 25, 26). From this it might seem that Kadesh was only a single journey from Hazeroth, which we know was only four days' march from Sinai [HAZEROOTH]. But an examination of Deut. i. 19-21, and Num. xxxiii. 18-36, shows that between Hazeroth and Kadesh there were a great many intervening stations. These the historian, in Num. xii., passes over, in order to group together the leading events. The principal stations he groups together in chap. xxxiii.

Kadesh lay on the southern border of Canaan. After the return of the spies, who made their search during the vintage (August) of the second year of the Exodus [WANDERING], and after the defeat of the sinful people by the Canaanites (Num. xiv. 45), they were ordered to turn back from Kadesh 'into the wilderness, by the way of the Red Sea' (Deut. i. 40). This incidental notice affords also a slight indication of the situation of Kadesh. 'The way of the Red Sea' is doubtless the valley of Arabah, and this is the natural road to the wilderness of Sinai from Kadesh-Mishpat, situated as it was on the borders of Edom. Again, in the list of the journeys contained in Num. xxxiii., which seems to fill up the blank left in chap. xii., we find that in going from Ezion-gaber towards Canaan they came to Kadesh (ver. 36); and this Kadesh, we know, was on the borders of Edom, not far from Mount Hor (cf. ch. xx. 16). Thus it will be seen that in going from the wilderness of Sinai to Kadesh the Israelites passed up the Arabah, at the southern end of which Ezion-gaber stood; and in going back from Kadesh to the wilderness they passed down it. And this leads to the conclusion that En-Mishpat Kadesh, whence the spies were sent, and Kadesh-Barnea, were both in or very close to the Arabah, near the borders of Moab, and therefore most probably identical.

There is one objection to this view. The Kadesh from which the spies were sent was in the wilderness of Paran (Num. xiii. 26); Kadesh-Barnea was in the wilderness of Zin (xx. 1). This is easily removed. Paran was the general name for the whole desert west of the Arabah, extending from Palestine to Sinai (Gen. xxi. 21; Num. x. 12; xii. 16; 1 Sam. xxv. 1). It even seems to have included the Arabah, reaching to the very base of Mount Seir (Gen. xiv. 6). Zin was a specific name for that part of the Arabah which bordered on Edom and Palestine (Num. xiii. 21; xxxiv. 3, 4; Josh. xv. 1-3). If Kadesh was situated on the western side of the Arabah, then it might be reckoned either to Paran or to Zin; or, if we agree with Keil, Delitzsch, and others (Keil on Josh. x.), that Paran was the general name for the whole, and Zin the specific name of a portion, the objection is removed at once.

One or two other topographical notices tend to fix the position still more definitely. Moses says, in his message to the Edomites, 'Behold, we are in Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of thy border' (עִיר קֶדֶשׁ בְּקֶצֶת גְּבוּלְךָ), literally, 'a city of the extremity of thy border,' Num. xx. 16). It must thus have stood upon, not, however, within, the border of Edom; but the Arabah, or wilderness of Zin, was the border of Edom; and hence Kadesh must be looked for in it. Again, it was one of the chief landmarks, at the wilderness of Zin, of the south-eastern border of the Israelitish territory (Num. xxxiv. 4), and of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 3), which reached 'to the border of Edom' (אֶל-גְּבוּל עֲדוֹם; Josh. xv. 1). It was, besides, within a short distance of Mount Hor, whose position is well known [HOR]. All these facts and notices tend to fix the site of Kadesh in the valley of Arabah, to the west of Mount Hor, or Petra; and they are fatal to the theories of Rowlands and Stanley.

There was a fountain (מַעְיָן), and a very noted one, at Kadesh. Fountains are permanent landmarks, and in this region they are very rare. Now, there is one spot, and apparently only one, to which all these notices point as the site of Kadesh; and that is Ain d-Weibeh. Here is a copious fountain, to this day one of the most important watering-places in the great valley. It is situated on the western border of the Arabah, north-west of Petra. From it Mount Hor is seen to fine advantage, towering in lone majesty at the distance of about twenty miles. 'We were much struck,' says Dr. Robinson, 'while at Weibeh, with the entire adaptedness of its position to the scriptural account of the proceedings of the Israelites on their second arrival at Kadesh. There was at Kadesh a fountain, called also En-Mishpat; this was then either partially dried up, or exhausted by the multitude, so that there was no water for the congregation. By a miracle water was brought forth abundantly out of the rock. Moses now sent messengers to the king of Edom, informing him that they were 'in Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of his border;' and asking leave to pass through his country, so as to continue their course around Moab and approach Palestine from the east. This Edom refused; and the Israelites accordingly marched to Mount Hor, where Aaron died; and then along the Arabah to the Red Sea. Here all these scenes were before our eyes. Here was the fountain, even to this day the most frequented watering-place in all the Arabah. On the north-west is the mountain, by which the Israelites had formerly assayed to ascend to the land of Palestine, and were driven back. Over against us lay the land of Edom; we were in its uttermost border; and the great Wady el-Ghuweir, affording a direct and easy passage through the mountains to the table-land above, was directly before us; while farther in the south, Mount Hor formed a prominent and striking object' (B. R. ii. 174, 79.)

The traditions preserved by Josephus, the Talmudists, Eusebius, and Jerome, which Professor Stanley adduces as tending to prove the identity of Petra and Kadesh, certainly show that the two places were near each other, and closely linked together by the facts of Israelitish history; but farther than this they do not go (S. and P., 95). Kadesh appears to have been known to Eusebius and Jerome, and they clearly distinguish it from Petra. The former says, Βαρη, αὐτὴ ἐστὶ τῇ Κάδης Βαρη ἐν ὁρησὶ τῇ παρασκευαστῇ Πέτρα πῶλει; and Jerome translating 'BARNE, haec ipsa est, quae et Cades Barne in deserto, quod extenditur usque ad urbem Petram' (Onomast., s.v. Barne). In his Commentary on Gen. xiv. 7, Jerome writes 'Significat autem locum apud Petram, qui fons iudicii nominatur; quia ibi Deus populum iudicavit;' and again he says, 'Cades, ubi fons est iudicii, et Cadesbarne in deserto quae conjungitur civitati Petrae in Arabia' (Onomast., s.v. Cades). The local traditions which now linger round Petra are far too obscure to have any influence on a question of topography. One fact alone is final against the identification of Petra and Kadesh. The former is ten miles within the border of Edom, and in the very heart of Mount Seir; whereas Kadesh was on the border of the territory of Judah, and became apparently one of the cities of that tribe (Josh. xv. 3, 23. See, however, Stanley, S. and P., pp. 94-97).

Kadesh is called a city (Num. x. 16, עִיר); and it is the only station of the Israelites so called. The houses were probably constructed rudely and slightly, like those of the semi-nomad tribes of the Sinai Peninsula; and we have no notice whatever of the inhabitants. There are no ruins round or near the fountain of El-Weibeh. The Israelites were unquestionably twice at Kadesh, and remained there on each occasion for a considerable time. They came here about July of the second year of the Exodus, and again about the same time of the fortieth year (Num. xii. 16; xiii. 26; xx. 1, etc.). During the intervening thirty-eight years they wandered through the desert; and of the journeyings during that period, no account is given. Moses, in summing up the principal journeys (Num. xxxiii.), enumerates the stations as far as Kadesh, to which they proceeded after the giving of the Law on Sinai; then he passes over the whole interval of the thirty-eight years, during which the curse was upon them, and takes up the narrative again when they visit Kadesh the second time, and leads them on to Canaan. During this second visit Miriam dies, and Jerome speaks of her tomb as still shown there in his day (Onomast., s.v. Cades); Moses and Aaron bring water from the rock, and in doing so sinned so heinously that the Lord would not permit them to enter Canaan. The fountain opened was appropriately named Meribah, 'strife.' After this sad event, and the refusal of Edom to grant them a passage, 'the whole congregation journeyed from Kadesh and came unto Mount Hor' (Num. xx. 1-22); and we hear of Kadesh no more except as a mark of the boundary of Palestine.—J. L. P.

KADKOD (כַּדְכֹד). This word occurs Is. liv. 12, and Ezek. xxvii. 16; in both of which places it is rendered in the A. V. by agate, with the marginal note on the latter passage, 'Heb. chrysoprase.' The LXX. has in the former passage ιασπυρ, jasper, whilst in the latter the translator has retained the original word, which he seems to have read כַּדְכֹד; Gr. Χορχόρ, and to have taken for the name of a place. The Vulg. also retains the original word here, reading it Chodchod, but in the other passage it follows the LXX., and gives jaspidem. The Targ. gives in both places מַרְנִלִין, pearls; the Syr. in Is. has ܡܪܢܠܝܢ, of jaspers, and in Ezek. ܡܪܢܠܝܢ, which is rendered in the London Polyglott, acupidium. It is evident that great uncertainty prevailed as to the real meaning of the original word; and, indeed, Jerome confesses that he has not been able to find what the word means ('quid significat usque in praesentiam invenire non potui'). Rosenmuller argues that, from its being used by Isaiah as material for windows, it must be a stone of a chrysaline character; but the force of this is greatly destroyed by the uncertainty attaching to the meaning of the word שֶׁמַשְׁתֹּת, Shemashoth, used by Isaiah, and which the more recent interpreters generally prefer to take in the sense of battlements (Sept. ἑωλέξεις) to that of windows. The prevailing opinion is, that the Kadkod was a species of ruby; but this rests solely on the resemblance to the Arabic word كَدْكَدَة, Kadkadzat, which signifies, according to the Kamus, vivid redness, and cannot be accepted as conclusive. The Hebrew root from which כַּדְכֹד is said to be derived is the obsolete כָּדַד, signifying, it is said, to strike fire, so that Kadkod would convey the idea of a sparkling gem; but this tells us nothing as to the kind of gem it denoted, and besides, like various other such etymologies in Hebrew lexicons, the reasoning is wholly in a circle, the meaning assigned to the verb being derived from the noun, and that assigned to the noun being derived from the verb. The Targ. Jon. on Exod. xxxix. 11, gives כַּדְכֹדִין, Kadkudin, as the equivalent of the Hebrew יָהֳלִים, Yahalom, and as this was a stone of the flint family, and as the agate belongs to the same family, the A. V. is probably not far wrong in its rendering.—W. L. A.

KADMIEL (קַדְמִיֵּאל; Sept. Καδμυήλ). Whether this is the name of a person or of a class among the Levites is uncertain. From the passages in which it first occurs (Ezra ii. 40; Neh. vii. 43), it might be concluded that it is the proper name of the Levite who was president of one of the classes of the Levites in the time of Zerubbabel; but in Neh. ix. 4, 5, and x. 9, it appears rather as the designation of a class than of a person. In Neh. xii. 24 it is undoubtedly, as the text stands, the name of a person; but a comparison of this passage with Neh. x. 9, xii. 8, and Ezra ii. 40, leads to the conclusion that כַּדְמִי here should probably be omitted. Probably this name, as well as the others with which it is joined, was originally the name of the person presiding over one of the Levitical classes, and came subsequently to denote the class over which he presided.—W. L. A.

KADMONITES (קַדְמוֹנִי, 'Eastern'; Κεδμωνῆται; Cedmonæi), one of the tribes which inhabited the country given in covenant promise to Abraham. The word Kadmoni occurs only in Gen. xv. 19. The Jerusalem Targum has in this passage, 'All the children of the East' (Reland, p. 141); and some of the Talmudists suppose the Nabatheans are meant (Id., p. 94); but this is impossible, since the Nabatheans were Ishmaelites, and the Kad-monites are mentioned as living in the time of Abraham. The country included in the promise extended from 'the river of Egypt unto the river Euphrates' (Gen. xv. 18). Of the tribes mentioned it would seem probable that the Kadmonites lived beyond the bounds of Canaan proper, that is, in Arabia or towards the Euphrates; because, though the tribes of Canaan are often enumerated afterwards, the Kadmonites are never alluded to. (See Exod. iii. 17; xiii. 5; xxiii. 23; Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10, etc.) Perhaps, therefore, the Kadmonites, as the name would seem to imply, were a tribe, or number of tribes, living to the 'east' of Canaan; and the name would thus be equivalent to Bene Kedem, which occurs frequently in Bible history (A. V., 'people' or 'children of the east:' Gen. xxix. 1; Judg. vi. 3. See BENEI-KEDEM). This is the opinion of Wells (Geog. i, p. 170), Kalisch (Gen., ad loc.), Ritter (Pal. and Syr., ii. 138), and Lightfoot, who quotes the traditions of the Talmudists (Opera, ii. 429). Bochart advances a theory more curious than credible. The Kadmonites were the same as the Hivites, and were so called because they dwelt under mount Hermon, which is the most easterly part of Canaan. Cadmonite is thus identical with Hermonite; and hence he concludes that Cadmus was a Cadmonite, and that his wife Hermione derived her name from her native place Hermon (Opera, i. 447).—J. KALAMOS (καλαμος). [KANEH.]

KALI (כָּלִי, כָּלִי). This word occurs in several passages of the O. T., in all of which, in the A. V., it is translated parched corn. The correctness of this translation has not, however, been assented to by all commentators. The Syr. Targ. Onk. and Jon. use the Hebrew word, Lev. xxiii. 14; 1 Sam. xvii. 17; xxv. 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 28. Arias Montanus and others render kali by the word tostum, considering it to be derived from כָּלָה, which in the Hebrew signifies torere, 'to toast' or 'parch.' So in the Arabic قَلِي, kali, signifies anything cooked in a frying-pan, and is applied to the common Indian dish which by Europeans is called currie or curry. قَالِي kalee, and قَالَا kalla, signify one that fries, or a cook.

From the same root is supposed to be derived the word kali or al-kali, now so familiarly known as alkali, which is obtained from the ashes of burnt vegetables. But as in the various passages of Scripture where it occurs, kali is without any adjunct, different opinions have been entertained respecting the substance which is to be understood as having been toasted or parched. By some it is supposed to have been corn in general; by others, only wheat. Some Hebrew writers maintain that flour or meal, and others, that parched meal, is intended, as in the passage of Ruth ii. 14, where the Septuagint translates kali by ἀφρον, and the Vulgate by polenta. A difficulty, however, occurs in the case of 2 Sam. xvii. 28, where the word occurs twice in the same verse. We are told that Shobi and others, on David's arrival at Mahanaim, in the further limit of the tribe of Gad, 'brought beds, and basins, and earthen vessels, and wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn (kali), and beans, and lentils, and parched pulse (kali), and honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine, for David and for the people that were with him to eat.' This is a striking representation of what may be seen every day in the East: when a traveller arrives at a village, the common light beds of the country are brought him, as well as earthen pots, with food of different kinds. The meaning of the above passage is explained by the statement of Hebrew writers, that there are two kinds of kali—one made of parched corn, the other of parched pulse; see R. Salomon, ex Avoda Zarah, fol. xxxviii. 2, as quoted by Celsius (ii. 233).

There is no doubt that in the East a little meal, either parched or not, mixed with a little water, often constitutes the dinner of the natives, especially of those engaged in laborious occupations, as boatmen while dragging their vessels up rivers, and unable to make any long delay. Another principal preparation, much and constantly in use in Western Asia, is burgoul, that is, corn first boiled, then bruised in the mill to take the husk off, and afterwards dried or parched in the sun. In this state it is preserved for use, and employed for the same purposes as rice (Robinson, B. R., ii. 394). The meal of parched corn is also much used, particularly by travellers, who mix it with honey, butter, and spices, and so eat it; or else mix it with water only, and drink it as a draught, the refrigerating and satisfying qualities of which they justly extol (Pictorial Bible, ii. p. 537). Parched grain is also, no doubt, very common. Thus, in the bazaars of India, not only may rice be obtained in a parched state, but also the seeds of the Nymphaea, and of the Nelumbium Speciosum, or bean of Pythagoras, and most abundantly the pulse called gram by the English, on which their cattle are chiefly fed. This is the Cicer Aritinum of botanists, or chick-pea, which is common even in Egypt and the south of Europe, and may be obtained everywhere in India in a parched state, under the name of chebenne. We know not whether it be the same pulse that is mentioned in the article DOVE'S DUNG, a sort of pulse or pea, which appears to have been very common in Judea. Belon (Observat., ii. 53) informs us that large quantities of it are parched and dried, and stored in magazines at Cairo and Damascus. It is much used during journeys, and particularly by the great pilgrim caravans to Mecca.

Considering all these points, it does not appear to us by any means certain that kali is correctly translated 'parched corn' in all the passages of Scripture. Bochart says (Hieroz. part ii. lib. i. c. 7), 'Kali ab Hieronymo redditur frictum cicer;' and to show that it was the practice among the ancients to parch the cicer, he quotes Plautus (Bacch. iv. 5. 7): 'Tam frictum ego illum reddam, quam frictum est cicer;' also Horace (De Arte Poetica, l. 249) and others; and shows from the writings of the Rabbins that kali was also applied to some kind of pulse. The name kali seems, moreover, to have been widely spread through Asiatic countries. Thus in Shakspeare's Hindoe Dictionary, काली kalee, from the Sanscrit in general. The present writer found it applied in the Himalayas to the common field-pea, and has thus mentioned it elsewhere: 'Pisum arvense. Cultivated in the Himalayas, also in the plains of north-west India, found wild in the Khadie of the Jumna, near Delhi; the corra multior of the natives, called Kullae in the hills' (Illustr. of Himalayan Botany, p. 200). Hence we are disposed to consider the pea, or the chick-pea, as more correct than parched corn in some of the above passages of Scripture.—J. F. R.

KANAH (קנה), 'a reed'; Χελκάρη, in Josh. xvi. 8, is formed by connecting the two last letters of קנה ['river'] to the proper name; Alex. Kavd; in Josh. xvii. 9, Kapard; Alex. Kavd; in vallem arundinatis, a river running into the Mediterranean, and forming part of the boundary line between the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvi. 8; xvii. 9). It is not again mentioned in Scripture. Eusebius and Jerome merely notice it as 'Cana in the tribe of Ephraim,' and 'Cane in the tribe of Manasseh' (Onomast., s.v.). There is a Wady Kanah which takes its rise in the plain of Mukhna, south of Nabulus, and runs south-west till it joins Nahr-el-Aujeh, and falls into the sea about four miles north of Joppa. This Dr. Robinson would identify with the river Kanah (B. R. iii. 135); but it is evidently much too far south. The river Kanah was on the northern border of Ephraim; Wady Kanah runs through the centre of that territory. Schwartz and Van de Velde suppose that a streamlet called Kasab (קסב, 'reeds') is the Kanah of Scripture; but though the name seems to favour the identity, the situation is too far south, running as it does through Wady Shafr, in the parallel of Samaria (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 327, and see his map). The Nahr el-Akhdar, a small stream which rises in the mountains south of Megiddo, flows across the plain of Sharon, and falls into the Mediterranean about two miles south of the ruins of Caesarea, would answer better to the position of Kanah. Its banks are low, marshy, and covered with jungles of 'reeds,' from which it may have taken its ancient name; and this appears to be the stream which Bohadin in his Life of Saladin calls Nahr el-Kasab (نهر القصب, 'the river of reeds'; p. 191, ed. Schultens).

2. A town of Asher (Josh. xix. 28, Kavdar; Alex. Kavd; Cana) on its northern border. Eusebius confounds it with Cana of Galilee; but it must have been much farther north, as it is mentioned in connection with Sidon (Onomast., s.v. Cana). There can be no doubt that it is identical with the village of Kana, situated on the side of the mountain range about three hours east by south of Tyre. It is a modern village, containing about 300 families, with no traces of ruins. About a mile north of it is a very ancient site, strewn with ruins, some of them of colossal proportions; and in the side of a ravine not far distant are some singular figures of men, women, and children, cut on the side of a cliff (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 200; Handbook for S. and P., pp. 395, 442; Robinson, B. R., ii. 455; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 327).

KANEH (קנה) occurs in several places of the O. T., in all of which, in the A. V., it is translated reed; as in 1 Kings xiv. 15; 2 Kings xviii.

21; Job xl. 21; Is. xix. 6; xxxv. 7; xxxvi. 6; xlii. 3; Ezek. xxix. 6. The Hebrew Kaneh would seem to be the original of the Greek kána, the Latin canna, and the modern canna, canne, cane, etc., signifying a 'reed' or 'cane,' also a fence or mat made of reeds or rushes: the Latin word also denotes the sugar-cane, a pipe, etc. Hence the term appears to have been used in a general sense in ancient as well as in modern times. Thus we find in Hakluyt, 'Then they pricke him (the elephant) with sharp canes;' (Milton (Par. Lost, iii. 439) describes the Tatars as driving—

'With sails and wind their cany waggons light;'

Grainger also, when referring to the Indians, as described by Lucan, says, 'That sucke sweete liquor from their sugar-canes.' In later times the term cane has been applied more particularly to the stems of the Calamus Rotang, and other species of rattan canes, which we have good grounds for believing were unknown to the ancients, notwithstanding the opinion of Sprengel (Hist. Rei Herb. i. 171), 'Ctesias duo genera καλαμων facit, marem sine medulla et feminam ea præditam, hanc sine dubio Calamum Rotang, illam Bambusam nostram. Repetit ea Plinius (xvi. 36).'

The Greek word καλαμος appears to have been considered the proper equivalent for the Hebrew Kaneh, being the term used by St. Matthew (xii. 20), when quoting the words of Isaiah (xlii. 3), 'A bruised reed (Kaneh) shall he not break.' The Greek word Latinized is well known in the forms of calamus and culmus. Both seem to stand related to the Arabic قلم kalm, signifying a

'reed' or 'pen,' also a weaver's reed, and even cutting of trees for planting or grafting; comp. the Sanscrit कलम kalm, having the same signification.

The German halm, and the English haulm, usually applied to the straw or stems of grasses, would seem to have the same origin. The Greek καλαμος, and the Latin calamus, were used with as wide a signification as the Oriental kalm, and denoted a reed, the stalk or stem of corn, or anything made therefrom, as a pen, an arrow, a reed-pipe. Kάλαμος is also applied to any plant which is neither shrub, bush (βύλη), nor tree (δένδρον) (see Liddell and Scott's Greek Lex.) So calamus means any twig, sprig, or scion; comp. Pliny xvi. 14. 24; xxiv. 14. 75; and in India we every day hear the expression, 'kalm lugana,' i. e., 'to apply' or 'fix' a graft.

Such references to the meaning of these words in different languages may appear to have little relation to our present subject; but καλαμος occurs very frequently in the N. T., and apparently with the same latitude of meaning: thus, in the sense of a reed or culm of a grass, Matt. xi. 7; Luke vii. 24, 'A reed shaken by the wind;' of a pen, in 3 John 13, 'But I will not write with pen (καλαμος) and ink write unto thee;' Matt. xxvii. 29, 'Put a reed in his right hand;' ver. 30, 'took the reed and smote him on the head; and in Mark xv. 19, it may mean a reed or twig of any kind. So also in Matt. xxvii. 48, and Mark xv. 36, where it is said that they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it on a reed, while in the parallel passage, John xix. 29, it is said that they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth.

From which it is probable that the term κάλανος was applied by both the Evangelists to the stem of the plant named hyssop, whatever this may have been, in like manner as Pliny applied the term Calamus to the stem of a bramble.

In most of the passages of the O. T. the word Kaneh seems to be applied strictly to reeds of different kinds growing in water, that is, to the hollow stems or culms of grasses, which are usually weak, easily shaken about by wind or by water, fragile, and breaking into sharp-pointed splinters. Comp. 1 Kings xiv. 15; Job. xl. 21; Is. xix. 6; xxxv. 7; 2 Kings xviii. 21; Is. xxxvi. 6; and Ezek. xxix. 7, etc.

293. Arundo donax.

In order to determine what particular kinds of reed-like plants are intended in these several passages, the preferable mode is probably first to ascertain the plants to which the above names were applied by the Greeks and Romans, and particularly those which are indigenous in Syria and Egypt. Dioscorides describes the different kinds in his chapter περὶ καλάνου (i. 114). 1. Κάλανος ὁ ναστός, or the Arundo farcta, of which arrows are made (Arundo arenaria?). 2. The female, of which reed pipes were made (A. donax?). 3. Hollow, with frequent knots, fitted for writing, probably a species of Saccharum. 4. Thick and hollow, growing in rivers, which is called donax, and also Cypria (Arundo donax). 5. Phragmites (Arundo Phragmites), slender, light-coloured, and well-known. 6. The reed called Phleas (Arundo ampelodesmos Cyrillii). (Flora Næpol. t. xii.) These are all described (l.c.) immediately before the Papyrus, while κάλανος ἀρωματικός is described in a different part of the book, namely, in ch. 17, along with spices and perfumes. The Arabs describe the different kinds of reed under the head of قصب Kusb, or Kussub, of which they give Kalamus as the synonymous Greek term. Under the head of Kussub, both the Bamboo and the Arundo are included as varieties, while Kusb-al-Sukr is the sugar-cane, or Saccharum officinarum, and Kusb-el-Zurreh appears to be the Calamus aromaticus [KANEH-BOSEM]. All these were, no doubt, partially known to the ancients. Pliny mentions what must have been the Bamboo, as to be seen of a large size in temples.

From the context of the several passages of Scripture in which Kaneh is mentioned, it is evident that it was a plant growing in water; and we have seen from the meaning of the word in other languages that it must have been applied to one of the true reeds; as, for instance, Arundo Ægyptiaca (perhaps only a variety of A. donax), mentioned by M. Bové as growing on the banks of the Nile; or it may have been the Arundo isiacæ of Delile, which is closely allied to A. Phragmites, the Canna and Canne of the south of Europe, which has been already mentioned under AGMON.

In the N. T. κάλανος seems to be applied chiefly to plants growing in dry and even barren situations, as in Luke vii. 24. To such passages, some of the species of reed-like grasses, with slender stems and light flocculent inflorescence, formerly referred to Saccharum, but now separated as distinct genera, are well suited; as, for instance, Imperata cylindrica (Arundo epigeios, Forsk.), the kulfeh of the Arabs; which is found in such situations, as by Desfontaines in the north of Africa, by Delile in Lower Egypt, by Forskal near Cairo and Rosetta. Bové mentions that near Mount Sinai, 'Dans les déserts qui environnent ces montagnes, j'ai trouvé plusieurs Saccharum,' etc. In India, the natives employ the culm of different species of this genus for making their reed-pens and arrows.

Hence, as has already been suggested by Rosenmüller, the noun Kaneh ought to be restricted to reeds, or reed-like grasses, while Agmon may indicate the more slender and delicate grasses or sedges growing in wet situations, but which are still tough enough to be made into ropes.—J. F. R.

KANEH BOSEM (קנה בושם, 'reed of fragrance') and KANEH HATTOB (קנה חטוב, calamus bonus, 'good' or 'fragrant reed') appear to have reference to the same substance. It is mentioned under the name of kaneh bosem in Exod. xxx. 23, and under that of kaneh hallob in Jer. vi. 20. It is probably intended also by kaneh ('reed') simply in Cant. iv. 14; Is. xliii. 24; and Ezek. xxvii. 19; as it is enumerated with other fragrant and aromatic substances. From the passages in which it is mentioned we learn that it was fragrant and reed-like, and that it was brought from a far country (Jer. vi. 20; Ezek. xxvii. 19).

In Dioscorides, bk. i. c. 17, a κάλανος ἀρωματικός is described among the aromata, immediately after Σχοῖνος. It is stated to be a produce of India, of a tawny colour, much jointed, breaking into splinters, and having the hollow stem filled with pith, like the web of a spider; also that it is mixed with ointments and fumigations on account of its odour. Hippocrates was acquainted with apparently the same substance, which he calls κάλανος εὐώδης and σχοῖνος εὐσμος, also κάλανος σχοῖνος: though it is impossible to say that the σχοῖνος of Dioscorides, or schœnanthus, is not intended by some of these names. Theophrastus describes both the calamus and schœnus as natives of Syria, or more precisely, of a valley between Mount Lebanon and a small mountain, where there is a plain and a lake, in parts of which there is a marsh, where they are produced, the smell being perceived by any one entering the place. This account is virtually followed by Pliny, though he also mentions the sweet calamus as a produce of Arabia. Polybius also (v. 45) says that in the valley between the Libanus and Anti-Libanus the narrowest part is covered by a lake with marshy ground, from whence are gathered aromatic reeds, ἐξ ὧν ὁ μυρεψικὸς κέλεται κάλαμος. Strabo mentions that the calamus grows in the country of the Sabæi (xvi. 4); but speaking of Cœle-Syria and its mountains, Libanus and Anti-Libanus, he says (xvi. 2), 'It is intersected by rivers, irrigating a rich country, abounding in all things. It also contains a lake, which produces the aromatic rush (σχοῖνος) and reed (κάλανος). There are also marshes. The lake is called Gennesaritis. The balsam also grows here.' But how little dependence is to be placed upon the statements of those who do not pay special attention to the localities of plants, might be made evident by quotations from several modern authors, who often mistake the last place of export for the native country of a plant, and sometimes even place in the Old World plants which are only found in America.

That there may be some moderately sweet-scented grass, or rush-like plant, such as the Acorus Calamus of botanists (long used as a substitute for the true calamus), in the flat country between Libanus and Anti-Libanus, is quite possible; but we have no proof of the fact. Burckhardt, in that situation, could find only ordinary rushes and reeds. Though Theophrastus, Polybius, and Strabo, mention this locality as that producing the calamus, yet Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, and others, even including Pliny, give Arabia, or the country of the Sabæans, as that which produced the aromatic reed; while Dioscorides, the only author who writes expressly of the drugs known to the ancients, mentions it being the produce of India. Bochart argues against India being the sole country producing calamus, because he supposes that it could not have been open to commerce in those early times (Hieroz., pars. ii. lib. v. c. 6). Dr. Vincent, on the contrary (Periplus of the Erythraean Sea, ii. 365), says, 'So far as a private opinion is of weight, I am fully persuaded that this line of communication with the East is the oldest in the world—older than Moses or Abraham.' Indeed, it is now generally acknowledged that India and Egypt must have had commercial intercourse during the flourishing state of the kingdom of the Pharaohs. For in this way only can we account for numerous Indian products being mentioned in the Bible, and for their being known to the early Greek writers. Many of these substances are treated of under their respective heads in this work.

The author of the present article, in his Essay on the Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine, p. 33, remarks, 'With this (that is, the true Spikenard or NARD) has often been confounded another far-famed aromatic of Eastern climes, that is, the true calamus aromaticus, κάλανος ἀρωματικός of Dioscorides, said by him to grow in India. This he describes immediately after σχοῖνος, translated juncus odoratus, a produce of Africa and Arabia, and generally acknowledged by botanists to be the andropogon schœnanthus, or lemon-grass, a native both of Arabia and India, perhaps also of Africa. The calamus aromaticus, immediately following this, stated to be also a native of India, and among other uses being mixed with ointments on account of its odour, appears to me to have been a plant allied to the former. There is no plant which more closely coincides with every thing that is required—that is, correspondence in description, analogy to σχοῖνος, the possession of remarkable fragrance and stimulant properties, being costly, and the produce of a far country—than the plant which yields the fragrant grass-oil of Namur (Calcutta Med. Trans., vol. i. p. 367). This oil has been already described by Mr. Hatchett (On the Spikenard of the Ancients), who refers it to andropogon Iwarancusa. It is derived, however, as appears by specimens in my possession, from a different plant; to which, believing it to be a new species, I have given the name of andropogon calamus aromaticus' (p. 34). 'This species is found in Central India, extends north as far as Delhi, and south to between the Godavery and Nagpore, where, according to Dr. Malcolmson, it is called spear-grass. The specimens which Mr. H. obtained from Mr. Swinton, I have had an opportunity of examining: they are identical with my own from the same part of India' (Royle, Illustr. Himal. Bot., p. 425).

As this plant is a true grass, it has necessarily reed-like stems (the σπύγγα of Dioscorides). They are remarkable for their agreeable odour: so are the leaves when bruised, and also the delightfully fragrant oil distilled from them. Hence it appears more fully entitled to the commendations which the calamus aromaticus or sweet-cane has received, than any other plant that has been described, even the attar of roses hardly excepted. That a grass similar to the fragrant andropogon, or at least one growing in the same kind of soil and climate, was employed by the ancients, we have evidence in the fact of the Phœnicians who accompanied Alexander in his march across the arid country of Gedrosia having recognised and loaded their cattle with it, as one of the perfumes of commerce. It is in a similar country, that is, the arid plains of Central India, that the above andropogon calamus aromaticus is found, and where the fragrant essential oil is distilled from its leaves, culms, and roots (Essay on Hindoo Medicine, p. 142).

If we compare the foregoing statement with the different passages of Scripture, we shall find that this fragrant grass answers to all that is required. Thus, in Exod. xxx. 23, the fragrant reed, along with the principal spices, such as myrrh, sweet cinnamon, and cassia, is directed to be made into an oil of holy ointment. So the calamus aromaticus may be found mentioned as an ingredient in numerous fragrant oils and ointments, from the time of Theophrastus to that of the Arabs. Its essential oil is now sold in the shops, but under the erroneous name of oil of spikenard, which is a very different substance. [NARD.] In Cant. iv. 14 it is mentioned along with spikenard, saffron, cinnamon, trees of frankincense, myrrh, and aloes. Again, its value is indicated in Is. (xlii. 24), 'thou hast bought me no sweet cane with money;' and that it was obtained from a distant land is indicated in Jer. vi. 20, 'to what purpose cometh there to me incense from Sheba, and the sweet cane from a far country?'—while the route of the commerce is pointed out in Ezek. xxvii. 19, 'Dan also and Javan going to and fro occupied in thy fairs: bright iron, cassia, and calamus were in thy market.' To the Scripture notices, then, as well as to the description of Dioscorides, the tall grass which yields the fragrant grass-oil of Central India answers in every respect: the author of this article consequently named and figured it as the Kaneh bosem in his Illustr. of Himal. Botany, p. 425, t. 97.—J. F. R.

KARCOM (כַּרְכֹּם; Sept. κάρκος) occurs only once in the O. T., viz., in Cant. iv. 14, where it is mentioned along with several fragrant and stimulant substances, such as spikenard, calamus, and cinnamon, trees of frankincense, myrrh, and aloes (ahalim); we may, therefore, suppose that it was some substance possessed of similar properties. The name, however, is so similar to the Persian کَرَم karkam, and both to the Greek κάρκος, that we have no difficulty in tracing the Hebrew karcom to the modern crocus or saffron; but, in fact, the most ancient Greek translators of the O. T. considered κάρκος as the synonym for karcom. It is also probable that all three names had one common origin, saffron having from the earliest times been cultivated in Asiatic countries, as it still is in Persia and Cashmere. Crocus is mentioned by Homer, Hippocrates, and Theophrastus. Dioscorides describes the different kinds of it, and Pliny states that the benches of the public theatres were strewed with saffron; indeed 'the ancients frequently made use of this flower in perfumes. Not only saloons, theatres, and places which were to be filled with a pleasant fragrance, were strewed with this substance, but all sorts of vinous tinctures retaining the scent were made of it, and this costly perfume was poured into small fountains, which diffused the odour which was so highly esteemed. Even fruit and confitures placed before guests, and the ornaments of the rooms, were spread over with it. It was used for the same purposes as the modern pot-pourri' (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Bot., p. 138). In the present day a very high price is given in India for saffron imported from Cashmere; native dishes are often coloured and flavoured with it, and it is in high esteem as a stimulant medicine. The common name, saffron, is no doubt derived from the Arabic زعفران, zafran, as are the corresponding terms in most of the languages of Europe.

295. Crocus sativus.

Nothing, therefore, was more likely than that saffron should be associated with the foregoing fragrant substances in the passage of Canticles, as it still continues to be esteemed by Asiatic nations, and, as we have seen, to be cultivated by them. Hasselquist also, in reference to this Biblical plant, describes the ground between Smyrna and Magnesia as in some places covered with saffron, and Rauwolf mentions gardens and fields of crocus in the neighbourhood of Aleppo, and particularizes a fragrant variety in Syria.

The name saffron, as usually applied, does not denote the whole plant, nor even the whole flower of crocus sativus, but only the stigmas, with part of the style, which, being plucked out, are carefully dried. These, when prepared, are dry, narrow, thread-like, and twisted together, of an orange-yellow colour, having a peculiar aromatic and penetrating odour, with a bitterish and somewhat aromatic taste, tinging the mouth and saliva of a yellow colour. Sometimes the stigmas are prepared by being submitted to pressure, and thus made into what is called cake saffron, a form in which it is still imported from Persia into India. Hay saffron is obtained in this country chiefly from France and Spain, though it is also sometimes prepared from the native crocus cultivated for this purpose. Saffron was formerly highly esteemed as a stimulant medicine, and still enjoys high repute in Eastern countries, both as a medicine and as a condiment.—J. F. R.

KAREM (קָרֵם). In the Septuagint version a group of eleven towns is inserted between vers. 59 and 60 of Josh. xv., and among these is Karem. This is not the place to discuss the question of the genuineness of that passage. It is enough to say that it does not occur in any Hebrew MS.; that Jerome affirms that it does not exist in the Hebrew, nor in any version besides the LXX.; that it does exist now, and always has existed, in the various codices of the LXX. Jerome thinks the passage genuine, but willfully omitted by Jewish copyists (Comment. in Mich. v. 2); Clericus and Capellus also think it genuine, but omitted by Homoioteuton (Crit. Sac. iv. 5. 3); Buxtorf, Rosenmüller, and others, pronounce it spurious. There can be no doubt that these towns are all situated in the district lying between Bethzur and Jerusalem, and none of the other groups contain any town in that district. Karem is doubtless identical with the modern Ain Kārem, a little village situated on the left bank of Wady Beit Hanfna, three and a half miles west of Jerusalem. It is the reputed birth-place of John the Baptist. It contains a convent and church; the latter is said to occupy the site of the house of Zacharias. A grotto beneath the church has the following legend inscribed on a slab in the floor:—‘Hic Præcursor Domini natus est’ (Quaresmius, ii. 709, seq.; Handbook for S. and P., p. 233; Robinson, B. R., iii. 272; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 266).—J. L. P.

KARKAA (קָרְקָא), with the art. and ה local, ‘floor,’ and perhaps ‘flat,’ Καδής; Carcaa, a place on the southern border of Judah, situated on the high table-land west of Kadesh-barnea (Josh. xv. 3). It is not again mentioned, and the site is unknown.—J. L. P.

KARKOR (קָרְקֹר), ‘level ground’= قَرَقَر; Karkp; Alex. Karkd; omitted in the Vulgate), a place on the east side of the Jordan to which Zeba and Zalmunna fled with their army when defeated by Gideon (Judg. viii. 10). Its situation is not described, but we read that when Gideon pursued them, he ‘went up (from the ford at Succoth) by the way of them that dwell in tents, on the east of Nobah and Jogbehah’ (ver. 11). It must therefore have been somewhere on the level plateau of Mishor, near the eastern border of Moab [JOGBEHAH]. Eusebius and Jerome mention it as in their day a castle (φρούριον) a day’s journey distant from Petra (Onomast., s.v. Carcar). The site is now unknown; but that assigned to it by Eusebius seems too far south.—J. L. P.

KARPAS (כָּרְפַס) occurs in the book of Esther (i. 6), in the description of the hangings ‘in the court of the garden of the king’s palace,’ at the time of the great feast given in the city Shushan, or Susan, by Ahasuerus, who ‘reigned from India even unto Ethiopia.’ We are told that there were white, green (karpas), and blue hangings fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble. Karpas is translated green in our version, on the authority, it is said, ‘of the Chaldee paraphrase,’ where it is interpreted lek-green. Rosenmüller and others derive the Hebrew word from the Arabic كَرْفَس, kurufs, which signifies ‘garden-parsley,’ apium petroselinum, as if it alluded to the green colour of this plant; at the same time arguing that as ‘the word karpas is placed between two other words which undoubtedly denote colours, viz., the white and the purple-blue, it probably also does the same.’ But if two of the words denote colours, it would appear a good reason why the third should refer to the substance which was coloured. This, there is little doubt, is what was intended. If we consider that the occurrences related took place at the Persian court at a time when it held sway even unto India, and that the account is by some supposed to have been originally written in the ancient language of Persia, we may suppose that some foreign words may have been introduced to indicate even an already well-known substance: but more especially so if the substance itself was then first made known to the Hebrews.

The Hebrew karpas is very similar to the Sanscrit karpasum, karpasa, or karpase, signifying the cotton-plant. Celsius (Hierobot. i. 159) states that the Arabs and Persians have karpas and kirbas as names for cotton. These must no doubt be derived from the Sanscrit, while the word kapas is now applied throughout India to cotton with the seed, and may even be seen in English prices-current. Karpasos occurs in the Periplus of Arrian, who states that the region about the Gulf of Barygaze, in India, was productive of carpasus, and of the fine Indian muslins made of it. The word is no doubt derived from the Sanscrit karpasa, and though it has been translated fine muslin by Dr. Vincent, it may mean cotton cloths, or calico in general. Mr. Yates, in his valuable work, Texturinum Antiquorum, states that the earliest notice of this Oriental name in any classical author which he has met with, is the line ‘Carbasina, molochina, ampelina’ of Cæcilius Statius, who died B.C. 169. Mr. Yates infers that as this poet translated from the Greek, so the Greeks must have made use of muslins or calicoes, etc., which were brought from India as early as 200 years B.C. See his work, as well as that of Celsius, for numerous quotations from classical authors, where carbasus occurs; proving that not only the word, but the substance which it indicated, was known to the ancients subsequent to this period. It might, indeed, must, have been known long before to the Persians, as constant communication took place by caravans between the north of India and Persia, as has been clearly shewn by Heeren. Cotton was known to Ctesias, who lived so long at the Persian court.

Nothing can be more suitable than cotton, white and blue, in the above passage of Esther, as the writer of this article long since (1837) remarked in a note in his Essay on the Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine, p. 145: ‘Hanging curtains made with calico, usually in stripes of different colours and padded with cotton, called purdahs, are employed throughout India as a substitute for doors.’ They may be seen used for the very purposes mentioned in the text in the court of the King of Delhi's palace, where, on a paved mosaic terrace, rows of splendid pillars support a light roof, from which hang by rings immense padded and striped curtains, which may be rolled up or removed at pleasure. These either increase light or ventilation, and form, in fact, a kind of movable wall to the building, which is used as one of the halls of audience. This kind of structure was probably introduced by the Persian conquerors of India, and therefore may serve to explain the object of the colonnade in front of the palace in the ruins of Persepolis [COTTON].—J. F. R.

KARTAH (קֶרְתָּה, 'city'; Káðḥ; Alex. Káðḥa; Cartha), a city of Zebulun, assigned to the Levites together with Jokneam (Josh. xxi. 34). It is not again mentioned in Scripture. The parallel passage in 1 Chron. vi. 77, has Rimmon and Tabor instead of Jokneam and Kartah; but the Alex. Codex of the LXX. reads as in Joshua. The town does not seem to have been known to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast., s.v. Cartha). Van de Velde suggests that it may be identical with el-Harti, a village with traces of antiquity on the banks of the Kishon at the base of Carmel, and only a few miles north-west of the site of Jokneam (Memoir, p. 327). The names, however, are radically different.—J. L. P.

KARTAN (קֶרְתָּן, an ancient dual form, 'two towns'; Θεμμῶν; Alex. Νοεμμῶν; Carthan), one of the three cities assigned to the Levites out of the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xxi. 32). The parallel passage in 1 Chron. vi. 76 (61) reads Kirjathaim, which is just the same word differently inflected (קֶרְתָּיִם, 'two towns'; Kariathaim). Nothing is known of its history or site. Eusebius and Jerome only mention it as a Levitical city of Naphtali (Onomast., s.v. Cartham).—J. L. P.

KATTATH (קַטְתָּ, 'small'; Kattath; Alex. Kattath; Catath), a town of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15). Gesenius and Rosenmuller suggest that Kattath is the same as Kitron (קִטְרוֹן), which is mentioned in Judg. i. 30; but there is no evidence for this. Kattath has not been identified, and we have no data to fix its site.—J. L. P.

KEACH, BENJAMIN, a distinguished divine of the Baptist denomination, was born in Buckinghamshire, Feb. 29, 1640, and died in Southwark, July 18, 1704. His parents, too poor to give him a liberal education, intended him for business, but his aspirations were after literature, and he eagerly devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures. At the age of fifteen he joined the Baptist church in Winslow, and three years afterwards was chosen by the members of the same church as their pastor. After the restoration, in common with multitudes, he suffered persecution. Finding no rest from informers in the country, he sought refuge in London, where, with his wife and family, he arrived penniless, having been robbed on the way. Soon after he was ordained pastor of a small society which met in a private house in Tooley Street. His congregation, however, increased, and erected a commodious house of worship in Horsely Down, Southwark, where Dr. Gill afterwards preached. He was very popular; and his congregation at length averaged one thousand persons. His pen was ever active. He published forty-three works, of which sixteen were controversial, nine poetical, and eighteen practical and expository. The works by which he is usually known are:—Tropeologia; or a Key to Open the Scripture Metaphors and Types, London 1682, best ed. 1779, reprinted in Ireland 1856, 1 vol. imp. 8vo; 2. Gospel Mysteries Revealed; or an Exposition of all the Parables, and many express Similitudes, contained in the Four Evangelists, 1701, folio; 1815, 4 vols. 8vo; 1856, 1 vol. royal 8vo. Mingled with unquestioned reverence for the divine word, and much good material of which the judicious student may avail himself with advantage, there is a large amount of fanciful exposition and of unwise spiritualising in these volumes.—I. KEDAR (קֶדָר, 'black'; Kēḏār; Cedar), the second son of Ishmael and founder of one of the most distinguished tribes of Arabia (Gen. xxv. 13-16). The word Kedar signifies 'black,' and the tents of the tribe, like all those of the Bedawin of the present day, were black (Cant. i. 5); hence some have supposed that the name was given to the tribe because of the colour of their tents. Others think that the name originated in the darkness of their complexion (Bochart, Opera, i. 216). This is all mere conjecture. The name was first borne by the son of Ishmael; but whether it originated, like that of Esau, in any peculiarity in the child, or in any event in his after life, we cannot tell. The tents of all the nomad tribes of Arabia are black, and the colour of their skin is uniformly of a light bronze hue, so that the name Kedar was in these respects no more applicable to one tribe than another.

The 'children of Kedar' (בְּנֵי קֶדָר, Is. xxi. 17) were well known to the Israelites, and are more frequently spoken of in Scripture than any of the other Arab tribes. Several particulars are mentioned calculated to illustrate their mode of life, and to indicate their place of abode. They dwelt chiefly in tents (Ps. cxx. 5), though some of them occupied cities and villages (עָרִים וְדִבְרִים; Is. xlii. 11) in the midst of the wilderness of Arabia, apparently in a mountainous and rocky district. They were rich in flocks: 'All the flocks of Kedar shall be gathered together unto thee' (Is. lx. 7); in camels and cattle: 'Their camels shall be a booty and the multitude of their cattle a spoil' (Jer. xlix. 32); and with these they supplied the marts of Tyre during the period of its glory and power (Ezek. xxvii. 21). The children of Kedar were also celebrated as warriors. Isaiah, when foretelling their fall, says, 'All the glory of Kedar shall fail, and the residue of the number of archers, the mighty men of the children of Kedar' (xxi. 16, 17).

Guided by these notices, we infer that the tribe of Kedar had its nucleus in the hill country, north of Medina, where there are still villages and fortresses, and that their pasture-grounds extended to the eastern borders of Syria on the one side, and on the other to the shore of the Red Sea, some of the islands in which they appear to have occupied (Is. xlii. 11, 12; Forster's Geography of Arabia, i. 242, sq.). Pliny speaks of an Arab tribe called Catrei, as dwelling in this region, and adjoining the Nabatheans (H. N. v. 12); there can be no doubt of their identity with the children of Kedar.

Ptolemy calls them Darrae (Geog. vi. 7), evidently a corruption of the ancient Hebrew; and Forster supposes that it is the same people Arrian refers to as the Kanraitae, which he thinks should be read Kadratae (Geog. of Arabia, i. 247). A very ancient Arab tradition states that Kedar settled in the Hedjaz, the country round Mecca and Medina, and that his descendants have ever since ruled there (Abulfedae Hist. Antislamica, ed. Fleischer, p. 192). From Kedar sprung the distinguished tribe of Koreish, to which Mohammed belonged.

The Ishmaelites are well known to be an unchanging people. Their customs and national characteristics they have retained unchanged from the earliest ages. Every tribe also clings with a wonderful tenacity to the homes, fountains, and pasture lands of their ancestors. There can be little doubt, therefore, that the tradition is true that the Hedjaz is still peopled by Kedarite tribes, though the name has disappeared. The Kedarites were distinguished among all the Ishmaelites for the fierceness of their character, and their skill in arms. 'Woe is me,' writes the Psalmist, 'that I dwell in the tents of Kedar. My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace. I am for peace; but, when I speak, they are for war' (cxv. 5). Isaiah, too, celebrates the glory of Kedar, namely, 'its archers,' and its 'mighty men' (xxi. 17). It is a remarkable fact, that at the present time the inhabitants of the Hedjaz are composed of the powerful and warlike tribe called Beni Harb, 'children of war'; some of whom live in villages and towns, but most of them in tents. Burckhardt says they can muster about 40,000 matchlocks, and, next to the Anezes, they 'constitute the most formidable association of Bedawin in Arabia' (Notes on the Bedouin and Wahabys, p. 234). They are still rich in flocks and herds; and they dwell in safety among their native hills, just as their forefathers did in the time of Jeremiah, who says of them, 'Get you up unto the wealthy nation that dwelleth without care, which have neither gates nor bars, which dwell alone. And their camels shall be a booty, and the multitude of their cattle a spoil' (xlix. 31, 32). Thus we find the descendants of Kedar, the son of Ishmael, retaining through nearly four thousand years the very possessions originally occupied by their founder; and retaining also their national characteristics, habits, and even property. This is just another proof of the literal fulfilment of the prophetic promise regarding Ishmael—'He will be a wild man; his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren' (Gen. xvi. 12). KEDEMOTH (קֶדְמוֹת, 'beginnings,' or perhaps 'eastern'; קֶדְמוֹת, Βαρεδμοῦς, and Καδ-μοῦς; Alex. Κεδωῶς, Κεδημοῦς, and Καμηδῶς; Cademoth), a town on the eastern side of Moab, near the river Arnon, with a 'wilderness' or 'pasture land' (מִדְבָּר) encircling it, called by the same name (Deut. ii. 24-26). It was assigned to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), and was one of the cities given out of that tribe to the Levites (1 Chron. vi. 79). The name may probably have originated in the situation of the Kedemoth, on the 'eastern' border of Canaan. The site is not known, nor has the district around it been explored.—J. L. P.

KEDESH (קֶדֶשׁ, 'sanctuary'; Κἄδης, Κἄδες; Alex. Κἄδες; Cades). 1. A town on the south-eastern border of Judah, near the confines of Edom (Josh. xv. 23). In Josh. xv. 3, Kadesh-barnea is mentioned as a border city of Judah towards Edom; and then in ver. 23 the writer says 'the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah, toward the coast of Edom southward, were,'—and among them is Kadesh. The words are identical in Hebrew, though differently pointed, and it may, therefore, be safely concluded that Kadesh and Kadesh-barnea are identical. [KADESH-BARNEA.]

2. (Κἄδες; Alex. Κἄδες; Cedes), a town of Issachar allotted to the Levites (1 Chron. vi. 72 (57)). The parallel passage in Josh. xxi. 28 has Kishon (קִישׁוֹן; Κ῰ωῶν; Alex. Κ῰ωῶν). Keil remarks that the reading Kadesh in Chronicles is probably an error; it is much more probable that for some reason or other the original name was changed, or that the city, like many others, had two names. [KISHON.]

3. KEDESH-NAPHTALI (קֶדֶשׁ נַפְתָּלִי; Κἄδης Νεφθαλί); also called Kadesh in Galilee (Josh. xxi. 32) and simply Kadesh (Josh. xix. 37), an ancient Canaanitish town allotted to the tribe of Naphtali (i. c.), and subsequently assigned to the Levites, and made one of the three cities of refuge west of the Jordan (Josh. xxi. 32). It seems to have been a 'sanctuary' of the old Canaanites; and the Israelites, while they retained the name denoting its character, made it in some respect their 'sanctuary' also. It was emphatically Kadesh Naphtali, 'the holy place of Naphtali,' and the asylum of all northern Palestine. Kadesh was principally celebrated as the home of Barak, and the gathering-place of that noble band of patriots who, on the banks of the Kishon, freed Israel from the power of the king of Hazor and his general Sisera (Judg. iv.). Kadesh lay on the northern frontier of Palestine, and had to bear the brunt of the first incursion of the Assyrians. With other cities round it—Dan, Ijon, Abel, etc.—it was captured by Tiglath-pileser, and its inhabitants carried away to Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29). The city appears no more in sacred history; but until this day it has never been wholly destroyed or desolated. We read of it during the wars of the Maccabees (1 Maccab. xi. 63), when it was reckoned a town of Galilee. Josephus calls it ἡ Κἄδεσσα (Antiq. v. 1. 18), and describes it as situated on the confines of the country of Tyre in Upper Galilee (xiii. 5. 6). In his time it appears to have passed into the hands of the Tyrians (Bell. Jud. ii. 18. 1); though Reland supposes, without any real grounds, that there was another Kadesh near Tyre (Pal., p. 697). Eusebius tells us that it is called Κνδοσσός, and is situated eight miles from Tyre, near Paneas (Onomast., s. v. Cedes). In the 12th century Benjamin of Tudela visited Kadesh, and found there the tomb of Barak and several Jewish saints (Early Travels in Pal., 89).

Kedesh still retains its ancient name under the

High up among the mountains of Naphtali is a little green plain, embosomed in wooded hill tops. On its western side is a rounded tell, on which the modern village stands. From the tell a low narrow ridge projects into the plain, with flat top and steep sides, covered with rank vegetation. Both ridge and tell are strewn with ruins; a large column stands in the centre of the village, and two others lie beside it. On the eastern slope are heaps of hewn stones, large sarcophagi, broken pillars, and other remnants of former grandeur—here lying on piles in tobacco gardens, and there strewn thickly over the surface, half covered with rubbish and rank weeds. In the plain, at the northern base of the ridge, round a little fountain, lie the most interesting remains of Kedesh. A number of sarcophagi serve the purpose of water-troughs. Near these are the ruins of two beautiful buildings, but whether mausoleums, temples, or synagogues, it is difficult to determine. Between them is a very remarkable group of sarcophagi standing on a massive platform of solid masonry. They were profusely ornamented with sculptures, now so much defaced that the writer, who visited Kedes in 1858, could not make out the subjects. These are doubtless the tombs of which Benjamin of Tudela and Brocardus speak (chap. vii., p. 173); and they shew that down to a comparatively late period the Jews still regarded Kedesh as a sanctuary. (See Handbook for S. and P., p. 443; Robinson, B. R., iii. pp. 367-369; Stanley, S. and P., 332, 382; Lectures on Jewish Church, 317.) Kedes is now a small and miserable village, but the situation is delightful, the air pure and bracing, and the view, especially towards the north-east, where Hermon rises over the wooded height, rich and grand. The plain beside Kedes and the surrounding hills are thinly covered with terebinth and oak forests, among which the writer saw at several places the black tents of a nomad tribe which frequents this region. In the narrative of Barak's triumph we read that 'Heber the Kenite . . . had severed himself from the Kenites (who were settled in the south of Palestine, Judg. i. 16), and pitched his tent at the terebinths of Zaanaïm (or 'of the wanderers,' E. V. 'the plain of Zaanaïm,' עֲרֵאֵלָן בְּצִעְעֵינִים; ἔως δρυὸς πλεονεκτούντων; Alex. πρὸς δρὺν ἀναπανομένων), 'which is by Kedesh' (Judg. iv. 11). The features of the country, and the state of the people, do not seem to be much changed since the days of Barak.—J. L. P.

KEDRON. [KIDRON.]

KEEPER. Five Hebrew words are thus translated in the A. V.

1. נָטַר, from נָטַר, custodivit, servavit; only employed for a keeper of a vineyard, Cant. i. 6; viii. 11. Akin to this is—

2. נָצַר, from נָצַר, Job xxvii. 18:—'As a booth that the keeper maketh;' cf. Prov. xxvii. 18; Is. xxvii. 3. The word is elsewhere rendered 'watchman,' 2 Kings xvii. 9; Jer. xxxi. 6; or 'watcher,' Jer. iv. 16.

3. רָעָה, 'a shepherd,' from רָעָה, 'pavit,' of Abel, Gen. iv. 2; Moses, Exod. iii. 1; David, 1 Sam. xvi. 11; xvii. 34. The word is almost always translated 'shepherd,' either actual, Exod. ii. 17; 1 Sam. xxv. 7; or metaphorical, as of Cyrus, Is. xlv. 28; and of Jehovah, Ps. xxiii. 1; lxxx. 1 (2); but sometimes 'pastor' (only in Jer.), Jer. iii. 15; x. 21; or 'herdman,' Gen. xiii. 7, 8; xxvi. 20.

4. שָׁמַר, from שָׁמַר, custodivit, servavit; used frequently in such phrases as, 'keeper of the door or gate,' 2 Kings xxii. 4; Neh. xiii. 22; Esther vi. 2; Jer. lii. 24; 'of the wardrobe,' 2 Kings xxii. 14; 2 Chron. xxiv. 22; 'of the watch,' 2 Kings xi. 5; 'of the women,' Esther ii. 3, 8, 14. It is often translated 'watchman,' Is. xxi. 11, 12; Ps. cxvii. 1; and is used of Jehovah, Ps. cxxi. 3, 4, 5, etc.

5. שָׂר, 'a prince,' or 'captain,' only in Gen. xxxix. 21, 22, 23, as 'keeper of the prison': the same word being used of Potiphar, 'captain of the guard,' Gen. xxxix. 1; xl. 3; and of the 'chief of the butlers and chief of the bakers,' Gen. xl. 2.—E. V.

KEHELATHAH (קְהֵלָתָה, i.g., קְהֵלָה, 'assembly,' Μακελλάς; Alex. Μακελάς; Cedatha), one of the stations of the Israelites between Sinai and Kadesh. It is only mentioned in Num. xxxiii. 22. There are no data by which to determine the site. The name may have originated in some extraordinary assembly of the people.—J. L. P.

KEIL, KARL AUG. GOTTIL, was born at Grossenhain, 23d April 1754, and died at Leipsic, where he was professor of theology, 22d April 1818. His writings are chiefly Hermeneutical. In 1810 he published Lehrbuch d. Hermeneutik, which was translated into Latin by Emmerling, Elementa Her. Novi Test., Lips. 1811. After his death, his occasional writings were collected and published under the title of Opuscula Academica, by J. D. Goldhorn, Lips. 1821. Besides treatises on topics of Hermeneutical interest, this volume contains several exegetical essays, and an elaborate dissertation, De Platonica philosophia ad theol. Christ. apud vet. eccles. scriptores ratione. Keil is a perspicuous writer, and his works, though cold and formal, are full of good sense and solid learning.—W. L. A.

KEILAH (קַעֲלָה, perhaps i.g., קַעֲלָה, 'fortress,' Κεῖλδα and Κεῖλδ; Alex. Keelad; Ceila), a city of Judah, situated in the Shephelah or plain of Philistia, near Mareshah and Nezeb (Josh. xv. 33, 44). When David was a refugee from the Israelitish court, Keilah was attacked, and its threshing-floors plundered by the Philistines. The inhabitants appear to have taken refuge within their walls. News was brought to David; he 'went down' from the mountains of Judah, defeated the Philistines, took away their cattle, and relieved Keilah (1 Sam. xxiii. 1-5). David and his 600 followers settled for a time in the town; but when an attack was threatened by Saul he discovered that the ungrateful inhabitants were resolved to betray him; and so 'David and his men . . . arose: and departed out of Keilah, and went whitherso-ever they could go' (vers. 6-13). Keilah was one of the places reoccupied after the captivity (Neh. iii. 17, 18). Josephus calls the city Καίλα; and Eusebius describes it as still a village called Κηλα, seventeen miles east of Eleutheropolis toward Hebron; but Jerome makes it only eight miles (Onomast., s.v. Cela). They both state that it contained the tomb of the prophet Habakkuk (see also s.v. Echela). The city and tomb are mentioned by Sozomen (Hist. vii. 29; Reland, Pal., p. 698). Eight Roman miles from Beit Jibrin, the ancient Eleutheropolis, on the way to Hebron, is a large ruined tower or castle called Kela. It stands on a projecting cliff on the right bank of Wady el-Feranj (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 328; cf. Robinson, B. R., iii. 71). There can be little doubt that this is the long-lost Keilah. The situation corresponds exactly to the incidental notices in the Bible, and the statements of Jerome.—J. L. P.

KELEB (כֶּלֶב; Sept. κύων, κυνέριον). This word probably is onomatopoeic, and is applied to the canine species from the peculiar sound of their cry; comp. Germ. Klaffen, and Eng. Yelp. Bochart compares it with the Arab. كلوب, Kelub, a hook or trident, and كلاباث, cullabath, longs (more properly الكلباتي, elkulbatni); and says, 'Canis ididem כֶּלֶב dictus a firmitate dentium quibus morsus tenacitas tanta est ut harpaginum et forcipum instar videri queat' (Hieroz., part I. bk. i. c. 9); but it is more likely that these words are derived themselves from the Arabic كلب, kelb, a ravenous animal, applied to both the lion and the dog. The dog was used by the Hebrews for the purpose of watching houses (Is. lvi. 10) and flocks (Joh xxx. 1 [HERDS AND FLOCKS]). At a later period we find dogs also accompanying their masters in their journeys (Tob. v. 16; xi. 4). There were, however, then as now, throughout the East, large numbers of unappropriated dogs, which wandered in troops through the cities and villages seeking food (1 Kings xiv. 11; xvi. 4; 2 Kings ix. 10). 'There is,' says Col. Hamilton Smith, 'in Asia, still extant one, perhaps more than one, species, that never have been the companions of man, and there are races of uncertain origin, that may have been formerly domesticated, but which are now feral, and as fierce as wolves; while, from the particular opinions of Oriental nations, there are others, exceedingly numerous, neither wild nor domesticated, but existing in all the cities and towns of the Levant, without owners; feeding on carrion and offals, and still having the true instinct of protecting property, guarding the inhabitants of the district or quarter where they are tolerated; and so far cherished, that water and some food are not unusually placed within their reach.

'The true wild species of Upper and Eastern Asia is a low, sharp-nosed reddish cur-dog, not unlike a fox, but with less tail. In Persia and Turkey there exists a larger dog, resembling a wolf, exceedingly savage. Both are gregarious, hunt in packs, but are occasionally seen alone. They are readily distinguished from a wolf by their shorter unfurnished tails.

'The street-dog, without master, apparently derived from the rufous-cur, and in Egypt partaking of the mongrel greyhound, often more or less hare, with a mangy unctuous skin, frequently with several teeth wanting, was, as it now is, considered a defiling animal. It is to animals of this class, which no doubt followed the camp of Israel, and hung on its skirts, that allusion is more particularly made in Exod. xxii. 31; for the same custom exists at this day, and the race of street-dogs still retain their ancient habits. A portion of the Cairo packs annually become hadgis, and go and return with the caravan to Mecca, while others come from Damascus, acting in the same manner; and it is known that the pilgrims from the banks of the Indus are similarly attended to Kerbela: indeed, every caravan is so, more or less, by these poor animals. But with regard to the dogs that devoured Jezebel, and licked up Ahab's blood (1 Kings xxi. 23), they may have been of the wild races, a species of which is reported to have particularly infested the banks of the Kishon and the district of Jezreel' (comp. Stanley, Sin. and Pal., 350). The dog among the Hebrews was despised and held unclean (Is. lxvi. 3); and hence the name was used as a term of reproach and contempt (2 Kings viii. 13), just as it is still in the East among the Mohammedans, who apply this name to Christians. It was also applied to men of fierce and audacious character (1 Sam. xxiv. 14; 2 Sam. xvi. 9; Ps. xxii. 16, etc.) From the impudicity of the dog, the name was applied to male prostitutes (Deut. xxiii. 18 [19]; see Rosenmüller, in loc.; comp. κύες, Rev. xxii. 15). 'In Egypt, anterior to the Christian era, domestic dogs were venerated; they continued to be cherished till the Arabian conquest, when they, like the unowned street-dogs, fell under the imprecation of Mohammed, who with reluctance, though with good policy, modified his denunciations and sentence of destruction in favour of hunting-dogs, and even permitted game killed by them to be eaten under certain conditions (Jardine's Naturalist's Library, vols. ix. and x., which contain the Canidæ). We figure a specimen of Feral, or wild dog, copied from a large Persian picture in the library of the Hon. East India Company. In this picture the Shah and his sons are seen killing game, and among the rest the dogs in question' (C. H. S.)—W. L. A.

KEMUEL (כֶּמֶל, congregation of God; Sept. Καμουηλ). 1. The third son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, by Milcah, Gen. xxii. 21, 'the father of Aram,' who is erroneously identified by the LXX. and Vulgate with the progenitor of the Syrian people, πατέρα Σύρων, 'patrem Syrorum.' The name Aram, however, was of much earlier date, Gen. x. 22, 23; and we should rather look for Kemuel's progeny in the tribe of Ram, to 'the kindred' of which Elihu, the son of Barachel, the descendant of Kemuel's brother Buz, belonged, Job xxxii. 2.

2. The son of Shiphtan, 'prince (נָשִׁיטָן) of the tribe of Ephraim,' one of the ten chiefs chosen to allot the land of Canaan among the tribes, Num. xxxiv. 24.

3. The father of Hashabiah, 'ruler (נָשִׁיטָן) of the tribe of Levi,' in the time of David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 17. If this Hashabiah is the same with the one mentioned in the preceding chapter, 1 Chron. xxvi. 30, who, with 1700 of his kinsmen, had oversight of secular and religious matters under David in the western part of the trans-Jordanic district, Kemuel must have been a descendant of Hebron the son of Kohath.—E. V.

KENATH (נֶנֶת), 'possession;' Kadā and Kavāḏ; Alex. Kaavḏ; Chanath, a strong city of Bashan, situated in the province of Argob (Num. xxxii. 42; 1 Chron. ii. 23; cf. Deut. iii. 14). It appears to have been one of the 'three-score great cities, fenced with high walls, gates, and bars' (Deut. iii. 3, 4), which Jair captured. Nobah, a Manassite, headed a separate expedition against Kenath, took it, and called it Nobah (Num. i. c.). The new name it retained for at least two hundred years, for when Gideon passed 'by the way of them that dwell in tents,' in pursuit of the kings of Midian, he went east of Nobah (Judg. viii. 11); but we hear no more of it in Scripture. It lay on the eastern border of Manasseh, among mountains, on the confines of a wild province, and exposed to the incursions of the desert tribes; the Jews, therefore, probably either abandoned or were driven out of it at an early period. Josephus calls the city Canatha, and locates it in Coelesyria (Kavaḏā, Bell. Jud. i. 19. 2). In his time it was inhabited by Arabians, who defeated the troops led against them by Herod the Great. Ptolemy also places it in Coelesyria (Geog., v. 13), and Pliny makes it one of the cities of Decapolis (Hist. Nat., v. 15). Eusebius' notice of it is important as tending to define its exact position, and to identify the Kenath of the Hebrews, the Canatha of the Greeks, and the modern Kunawāt. He thus writes:—'Canath, a village of Arabia, now called Canatha (Kavaḏā), to which Nobah gave his own name; it belonged to the tribe of Manasseh. It is now situated in the province of Trachonitis, near Bostra' (Onomast., s.v. Canath). In the Pentinger Tables it is placed on the road leading from Damascus to Bostra, twenty miles from the latter (Reland, Pal. p. 421). It became the seat of a bishopric in the fifth century (Id., p. 682).

The above data clearly prove that the modern Kunawāt is the Kenath of the Bible. It is beautifully situated in the midst of oak forests, on the western declivities of the mountains of Bashan, twenty miles north of Bozrah. The ruins, which cover a space a mile long and half a mile wide, are among the finest and most interesting east of the Jordan. They consist of temples, palaces, theatres, towers, and a hippodrome of the Roman age; or one or two churches of early Christian times, and a great number of massive private houses, with stone roofs and stone doors, which were probably built by the ancient Rephaim. The city walls are in some places nearly perfect. In front of one of the most beautiful of the temples the writer discovered a colossal head of Ashteroth, a deity which seems to have been worshipped here before the time of Abraham, as one of the chief cities of Bashan was then called Ashteroth-Carnaim (Gen. xiv. 5). Kunawat is now occupied by a few families of Druses, who find a home in the old houses. (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, pp. 82, seq.; Porter's Damascus, ii. pp. 87-115; Ritter, Pal. und Syr., ii. pp. 931-939; Buckingham, Travels among the Arab Tribes, p. 240.)—J. L. P.

KENAZ (כְּנָז), perhaps 'hunting' = قَنْص; Kenē; Alex., in 1 Chron. i. 36, Kenē; Cenez, a grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11), and the founder of a family or tribe among the Edomites. Kenaz is styled one of the Dukes (שְׂרָפִים, literally 'leaders,' probably equivalent to the modern Arabic Shiekh) of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 15, 42). The descendants of Esau did not all settle within the limits of Edom. The Itureans migrated northward to the borders of Damascus; Amalek settled in the desert between Egypt and Palestine; Teman went eastward into Arabia. We are justified, therefore, in inferring that Kenaz also may have led his family and followers to a distance from Mount Seir. Dr. Wells suggests that the Kenezites mentioned in Gen. xv. 19 were the descendants of Kenaz (Geogr. i. 169). Mr. Forster adopts this view; but it is clearly at variance with the scope of the Mosaic narrative. The words of the covenant made with Abraham were: 'Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates, the Kenites, and the Kenizzites,' etc., plainly implying that these tribes then occupied the land, whereas Kenaz, the grandson of Esau, was not born for a century and a half after the Kenizzites were thus noticed. Forster's idea that the promise to Abraham was proleptical cannot be entertained.

Forster maintains that the tribe of Kenaz, or Al-Kenaz with the Arabic article prefixed, are identical with the Laekeni or Laeni of Ptolemy, a tribe dwelling near the shores of the Persian Gulf (Geog. vi. 7); and these he would further identify with the Aenezes (properly Anesh, عنزة), the largest and most powerful tribe of Bedawīn in Arabia. It is possible that the Hebrew Qoph (ק) may have been changed into the Arabic Ain (ع); in other respects the names are identical. The Aenezes cover the desert from the Euphrates to Syria, and from Aleppo on the north to the mountains of Nejd on the south. It is said that they can bring into the field 10,000 horsemen, and 90,000 camel-riders, and they are lords of a district some 40,000 square miles in area (Forster, Geography of Arabia, ii. 43; Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins and Wahabys, i. sq.; Handbook for S. and P., pp. 536, sq.)—J. L. P.

KENITE (כְּנִיזִי and כְּנִי in 1 Sam. xxvii. 10; Kenai; Cinai), a tribe of people who originally inhabited the rocky and desert region lying between Southern Palestine and the mountains of Sinai adjoining—and even partly intermingling with—the Amalekites (Num. xxiv. 21; 1 Sam. xv. 6). In the time of Abraham they possessed a part of that country which the Lord promised to him (Gen. xv. 19), and which extended from Egypt to the Euphrates (ver. 18). At the Exodus the Kenites pastured their flocks round Sinai and Horeb. Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, was a Kenite (Judg. i. 16); and it was when Moses kept his flocks on the heights of Horeb, that the Lord appeared to him in the burning bush (Exod. iii. 1, 2). Now Jethro is said to have been 'priest of Midian' (ver. 1), and a 'Midianite' (Num. x. 29); hence we conclude that the Midianites and Kenites were identical. It seems, however, that there were two distinct tribes of Midianites, one descended from Abraham's son by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2), and the other an older Arabian tribe [MIDIANITES]. If this be so, then the Kenites were the older tribe. They were nomads, and roamed over the country on the northern border of the Sinai peninsula, and along the eastern shores of the Gulf of Akabah. This region agrees well with the prophetic description of Balaam:—'And he looked on the Kenites, and said, Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock' (Num. xxiv. 21). The wild and rocky mountains along the west side of the valley of Arabah, and on both shores of the gulf of Akabah, were the home of the Kenites.

The connection of Moses with the Kenites, and the friendship shewn by that tribe to the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness, had an important influence upon their after history. Moses invited Jethro to accompany him to Palestine; he declined (Num. x. 29-32); but a portion of the tribe afterwards joined the Israelites, and had assigned to them a region on the southern border of Judah, such as fitted a nomad people (Judg. i. 16). There they had the Israelites on the one side, and the Amalekites on the other. One family of them, separating themselves from their brethren in the south, migrated away to northern Palestine, and pitched their tents beneath the oak trees on the upland grassy plains of Kedesh-Naphtali (Judg. iv. 11). And it was here that Jael, the wife of Heber their chief, slew Sisera, who had sought refuge in her tent (vers. 17-21). It would appear from the narrative that while the Kenites preserved their old friendly intercourse with the Israelites, they were also at peace with the enemies of Israel, —with the Canaanites in the north and the Amalekites in the south. When Saul marched against the Amalekites, he warned the Kenites to separate themselves from them, for, he said, 'Ye shewed kindness to all the children of Israel when they came up out of Egypt' (1 Sam. xv. 6). The Kenites still retained their possessions in the south of Judah during the time of David; but we hear no more of them in Scripture history. In the Targums, instead of Kenites we find Shalmi (שַׁלְמִי), and the Talmudists generally represent them as an Arabian tribe (Lightfoot, Opera, ii. 429; Reland, Pal. 140). Procopius describes the Kenites as holding the country about Petra and Cades (Kadesh), and bordering on the Amalekites (ad Gen. xv.; see Reland, p. 81). The name has long since disappeared; but probably the old Kenites are represented by some of the nomad tribes that still pasture their flocks on the southern frontier of Palestine (See A. Murray, Comm. de Kinacis, Hamb. 1718; Winer, Biblich. Real-Wörterbuch, s. v. Keniter).—J. L. P.

KENEZITE OR KENIZZITE (כְּנִזִּי, 'hunter';

Kenēzaiot; Kenēzaiot). 1. One of the ancient tribes which inhabited the country given in covenant-promise to Abraham (Gen. xv. 19). The sacred writer gives no information as to what part of the country they inhabited; but as they are not mentioned among the tribes of Canaan who were actually dispossessed by the Israelites (Exod. iii. 8; Josh. iii. 10; Judg. iii. 5), we may infer that the Kenizzites dwelt beyond the borders of those tribes. The whole country from Egypt to the Euphrates was promised to Abraham (Gen. xv. 18); the country divided by lot among the twelve tribes extended only from Dan to Beersheba, and consequently by far the larger portion of the 'land of promise' did not then become 'the land of possession,' and indeed never was occupied by the Israelites, though the conquests of David probably extended over it. Bochart supposes that the Kenizzites had become extinct between the times of Abraham and Joshua. It is more probable that they inhabited some part of the Arabian desert on the confines of Syria to which the expeditions of Joshua did not reach (see Bochart, Opera, i. 307). This is the view of the Talmudists, as may be seen in the quotation from their writings given by Lightfoot (Opera, ii. 429). Forster's theory that the Kenizzites were descended from Kenaz, Esau's grandson, is altogether untenable (see, however, Geography of Arabia, ii. 43).

2. A patronymic of Caleb (Num. xxxii. 12; Josh. xiv. 6). In the A. V. this is written Kenizite, but it ought to be Kenizzite (כְּנִזִּי). Ewald maintains that Caleb really belonged to the tribe of the Kenizzites, and was an adopted Israelite (Isr. Gesch. i. 298). Prof. Stanley (Lectures on Jewish Church, p. 260) and Lord Arthur Hervey (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Caleb) hold the same view, and regard Caleb as of Idumean origin, and descended from Kenaz, Esau's grandson. But a careful study of sacred history proves that the Edomites and Israelites had many names in common; and the patronymic Kenizzite is derived from an ancestor called Kenaz, whose name is mentioned in Judg. i. 13, and who was perhaps Caleb's grandfather. (See Art. CALEB).—J. L. P.

KENNICOTT, BENJAMIN, D.D., one of the most eminent Biblical scholars, English or foreign, was born at Totness in Devonshire, April 4, 1718. His father was parish clerk, and master of a charity school, in which latter situation Benjamin succeeded him at an early period, continuing to discharge the duties of his humble office till 1744, when, having previously given proof of possessing superior talents, he was, through the kindness of several gentlemen in the neighbourhood, who opened a subscription for the purpose, enabled to enter the university of Oxford. He entered at Wadham College, and applied himself to the study of divinity and Hebrew with diligence and success. While an undergraduate, he published—Two Dissertations: 1. On the Tree of Life in Paradise, with some Observations on the Fall of Man; 2. On the Oblations of Cain and Abel, 8vo, which came to a second edition in 1747, and procured him the distinguished honour of a Bachelor's degree before the statutable time, and without the usual fees. Shortly afterwards he was elected Fellow of Exeter

College, and in 1750 took his degree of M.A. He was appointed librarian of Radcliffe Library, and made D.D. in 1767. He was also canon of Christ Church, and rector of Culham in Oxfordshire, and was subsequently presented to the living of Mynhenyote, in Cornwall, which, however, as he was unable to visit it, he resigned two years before his death. He continued to reside at Oxford till the last, and died of a lingering illness, Sept. 18, 1783.

No man has done more than Kennicott to advance the cause of Biblical science in the department of the O. T., upon which all his labours were concentrated. His great work, to be immediately named, was preceded, and its way prepared, by his dissertations, entitled, The State of the Printed Hebrew Text of the O. T. Considered, Oxford 1753; 1759, 2 vols. 8vo. In these dissertations he evinces the necessity of the work upon which he had set his heart, by refuting the popular notion of the 'absolute integrity' of the Hebrew text. The first contains 'a comparison of 1 Chron. xi. with 2 Sam. v. and xxiii., and observations on seventy MSS., with an extract of mistakes and various readings.' The second vindicates the Samaritan Pentateuch, proves the printed copies of the Chaldee paraphrase (the accordance of which with the text of the O. T. was boasted of as evincing the purity of the latter) to be corrupt; ascertains the sentiments of the Jews on the Hebrew text; gives an account of the Hebrew MSS. known to be extant, and furnishes a catalogue of one hundred Hebrew MSS. preserved in the public libraries at Oxford, Cambridge, and the British Museum. 'This work, as might reasonably be expected, was examined with great severity at home and abroad.' In 1760 Dr. K. issued his proposals for collating all the Hebrew MSS. made before the invention of printing, which could be discovered in the British Isles or in foreign countries. Liberal subscriptions were raised for defraying the expenses which such a work necessarily involved. The name of King George III. headed the list. Dr. Secker, Bishop of Oxford, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, was among his first subscribers. The subscriptions amounted in all to nearly £10,000. Dr. K., who published annually an account of the progress of collation, was assisted in his work by many learned men, especially by Professor Bruns, of the University of Helmstadt, who not only collated MSS. in Germany, but also travelled into Switzerland and Italy for the same purpose. More than 600 Hebrew MSS., and 16 MSS. of the Samaritan Pentateuch, were either wholly or partially collated. To the collation of MSS. was also added a collation of the most distinguished printed editions of the Hebrew Bible. Dr. K. also availed himself of quotations from the Hebrew Bible in the works of rabbinical writers, especially the Talmud. At length, sixteen years after the publication of his proposals, appeared the first, and four years subsequently, the second, vol. of his magnificent edition of the Hebrew Bible: Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum cum variis Lectionibus, Oxonii 1776, 1780, 2 vols. folio. The text is that of Van der Hooght; 'but as variations in the points were disregarded in the collation, the points were not added to the text.' The various readings are printed at the foot of the page. In the Pentateuch the deviations of the Samaritan text were printed in a column parallel to the Hebrew. To the second vol. Dr. K. annexed his Dissertatio Generalis (answering to Prolegomena in similar works, afterwards reprinted separately), containing an account of the MSS. and other authorities collated for this edition, and also a review of the Hebrew text, divided into periods, and beginning with the formation of the Hebrew canon after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, 'a work of great interest to every Biblical scholar' (Horne's Bib. Bibliog.; Marsh's Divinity Lectures, part 2; Encyc. Brit.; Davidson's Bib. Crit.; Eng. Cyc.)

The faults attaching to this great work of Kennicott are thus summarised by Dr. Davidson:—'He neglected the Massorah as if it were wholly worthless. In specifying his sources, he is not always consistent or uniform in his method. Some MSS. are only partially examined. Neither was he very accurate in extracting various readings from his copies. Where several letters are wanting in MSS. there is no remark indicating whether the defect should be remedied, and how. The MSS. corrected by a different hand are rejected without reason. Old synagogue MSS. are neglected, though they would have contributed to the value of the various readings. Van der Hooght's text is not accurately given, since the marginal Kris, the vowel points, and the accents, have been left out. The Samaritan text should have been given in Samaritan letters, that readers might see the origin of many of the various readings. The edition wants extracts from ancient versions, which is a serious defect. His principles, or rules, for judging Hebrew MSS., and determining the age, quality, or value, are defective. In applying his copious materials he often errs. He proceeds too much on the assumption that the Massoretic text is corrupt where it differs from the Samaritan Pentateuch and ancient versions, and therefore sets about reforming it where it is authentic and genuine' (Bib. Crit., 2d ed., p. 154-55). Yet Dr. D. asserts:—'There can be no doubt that Kennicott was a most laborious editor. To him belongs the great merit of bringing together a large mass of critical materials... The task of furnishing such an apparatus, drawn from so many sources, scattered through the libraries of many lands, was almost herculean; and the learned author is entitled to all the praise for its accomplishment' (do.)

It did not, however, realize the expectations which many had entertained respecting it; for the majority of the various readings were found to be trifling, of little or no value to amend the sacred text. But this was not the fault of the editor, but the praise of the Jewish transcribers, whose accuracy preserved them from many serious blunders in the performance of their task; but due specially to the influence of the Massorah, which has truly been a 'hedge' around the text of the sacred books.

To the preceding works of Dr. K. we add the following:—Crítica Sacra, a short Introduction to Hebrew Criticism, London 1774, 8vo; Benjamin Kennicotti Epistola ad Joh. Dav. Michaelum de censura primi Tomi Bibliorum Hebraicorum nuper editi, in Bibliotheca ejus Orientali, parte xi., Oxon. 1777, 8vo; Editionis Veteris Testamenti Hebraici, cum Variis Lectionibus brevis Defensio contra Ephemeridum Goetgensium Criminationes, Oxon. 1782, 8vo; and a posthumous work entitled, Remarks on Select Passages in the Old Testament; to which are added Eight Sermons, Oxford 1787, 8vo. More than one hundred pages of this work are occupied with a translation of thirty-two psalms, and critical notes on the entire book. It is worthy of the author's reputation.—I. J.

KERACH (קֶרַח). This word, which properly means frost (Gen. xxxi. 40; Jer. xxxvi. 30), and thence ice (Job xxxvii. 10; xxxviii. 29), is used by Ezekiel (i. 22) to describe the appearance of the pavement on which stood the throne of God. Some interpreters would retain the meaning ice here as agreeing better with the epithet הַקֶּרַח, the terrible, or awful; but there is nothing specially terrible in ice, for though it may cause to shudder, that is with cold, not with fear. All the ancient interpreters understand crystal to be the meaning here, and with this most modern expositors agree. This is confirmed by the parallel passage Rev. iv. 6; comp. Exod. xxiv. 10. Michaelis, in a dissertation, Naturalia quædam et artificialia Cod. Sac. ex Alcorano illustrans, published in Pott's Sylloge Comment. Theol., vol. ii., adduces (p. 54) a passage from the Koran (xxvii. 41), in which the throne of Solomon is represented as placed on a floor of crystal so pure that the Queen of Sheba thought it was water, and prepared to wade through it (see Lane's Selections from the Kurân, p. 240).—W. L. A.

KERCHIEFS. This is the rendering in the A. V. of the Hebrew word כִּרְכַּפִּיּוֹת, which occurs only in Ezek. xiii. 18, 21; LXX. ἐπιβόλαια; Sym. ἐπαυχῆνια; Vulg. cervicalia; Chald. פתכורין, idola, imagines idololatrice, s. species velaminum

(Castell, s. v. פתך); Syr. ܟܪܚܝܬܐ, tecta, operimenta. There is difference of opinion as to what these mispachoth were. Kimchi, who is followed by Schroeder (De vest. mulieb. Hebr., p. 266), and Hävernicks (in loc.), says they were long loose robes such as the goddesses are represented as wearing (pepla), and in which the women referred to by the prophet wrapped the whole person, from head to foot. With this the rendering of the LXX. and the Syr. accords. Rosenmüller, Gesenius, and others, understand by the word cushions or mattresses on which one might recline; Henderson, whilst rendering it by cushions, prefers, in his note, the meaning coverlets or quilts; while Hitzig thinks they were the Jewish טלית, tallith, the long white cloth with which the worshipper covered his head during prayer. In favour of our understanding the word of something flowing and flexible, like a veil, loose robe, or cloth, are the etymology of the word (from מִסַּפַּח, to flow or spread out), and the statement in ver. 21 that these mispachoth were to be torn. The affinity of the word with מִסְפָּחוֹת, which undoubtedly designates some such loose garment as that in which Oriental women wrap themselves from head to foot (Ruth iii. 15; Is. iii. 22), and the statement that these mispachoth were עַל רֹאשׁ, induce us to give the preference to the meaning given by Kimchi. These words can hardly be translated 'on the head of every height,' so as to mean 'on the head of men of every height,' they are better taken thus, 'robes of every length on the head,' i. e., these luxurious and licentious women made use of elegant and well-fitting robes to effect their purpose.—W. L. A.

KEREN-HAPPUCH (קֶרֶן הַפּוּחַ), the name of the third daughter born to Job after his trial. In the Sept. the word is rendered by képas amalthéas, Amalthæa's Horn, or Cornucopia, alluding to the fable of Amalthea, to whom Zeus gave a horn endowed with the power of becoming filled with whatever the possessor desired. Recent interpreters have generally followed the Vulgate rendering Cornu-Stibii, 'Horn of Stibium', used as a pigment to adorn the eye-brows of women in Arabia, and as a collyrium to give lustre to the eyes' (Lee, Commentary, p. 554). Ewald gives the inelegant rendering, Schmink-büchsen, paint-box, or rouge-pot, and Renan the no less inelegant one, Botte de fard. It is not easy for us to conceive how such a name should come to be bestowed on a beautiful girl. Rosenmüller says it was 'a præstantia formæ, quod naturali sua formæ æque venusta esset et ornata ac eac mulieres quæ stibio oculos fucant.' But this is surely very far-fetched. Does not קֶרֶן mean generally something ornamented or made artificially beautiful (comp. Is. liv. 11, where it is used of building per ordinem, Vulg., ἀνθρακα Sept.), and 1 Chron. xxix. 2, where it designates some kind of stone artificially beautified? and may not Job's daughter's name thus mean Horn of adornment, or Horn of beauty?—surely a better name for a damsel of surpassing loveliness than either Horn of Plenty or Horn of Stibium, to say nothing of Paint-box or Rouge-pot.—W. L. A.

KERI and KETHIV (קֶרִי וּכְתִיב, plural קִרְיִין וּכְתִיבִין), so frequently found in the margins and foot-notes of the Hebrew Bibles, exhibit the most ancient various readings, and constitute the most important portion of the critico-exegetical apparatus bequeathed to us by the Jews of olden times [MASSORAH].

1. Signification, classification, and mode of indication of the Keri and Kethiv.—The word קֶרִי may either be the imperative or participle passive of the Chaldee verb קָרָא, to call out, to read, and hence may signify Read, or It is read, i. e., the word in question: כְּתִיב, is participle passive of the Chaldee verb כָּתַב, to write, and signifies, It is written, i. e., the word in question in the text. Those who prefer taking the word קֶרִי as participle, do so on the ground that it is more consonant with its companion כְּתִיב, which is the participle passive. The Rabbins also call the Keri מִקְרָא, and the Kethiv מִכְתָּב. The different readings exhibited in the Keri and Kethiv may be divided into three general classes: i. Words read differently to what they are written, arising from the omission, insertion, exchanging, or transposition of a single letter (כְּתִיב וּכְתִיב, or Variations); ii. Words read but not written in the text (קֶרִי וְלֹא כְּתִיב), or Insertions of entire words; and iii. Words written in the text, but not read (כְּתִיב וְלֹא קֶרִי), or Omissions of entire words.

i. The first general class (קֶרִי וּכְתִיב) comprises the bulk of the various readings, and consists of—a, Corrections of errors arising from mistaking homonyms, e.g., ל, the negative particle, for the similarly sounding ל, the pronoun, of which we have fifteen instances (comp. Exod. xvi. 8; Lev. xi. 21; xxv. 30; 1 Sam. ii. 3; 2 Sam. xvi. 18; 2 Kings viii. 10; Ezra iv. 2; Job xiii. 15; xli. 4; Ps. c. 3; cxxxix. 16; Prov. xix. 7; xxvi. 2; Is. ix. 2; lxxiii. 9), and two instances in which the reverse is the case (1 Sam. ii. 16; xx. 2). Besides being noticed in their respective places, the Massorah also enumerates them all on Lev. xi. 15. The Talmud, Sopherim vi., gives three additional ones, viz., 1 Chron. xi. 21; Job vi. 21; Is. xlix. 5. ל for ל, of which we have four instances (1 Sam. xx. 24; 1 Kings i. 33; Job vii. 1; Is. lxxv. 7; Ezek. ix. 5).—ב. Errors arising from mistaking the letters which resemble each other, e.g., ב for כ (comp. Prov. xxi. 29); ב for פ (Ezek. xxv. 7); ב for ק (1 Sam. iv. 13); ב for ר, of which the Massorah on Prov. xix. 19, and Jer. xli. 40, gives four instances (2 Sam. xiii. 37; 2 Kings xvi. 6; Jer. xxi. 40; Prov. xix. 19); ב for ח (Jer. xxviii. 1; xxxii. 1); ב for ט (2 Sam. xxiii. 13); ב for ת, of which the Massorah on Prov. xx. 21 gives four instances (2 Sam. xiii. 37; Prov. xx. 21; Song of Songs i. 17; Dan. ix. 24); ב for ש (1 Sam. xiv. 32); ב for י in innumerable instances; ב for כ in eleven cases (Josh. iv. 18; vi. 5, 15; 1 Sam. xi. 6, 9; 2 Sam. v. 24; 2 Kings iii. 24; Ezra viii. 14; Neh. iii. 20; Esth. iii. 4; Job xli. 13); ב for ק (Is. xxx. 32); ב for ע (2 Kings xx. 4); ב for ר twice (Jer. ii. 20; Ezra viii. 14); ב for ת (Eccl. xii. 6); ב for ח (2 Kings xxiv. 14; xxv. 17; Jer. lii. 21).—ע. Errors arising from exchanging letters which belong to the same organs of speech, e.g., ב for ט, of which the Keri exhibits one instance (Josh. xxii. 7), and vice versa, of which the Great Massorah, under letter ט, gives six instances (Josh. iii. 16; xxiv. 15; 2 Kings v. 12; xii. 10; xxxiii. 33; Dan. xi. 18); ט for כ (2 Kings xvii. 21); ע for א (1 Sam. xx. 24; 1 Kings i. 33; Job vii. 1; Is. lxxv. 7; Ezek. ix. 5); ט for ד (Is. lxxv. 4).—ד. Errors arising from the transposition of letters, which the Massorah designates מְסֻחָה and מְסֻחָה, and of which it gives sixty-two cases, as, for instance, the textual reading or the Kethiv is הָאֹהֶל, the tent, and the marginal reading or the Keri, transposing the letters ל and ה, has הָאֹהֶל these (comp. Josh. vi. 13; xx. 8; xxi. 27; Judg. xvi. 26; 1 Sam. xiv. 27; xix. 18, 22, 23 (twice); xxvii. 8; 2 Sam. iii. 25; xiv. 30; xvii. 16; xviii. 8; xx. 14; xxiv. 16; 1 Kings vii. 45; 2 Kings xi. 2; xiv. 6; 1 Chron. i. 46; iii. 24; xxvii. 29; 2 Chron. xvii. 8; xxix. 8; Ezra ii. 46; iv. 4; viii. 17; Neh. iv. 7; xii. 14; Esther i. 5, 16; Job xxvi. 12; Ps. lxxiii. 2; cxxxix. 6; cxlv. 6; Prov. i. 27; xiii. 20; xix. 16; xxxiii. 5, 26; xxxi. 27; Eccl. ix. 4; Is. xxxvii. 30; Jer. ii. 25; viii. 6; ix. 7; xv. 4; xvii. 23; xxiv. 9; xxix. 18, 23; xxxii. 23; xlii. 20; l. 15; Ezek. xxxvi. 14; xl. 15; xlii. 16; xliii. 15, 16; Dan. iv. 9; v. 7, 16 (twice), 29).—ע. Errors arising from the small letter י being dropped before the pronominal י from plural nouns, and making them to be singular, of which there are a hundred and thirteen instances (Gen. xxxiii. 4; Exod. xxvii. 11; xxviii. 28; xxix. 19; xxxix. 4, 33; Lev. ix. 22; xvi. 21; Num. xii. 3; Deut. ii. 33; vii. 9; viii. 2; xxvii. 10; xxxiii. 9; Josh. iii. 4; viii. 11; xvi. 3; Ruth iii. 14; 1 Sam. ii. 9, 10 (twice); iii.

Errors of a grammatical nature, arising from dropping the article ה, where it ought to be, of which the Keri exhibits fourteen instances (1 Sam. xiv. 32; 2 Sam. xxiii. 9; 1 Kings iv. 7; vii. 20; xv. 18; 2 Kings xi. 20; xv. 25; Is. xxxiii. 15; Jer. x. 13; xvii. 19; xl. 3; lii. 32; Lam. i. 18; Ezek. xviii. 20), or from the insertion of it where it ought not to be, of which there are ten instances (1 Sam. xxvi. 12; 1 Kings xxi. 8; 2 Kings vii. 12, 13; xv. 25; Eccl. vi. 10; x. 3, 20; Is. xxix. 11; Jer. xxxviii. 11); or from the dropping of the ה after נָעַר, or writing נָעַר instead of נָעַר when used as feminines or any other letter.—ג. Errors arising from the wrong division of words, e.g., the first word having a letter which belongs to the second, exhibited by the Keri in three instances, and stated in the Massorah on 2 Sam. v. 2 (2 Sam. v. 2; Job. xxxviii. 12; Lam. iv. 16), or the second word having a letter which belongs to the first, of which there are two instances (1 Sam. xxi. 12; Ezra iv. 12); or one word being divided into two separate words, of which the Massorah on 2 Chron. xxxiv. mentions eight instances (Judg. xvi. 25; 1 Sam. ix. 1; xxiv. 8; 1 Kings xviii. 5; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 6; Is. ix. 6; Lam. i. 6; iv. 3), or two separate words being written as one, exhibited by the Keri in fifteen instances (Gen. xxx. 11; Exod. iv. 2; Deut. xxxiii. 2; 1 Chron. ix. 4; xxvii. 12; Neh. ii. 23; Job xxxviii. 1; xl. 6; Ps. x. 10; lv. 16; cxliii. 4; Is. iii. 15; Jer. vi. 29; xviii. 3; Ezek. viii. 6).—א. Exegetical Keris or marginal readings which substitute euphemisms for the cacophonous terms used in the text, in accordance with the injunction of the ancient sages, that 'all the verses wherein indecent expressions occur are to be replaced by decent words, e.g., יִשְׁכְּבָנָה by יִשְׁכְּבָנָה [of which the Keri exhibits four instances, viz., Deut. xxviii. 30; Is. xiii. 16; Jer. iii. 2; Zech. xiv. 2], עַפְרָיִם by מְטוֹרִים [of which the Keri exhibits six instances, viz., Deut. xxviii. 27; 1 Sam. v. 6, 9; vi. 4, 5, 17; omitting, however, 1 Sam. v. 12]; חֲרִיתִים by רִבְיוֹנִים [of which the Keri exhibits one instances, viz., 2 Kings vi. 25]; צואתם by חוריהם [of which the Keri exhibits two instances, 2 Kings xviii. 27; Is. xxxvi. 12]; מימי שיניהם by מימי [of which the Keri exhibits two instances, 2 Kings xviii. 27; Is. xxxvi. 12]; למחראות by למחאות [of which there is one instance, 2 Kings x. 27, comp. Megilla 25, 6].

The manner in which this general class of various readings is indicated is as follows: The variations specified under a and b, not affecting the vowel points, are simply indicated by a small circle or asterisk placed over the word in the text (כתב), which directs to the marginal reading (קרי), where the emendation is given, as for instance the Kethiv in Exod. xxi. 8 is לא, in 1 Sam. xx. 24 על, and in Prov. xxi. 29 יבין, and the marginal gloss remarks

קרי, אל ק, יבין ק, the ק being an abbreviation for קרי. In the variations specified under c and d, where the different letters of the Kethiv and the Keri require different vowel points, the abnormal textual reading, or the Kethiv, has not only the small circle or asterisk, but also takes the vowel points which belong to the normal marginal reading, or the Keri, e.g., the appropriate pointing of the textual reading, or the Kethiv in 2 Kings xvii. 21 is יורא, but it is pointed יורא, because these vowel signs belong to the marginal reading, or the Keri יורא, which it is intended should accompany the vowel points in the text. The same is the case with the textual reading in 2 Sam. xiv. 30, which, according to the marginal reading, exhibits a transposition of letters, and which can hardly be pronounced with its textual points והציתיה, because these vowel-signs belong to the Keri והציתיה. Whilst in the variations specified under e, f, g, and h, which involve an addition or diminution of letters, and which have therefore either more or fewer letters than are required by the vowel-points of the Keri, a vowel sign is sometimes given without any letter at all, or two vowel signs have to be attached to one letter, and sometimes a letter has to be without any vowel sign; the variation itself being either indicated in the margin by the exhibition of the entire word which constitutes the different reading, or by the simple remark that such and such a letter is wanting, or is redundant. Thus, for instance, Lam. v. 7, which, according to the Massorah, exhibits two of the twelve instances where the ו conjunctive has been dropped from the beginning of words (comp. also 2 Kings iv. 7; Job ii. 7; Prov. xxiii. 24; xxvii. 24; Is. lv. 13; Lam. ii. 2; iv. 16; v. 3, 5; Dan. ii. 43), the textual reading or the Kethiv is אֲנָחְנוּ, and the marginal reading or the Keri וְאֵינוּ ק, וְאֵינוּ ק, the vowel sign of the conjunction from the margin is inserted in the text under the little circle, and consequently has no letter at all; in Jer. xlii. 6, again, where the textual reading is אָנוּ, and the marginal reading אֲנָחְנוּ, and the Kethiv, which has only three letters, takes the vowel signs of the Keri, which has five letters, it is pointed אָנוּ, with two different vowel points attached to the one ו; whilst in 2 Kings vii. 15, where the reverse is the case, the marginal reading having fewer letters, and hence fewer vowels than the textual reading, which takes the vowel signs of the former, the Kethiv is pointed וְאֵינוּ, and the ו has no vowel sign at all.

There is a peculiarity connected with the marginal indication of those words the variations of which consist in the diminution or addition of a single letter. When a letter is dropt from a word in the text (כתב), the whole word is given in the marginal reading (קרי), with the letter in question, and the remark 'Read so;' as, for instance, 1 Sam. xiv. 32; Prov. xxiii. 24, where the ו, according to the Massorah, is dropt from השלל, and ו from יורד, as indicated by יִשְׁלַל and יִיָּרַד; the marginal glosses are 'קרי השלל ק, יורד ק;' but when the reverse is the case, if a letter has crept into a word, the whole word is not given in the marginal gloss, but it is simply remarked that such and such a letter is redundant (יתיר), or is not to be read

(לא קרי), as, for instance, in Eccles. x. 20; Neh. ix. 17, where the ו, according to the Massorah, has crept in before כנפים, and ו before חסד, the marginal gloss simply remarks 'ו יתיר ו, יתיר ו.' Upon this point, however, the greatest inconsistency is manifested in the Massoretic glosses; comp., for instance, the Kethiv עֵינוּ ו and נלך in Eccles. iv. 8, 17, both of which, according to the Keri, have a redundant ו, and are singular nouns, yet the Massoretic note upon the former is 'קרי עֵינוּ ו, exhibiting the whole word, whilst on the latter it simply remarks 'יתיר ו.'

ii. The second class (קרי ולא כתב), which comprises entire words omitted from the text, exhibits ten such instances which occur in the Hebrew Bible, as follows, Judg. xx. 13; Ruth iii. 5, 17; 2 Sam. viii. 3; xvi. 23; xviii. 20; 2 Kings xix. 31, 37; Jer. xxxi. 38; l. 29. Besides being noted in the marginal glosses on the respective passages, these omissions are also given in the Massorah on Deut. i. and Ruth iii. 16. They are also enumerated in the Talmud, Tract Sopherim, vi. 8, and in Nedarim 37, b. In Nedarim, however, the passage which refers to this subject is as follows,

'the insertion of words in the text (קרי ולא כתב) is exhibited in פרת [2 Sam. viii. 3]; ארז [ibid. xvi. 23]; באים [Jer. xxxi. 38]; לה [ibid. l. 29]; את [Ruth ii. 11]; אלי [ibid. iii. 5, 17];' thus omitting four instances—viz., Judg. xx. 13; 2 Sam. xviii. 20; 2 Kings xix. 31, 37; and adding one—viz., Ruth ii. 11, which is neither given by the Massorah nor in Sopherim.

This class of variations is indicated by a small circle or asterisk placed in the text with the vowel-signs of the word which is wanting, referring to the margin, where the word in question is given. Thus, for instance, in Judg. xx. 13, where, according to the Keri, the word בני is omitted, the Kethiv is בנינו, upon which the marginal gloss remarks בני קרי ולא כתב.

iii. Of the third class (קרי ולא כתב), exhibiting entire words which have crept into the text, there are eight instances, as follows, Ruth iii. 12; 2 Sam. xiii. 33; xv. 21; 2 Kings v. 18; Jer. xxxviii. 16; xxxix. 12; li. 3; Ezek. xlvi. 16. These variations are not only noted in the marginal glosses on the respective passages, but are also given in the Massorah on Ruth iii. 12. The passage in Nedarim 27, b, which speaks of this class of variations, remarking, 'words which are found in the text, but are not read (כתיב ולא קרי) are exhibited in נא [2 Kings v. 18]; ואח [Jer. xxxii. 11]; ירדך [ibid. li. 3]; חמש [Ezek. xlviii. 16]; אס [Ruth iii. 12], omits 2 Sam. xiii. 33; xv. 21; and Jer. xxxviii. 16; xxxix. 12; and adds Jer. xxxii. 11, which does not exist in the Massorah; whilst Sopherim vi. 9, which remarks אמתן כאשר במקום נואל ירדך חמש, referring to 2 Sam. xiii. 33; Jer. xxxix. 12; 2 Sam. xv. 21; Ruth iii. 12; Jer. li. 3; Ezek. xlviii. 16; omits 2 Kings v. 18 and Jer. xxxviii. 16.

This class of variations is not uniformly indicated in the different editions of the Bible. Generally the word in question has no vowel signs, but an asterisk or small circle is put over it, referring to the margin, where it is simply remarked כתיב

לא קרי, written in the text but not read; in one or two instances, however, the word itself is repeated in the margin, as in 2 Kings v. 18, where we have it נא כתיב ולא קרי, the word נא is written in the text but not read.

2. Number and position of the Keri and Kethiv.

—A great difference of opinion prevails about the number and position of these various readings. The Talmud, as we have shewn above, and the early Jewish commentators, mention variations which do not exist in the Keris and Kethivs of the Massorah. This, however, is beyond the aim of the present article, which is to investigate the Keri and Kethiv as exhibited in the Massorah and in the editions of the Hebrew Bible. From a careful perusal and collation of the Massorah, as printed in the Rabbinic Bibles, we find the following to be the number of the Keris and Kethivs in each book, according to the order of the Hebrew Bible:—

Genesis	24	2 Kings	80	Habbakuk	2	Lamentations	28
Exodus	12	Isaiah	55	Zephaniah	1	Ecclesiastes	11
Leviticus	5	Jeremiah	148	Haggai	1	Esther	14
Numbers	11	Ezekiel	143	Zechariah	7	Daniel	129
Deuteronomy	24	Hosea	6	Malachi	1	Ezra	33
Joshua	38	Joel	1	Psalms	74	Nehemiah	28
Judges	22	Amos	3	Proverbs	70	1 Chronicles	41
1 Samuel	73	Obadiah	1	Job	54	2 Chronicles	39
2 Samuel	99	Micah	4	Song of Songs	5
1 Kings	49	Nahum	4	Ruth	13	Total	1353

The disparity between Abbravanel's calculations about the number of Keris and Kethivs, leading him to the conclusion that the Pentateuch has 65, Jeremiah 81, and 1 and 2 Samuel 138 (Introduction to Jeremiah), and the numbers which we have stated as existing in these books, is easily accounted for when it is remembered that this erudite commentator died fifteen years before the laborious Jacob b. Chajim collated and published the Massorah on the Hebrew Scriptures [ABRAVANEL; JACOB B. CHAJIM], and therefore had no opportunity of consulting them carefully. But we find it far more difficult to account for the serious difference in the calculations of later writers and our results, as may be seen from the following table. (See on p. 723.)

For the collation of Bomberg's Bible, the Plantin Bible, and the Antwerp Bible, we are indebted to the tables exhibited in Cappellus' Critica Sacra, p. 70, and Walton's Prolegomena (ed. Cantabrigiæ 1828, vol. i., p. 473); and though we have been able by our arrangement to correct their blunder in representing Elias Levita as separating the Five Megilloth from the Hagiographa, and giving the number of Keris to be 329 exclusive of the Megilloth; yet we were obliged to describe the Megilloth apart from the Hagiographa, to which they belong according to the Jewish order of the Canon. Elias Levita's own words on the numbers are as follows:—'I counted the Keris and Kethivs several times, and found that they were in all 848; of these, 65 are in the Pentateuch, 454 in the Prophets, and 329 in the Hagiographa. It is surprising that there should only be 65 in the Pentateuch, 22 of which refer to the single word נער, which is נער in the Kethiv, and נער in the Keri; that the book of Joshua, which in quantity is about a tenth part of the Pentateuch, should have 32; and that the books of Samuel, which are merely about a fourth the size of the Pentateuch, should contain 133' (Massoreth Ha-Massoreth, ed. Sulzbach 1771, p. 8, seq.) It will be seen from this extract that Elias Levita not only gives six Keris less in Joshua than we have given, but also differs from Abbravanel in the number of Keris to be found in the books of Samuel.

3. Origin and date of the Keri and Kethiv:—

The Talmud traces the source of these variations to Moses himself, for we are distinctly told in Nedarim 37 b, that 'the pronunciation of certain words according to the scribes (מקרא סופרים), the emendations of the scribes (עטור סופרים), the not reading of words which are in the text (כתיב ולא קרי), and the reading of words which are not in the text (קרי ולא כתיב), etc., are a law of Moses from Sinai.' Jacob b. Chajim defends this view in his elaborate introduction to the Rabbinic Bible. Elias Levita, who also exposes this Talmudic declaration, explains it as follows:—'The Keri and Kethiv of the Pentateuch only are a law of Moses from Mount Sinai, and the members of the Great Synagogue, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishaël, Azariah, Ezra, Nehemiah, Mordecai, and Zerubbabel, and other wise men from the craftsmen and artisans (סחרים) to the number of a hundred and twenty, wrote down the Keri and the Kethiv according to the tradition which they possessed, that our teacher Moses, peace be with him, read words differently to what they were written in the text for one of those mysteries which they knew, that Moses transmitted this mystery to Joshua, Joshua to the elders, the elders to the prophets, etc., and they put down in the margin as his readings, Ezra acting as a scribe. In the same manner they proceeded in the Prophets and Hagiographa with every word respecting which they had a tradition orally transmitted from the prophets and the sages, that it was read differently to what it was in the text. But they required no tradition for the post-exile books, as the authors themselves were present with them; hence, whenever they met with a word which did not seem to harmonize with the context and the sense, the author stated to them the reason why he used such anomalous expressions, and they wrote down the word in the margin as it should be read' (Massoreth Ha-Massoreth, fol. 8 b, ff.) Mendelssohn in his valuable introduction to his translation of the Pentateuch, and most of the ancient Jewish writers, propounded the same view. It is in accordance with this recondite sense ascribed to the origin of the Keri and Kethiv, that Rashi remarks on Gen. viii. 16, הוצא כתיב, הוצא קרי אמור להם שצאנו הוצא אם אינם רוצים הוצא, because he was first to tell them to go out; but if they should refuse to go, he was to make them go.' Kimchi, however, is of the opposite opinion. So far from believing that these variations proceeded from the sacred writers themselves, who designed to convey thereby various mysteries, he maintains that the Keri and Kethiv originated after the Babylonish captivity, when the sacred books were collected by the members of the Great Synagogue. These editors of the long-lost and mutilated inspired writings 'found different readings in the volumes, and adopted those which the majority of copies had, because they, according to their opinion, exhibited the true readings. In some places they wrote down one word in the text without putting the vowel signs to it, or noted it in the margin without inserting it in the text; whilst in other places they inserted one reading in the margin and another in the text' (Introduction to his Comment. on Joshua). Ephodi (flor. 1391-1403), who maintains the same view, remarks that Ezra and his followers 'made the Keri and Kethiv on every passage in which they found some obliterations and confusion, as they were not sure what the precise reading was.' Abravanel, who will neither admit that the Keris and Kethivs proceeded from the sacred writers themselves, nor that they took their rise from the imperfect state of the codices, propounds a new theory. According to him, Ezra and his followers, who undertook the editing of the Scriptures, found the sacred books entire and perfect, but in perusing them these editors discovered that they contained irregular expressions, and loose and ungrammatical phrases, arising from the carelessness and ignorance of the inspired writers. 'Ezra had therefore to explain these words in harmony with the connection, and this is the origin of the Keri which is found in the margin of the Bible, as this holy scribe feared to touch the words which were spoken or written by the Holy Ghost. These remarks he made on his own account to explain those anomalous letters and expressions, and put them in the margin to indicate that the gloss is his own. Now, if you examine the numerous Keris and Kethivs in Jeremiah, and look into their connection, you will find them all to be of this nature, viz., that they are to be traced to Jeremiah's careless and blundering writing. . . . From this you may learn that the books which have most Keris and Kethivs show that their authors did not know how to speak correctly or to write properly' (Introduction to his Comment. on Jeremiah). Though Abравanel's hypothesis has more truth in it than the other theories, yet it is only by a combination of the three views that the origin of the Keri and Kethiv can be traced and explained. For there can be no doubt that some of the variations, as the Talmud, Rashi, etc., declare, have been transmitted by tradition from time immemorial, and have their origin in some recondite meaning or mysteries attached to the passages in question; * that some again, as Kimchi, Ephodi, etc., rightly maintain, are due to the blunders and corruptions which have crept into the text in the course of time, and which the spiritual guides of the nation tried to rectify by a comparison of codices, as is also admitted by the Talmud (comp. Jerusalem Megillah, iv. 2; Sopherim, vi. 4); and that others, again, as Abравanel, remarks, are owing to the carelessness of style, ignorance of idioms and provincialisms, which the editors and successive interpreters of the Hebrew canon discovered in the different books, or more properly speaking, which were at variance with the grammatical rules and exegetical laws developed in aftertime by the Massorites. Such, however, was their reverence for the ancient text, that these Massorites who made the new additions to it, left the text itself untouched in the very places where they believed it necessary to follow another explanation or reading, but simply inserted the emendation in the margin. Hence the distinction between the ancient text as it was written, or Kethiv (כתב), and the more modern emended reading, or Keri (קרי); and hence, also, the fact that the Keri is not inserted in the synagogal scrolls, though it is followed in the public reading of the Scriptures.

4. Importance of the Keri and Kethiv, especially as relating to the English versions of the Hebrew Scriptures.—Some idea of the importance of the Keri and Kethiv may be gathered from the following analysis of the seventy-six variations which occur in the Pentateuch. Of the seventy-six Keris, twenty-one give נָעַר instead of נָעָר (Gen. xxiv. 14, 16, 28, 55, 57; xxxiv. 3 [twice], 12; Deut. xxii. 15 [twice], 16, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26 [twice], 27, 28, 29), which was evidently epicene in earlier periods (comp. Gesenius, Gramm., sec. 23, sec. 32, 6; Ewald, Lehrbuch, sec. 175, 6); fifteen have the plural termination יָ affixed to nouns instead of the singular י in the text (Gen. xxxiii. 4; Exod. xxvii. 11; xxviii. 28; xxxii. 19; xxxix. 4, 33; Lev. ix. 22; xvi. 21; Num. xii. 3; Deut. ii. 33; v. 10; vii. 9; viii. 2; xxvii. 10; xxxiii. 9), which some think is no real variation, since in earlier periods the termination י was both singular and plural, just as בָּנָי stands for both בָּנִי and בָּנֵי; seventeen give more current and uniform forms of words (Gen. viii. 17; x. 19; xiv. 8; xxv. 33 with l. 26; xxv. 23 with xxxv. 11; xxvii. 3 with 5, 7; xxvii. 29 with the same word in the next clause; xxxvi. 6, 14, with ver. 18; xxxix. 20, 22; xliii. 28 with xxvii. 29; Exod. xvi. 2; xvi. 7 with Num. xvi. 11; Num. xiv. 36 with xv. 24; Num. xxi. 32 with xxxii. 39; xxxii. 7 with xxx. 6; Deut. xxxii. 13 with Amos iv. 13); five substitute the termination third person singular, י for ה (Gen. xlix. 11 [twice]; Exod. xxii. 26; xxxii. 17; Num. x. 36), which is a less common pronominal suffix (comp. Gesenius, Gramm., sec. 91; Ewald, Lehrbuch, sec. 247, a); two make two words of one (Gen. xxx. 11; Exod. iv. 2); two have שָׁלֵי instead of שָׁלֵי (Exod. xvi. 13; Num. xi. 32); three give plural verbs instead of singular (Lev. xxi. 5; Num. xxxiv. 4; Deut. xxxi. 7), which are no doubt an improvement, since Num. xxxiv. 4 is evidently a mistake, as may be seen from a comparison of this verse with verse 5; three substitute the relative pronoun הָ for the negative particle לֹא (Exod. xxi. 8; Lev. xi. 21; xxv. 30), which is very important; two substitute euphemisms for cacophonous expressions (Deut. xxviii. 27, 30); and two are purely traditional, viz., Num. i. 16; xxvi. 9, which are explained in the note of the preceding section. The Pentateuch, however, can hardly be regarded as giving an adequate idea of the importance of the Keri and Kethiv, inasmuch as the Jews, regarding the law as more sacred than any other inspired book, guarded it against being corrupted with greater vigilance than the rest of the canon. Hence the comparatively few and unimportant Keris when contrasted with those occurring in the other volumes. Still, the Pentateuch contains a few specimens of almost all the different Keris.

As to the question how far our English versions have been influenced by the Keri and Kethiv? this will best be answered by a comparison of the translations with the more striking variations which occur in the Prophets and Hagiographa.

In Josh. v. 1, the textual reading is, 'till we were passed over' (עָבְרָנוּ); the Keri has עָבְרָם, 'until they passed over;' and though the Sept.,

* As instances may be quoted, the (כתב) textual reading גִּימִים = גִּינֵי נָאִים, two princes, in Gen.

xxv. 23, which ancient tradition refers to the two friends, the emperor Antoninus and R. Jehudah the Prince (ר' יהודה הנשיא), who lived like magnates, and the (קרי) marginal reading גִּוִּים, nations (comp. Berachoth 57 b, which explains the otherwise unintelligible remarks of Rashi on Gen. xxv. 23), Num. i. 16, where קְרָאִי is substituted for קְרִיאַי, and Num. xxvi. 9, where, on the contrary, קְרִיאַי is substituted for קְרָאִי, to distinguish between the former, who were called to everything that was honourable in the community (הַקְרָאִים)

הַנְּכֹבָדִים, and the latter, who incited the children of Israel against Moses (comp. Rashi, in loco).

Vulg., Chaldee, Luther, the Zurich Bible, Coverdale, the Bishops' Bible, the Geneva Version, etc., adopt the Keri, the A. V., following Kimchi, adheres to the Kethiv; whilst in Josh. vi. 7, where the textual reading is, 'and they said (ויאמרו) unto the people,' and the marginal emendation is, 'and he said' (ויאמר), and where the Vulg., Chaldee, Luther, the Zurich Bible, Coverdale, the Bishops' Bible, and the Geneva Version, again adopt the Keri, as in the former instance, the A. V. abandons the textual reading, and espouses the emendation. In Josh. xv. 47, again, where the Keri is 'the bordering sea (הים הנבל) and its territory;' and the Kethiv has, 'and the great sea (הים הגדול) and the territory,' which is again followed by the ancient versions and the translations of the Reformers, the A. V., without taking any notice of the textual reading in the margin, as in Josh. viii. 16, adopts the emendation; whereas in Josh. xv. 53 the A. V. follows the textual reading (יננס) Janum, noticing however the emendation (ינס) Janus in the margin. All the ten emendations of the second class, which propose the insertion of entire words into the text (קרי ולא כתיב), are adopted in the A. V. without the slightest indication by the usual italics that they are not in the text. Of the eight omissions of entire words in the third class (כתיב ולא קרי), nothing decisive can be said, inasmuch as six of them refer to simple particles, and they might either be recognised by the translators or not without its being discernible in the version. The only two instances, however, where there can be no mistake (Jer. xli. 3; Ezek. xlvi. 16) clearly shew that the A. V. follows the marginal gloss, and accordingly rejects the words which are in the text. Had the limits of this article allowed it, we could have shewn still more unquestionably, that though the A. V. generally adopts the marginal emendations, yet in many instances it proceeds most arbitrarily, and adheres to the textual reading; and that, with very few exceptions, it never indicates by italics, or in the margin, the difference between the textual and the marginal readings.

Inattention to the Keri and Kethiv has given rise to the most fanciful and absurd expositions, of which the following may serve both as a specimen and a warning. In looking at the text of the Hebrew Bibles, it will be seen that there is a final Mem (ם) in the middle of the word לסרבה, Is. ix. 6. We have already alluded to the fact that it exhibits one of the fifteen instances where the Kethiv, or the textual reading, is one word, and the Keri, or the emended reading, proposes two words (vide supra, sect. 3). Accordingly, לסרבה stands for לָם רָבָה = לָהֶם, i.e., 'to them the dominion shall be great,' corresponding to the common abbreviation בָּם רָבָה. The question is not whether לָם may be considered as an abbreviation of להם, seeing there are no other examples of it; suffice it to say, that Jewish scribes and critics of ancient times took it as such, just as they regarded אראלם (Is. xxxiii. 7) as a contraction of לָם = אראלם (comp. the Syriac, the Chaldee, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Vulgate, Elias Levita, etc.); and that the Sept. read it as two words (i.e., לָה רָבָה). Subsequent scribes, however, found it either to be more in accordance with the primitive reading, or with their exegetical rules, as well as with the usage of the prophet himself (comp. Is. xxxiii. 23), to read it as one word; but their extreme reverence for the text prevented them from making this alteration without indicating that some codices have two words. Hence, though they joined the two words together as one, they yet left the final Mem to exhibit the variation. An example of the reverse occurs in Neh. ii. 13, where המפרתים has been divided into two words, הם פרתים, and where the same anxiety faithfully to exhibit the ancient reading has made the editors of the Hebrew canon retain the medial Mem at the end of the word. It was to be expected that those Jews who regard both readings as emanating from the Holy Ghost, and as designed to convey some recondite meaning, would find some mysteries in this final Mem in the middle of לסרבה. Hence we find in the Talmud (Sanhedrin 94) the following remark upon it, 'Why is it that all the Mems in the middle of a word are open [i.e. מ] and this one is closed [i.e. ם]? The Holy One, blessed be he! wanted to make Hezekiah the Messiah, and Sennacherib Gog and Magog; whereupon Justice pleaded before the presence of the Holy One, blessed be he! Lord of the World, what David the king of Israel, who sang so many hymns and praises before thee, wilt thou not make him the Messiah, but Hezekiah, for whom thou hast performed all those miracles, and who has not uttered one song before thee, wilt thou make him the Messiah? Therefore has the Mem been closed.' Ibn Ezra again tells us that the scribes (not he himself, as Gill erroneously states) see in it an allusion to the recession of the shadow on the dial in Hezekiah's time; whilst Kimchi will have it that it refers to the 'stopping up of the breaches in the walls of Jerusalem, which are broken down during the captivity, and that this will take place in the days of salvation, when the kingdom which had been shut up till the coming of the Messiah will be opened.' But that Christian expositors should excel these mystical interpretations is surpassing strange. What are we to say to Galatinus, who submits that this Mem, being the cypher of 600, intimates that six hundred years after this prophecy the birth of Christ was to take place? or to the opinion which he quotes, that the name מרים שרה, Maria Domina, or that the perpetual virginity of Mary is thereby indicated (lib. vii. c. xlii.)? Or to Calvin, who thinks that it denotes the close and secret way whereby the Messiah should come to reign and set up his kingdom? or to the opinion which he mentions, that it indicates the exclusion of the Jews from the Messiah's kingdom for their unbelief? Or to the conjecture of Gill, that 'it may denote that the government of Christ, which would be for a time straitened, and kept in narrow bounds and limits, should hereafter be throughout the world, to the four corners of it, to be firm and stable, perfect and complete, which the figure of this letter, being shut, and four-square, may be an emblem of?'

It only remains to be added, that there are some words, which are always read differently (קרי) to what they are written in the text (כתיב), and which, from the frequency of their occurrence, have only the vowel signs of the proposed Keri, without the latter being exhibited in the marginal gloss. These are, a, The name יְרִיּוֹת, which has always the vowel signs of יְרִיּוֹת, and is pronounced with these vowels, i. e., יְרִיּוֹת, except when it precedes this name itself, in which case it has the vowel signs of יְרִיּוֹת, i. e., יְרִיּוֹת; b, The name Jerusalem, when, as in the earlier books of Scripture, it is written with a Yod before the Mem, has never its own points, i. e., יְרִיּוֹת, or יְרִיּוֹת, but has the vowel signs of יְרִיּוֹת, and is read so; c, The word הוּא, which was epicene in earlier periods, is always pointed הוּא in the Pentateuch, when it is used as feminine, to make it conformable to the later feminine form הִיא; and d, The name יִשְׁכָּן is always furnished with the vowels belonging to the Keri יִשְׁכָּן with one Shin.

5. Literature.—One of the earliest attempts freely to discourse upon the origin and value of the Keri and Kethiv, is that of Kimchi, in the Introduction to his Commentary on Joshua; Abravanel, too, has a lengthy disquisition on this subject, in the Introduction to his Commentary on Jeremiah. He was followed by the laborious Jacob B. Chajim, who fully discusses the Keri and Kethiv in his celebrated Introduction to the Rabbinic Bible, translated by Ginsburg in the Journal of Sacred Literature for July 1863; and by the erudite and bold Elias Levita, who gives a very lucid account of the Keri and Kethiv, in his Massoreth Ha-Massoreth, ed. Sulzbach, 1771, pp. 8 a, ff., 21 a, ff. Of Christian writers are to be mentioned the masterly treatises by Cappellus, Critica Sacra, lib. iii. cap. ix., seq.; Buxtorf, Tiberias, cap. xiii.; Buxtorf the younger, Anticritica, Basileae 1653, cap. iv. p. 448-509; Hillier De Arcano Kethib et Keri, Tub. 1602; Walton, Biblia Polyglotta, Proleg., Cantab. 1828, vol. i. p. 412, seq.; Wolf, Bibliotheca Hebraea, ii. p. 507-533; Frankel, Vorstudien zu der Septuaginta, Leipzig 1841, p. 219, seq.—C. KERIOTH, KIRIOTH (קְרִיּוֹת, 'cities'). 1.

A town on the southern border of Judah, towards Edom. It is only mentioned in Josh. xv. 25. The LXX. reads αἱ πόλεις (Alex. πόλεις) 'Aσερῶν, thus translating the clause, 'cities of Hezron.' The Syriac version follows the LXX.; but the whole scope of the Hebrew shews that Kerioth is a proper name, and, if connected with Hezron, as Reland thinks it ought to be, it would make Kerioth-Hezron, like Ilazar-Gadiah (ver. 27), the name of the place (but see Keil on Joshua, ad loc.) Jerome in the Vulgate translates the passage, 'Carioth, Hezron, hæc est Asor;' but he does not mention it in the Onomasticon. Reland suggests that Judas Iscariot got his name from this place, deriving Iscariot from קְרִיּוֹת, 'a man of Kerioth' (Pal., p. 700; see also Winer, R. W., s. v. Kerioth). Robinson saw a ruined place called Kuryetein, about fifteen miles south of Hebron, which, he suggests, may occupy the site of Kerioth (B. R., ii. 101). Though these ruins do not lie quite so far south as would seem to be indicated by the sacred writer, yet they may possibly be those of Kerioth. Moladah and Ain are mentioned in the same group (ver. 26, 32), and their sites are not far distant from Kuryetein. Kur-

yetein is the Arabic dual of Kuryah (قَرْيَة), and signifies 'two towns'; it is thus nearly equivalent to the Hebrew Kerioth.

2. A town of Moab (קַרְיֹוֹת; Carioth), mentioned by Jeremiah in connection with Beth-gamul and Bozrah (xlvi. 24). It would also appear, from an incidental notice, that it was one of the strong cities of Moab:—'Kerioth is taken, and the strongholds are surprised,' etc. (ver. 41). Amos says, in pronouncing a prophetic curse:—'I will send a fire upon Moab, and it shall devour the palaces of Kerioth' (ii. 2). Though the A. V. has Kerioth, yet the Hebrew word is the same as in Jeremiah, קְרִיּוֹת; the only difference is, it has the article. The LXX. renders this clause τὰς πόλεις τῶν Ἀδωνίου; but the Vulgate has ades Carioth, which is doubtless the true rendering. Bozrah and Beth-gamul being identified with Busrah and Um el-Jemal, there can be no doubt as to the site of Kerioth. Six miles east of Busrah, at the foot of the mountain range of Bashan, stands Kureiyeh, whose name (قَرْيَة = קְרִיּוֹת, pl.

קְרִיּוֹת) at once suggests identity with the ancient Kerioth; and its proximity to two other cities of Moab appears to put the matter beyond doubt. Moab was a wide region, extending from the eastern shores of the Dead Sea away to the borders of Arabia. The land of Mishor (מִישׁוֹר, A. V., 'the plain country'), upon which Jeremiah pronounced the curse (xlvi. 21), was that great table-land running from the top of the mountain-ridge which shuts in the Dead Sea, to Arabia on the east, and Bashan on the north. Here stood the doomed cities—far apart, as would appear from the words, 'And upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far and near' (ver. 24). Kerioth was situated in the most remote part of the Mishor towards Bashan. Kureiyeh stands in a broad valley where the mountain-chain sinks down into the plain. The ruins are about three miles in circuit. There are no buildings of great size or beauty now standing; but in the streets and lanes are many broken columns; and beside a cistern in the centre of the town is a singular structure, consisting of a stone roof supported by a triple colonnade, underneath which are ranges of benches rising up like those of a theatre. A Greek inscription on one of the benches states that the cistern (κύμα) was made in the year 190 (A.D. 296). The private houses of Kureiyeh are singularly interesting. Their walls are from four to eight feet thick, built of massive squared blocks of basalt. The roofs are formed of stone slabs carefully hewn, reaching from wall to wall. The doors are also of stone, and hung upon pivots projecting above and below. These houses, simple, massive, and imperishable, bear the marks of the highest antiquity. Similar structures are found in all the old cities of Bashan; and the conclusion seems unavoidable that these are the very houses originally built and occupied by the giant Rephaim [see TRACHONITIS; KENATH; BOZRAH]. When the writer visited Kerioth in 1853, upwards of a hundred of these ancient houses were inhabited; and he estimated that at least as many more still stand, perfect and habitable, but now used as folds for flocks and stables for camels. Kerioth must have been a strong city. The country around it is thickly covered with rugged rocks; the passes through them are intricate and easily defended; and the traces of massive ramparts are still visible (see Porter's Damascus, ii. pp. 191-98; Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, p. 103; Buckingham's Arab Tribes, p. 213).—J. L. P.

KESEPH (כֶּסֶף), the Hebrew word for silver, whether in the ore, in bars, or coined. Silver is commonly mentioned along with gold in the Bible, as, next to it, the most precious of metals. It is found native in veins ramifying through various kinds of stone; hence, perhaps, the allusion in Job xxviii. 1 (cf. Rosenmüller, in loc.) Silver is generally obtained mixed with dross, and is purified by fire, or drawn off by the lead in a crucible; allusions to this are in Ps. xii. 6; Prov. xvii. 3; xxvii. 21; Is. i. 25; Ezek. xxii. 22; Zech. xiii. 9; Mal. iii. 3. The separated silver was called כֶּסֶף טָהוֹר, refined silver, 1 Chron. xix. 4; 3; Ps. xii. 6; Prov. x. 20. Silver was brought to Tyre from Tarshish (Ezek. xxvii. 12), and mention is made of silver beat out into plates (כֶּסֶף מְרֻקָּע) as imported from the same locality (Jer. x. 9). Assuming that Tarshish was in Spain, this falls in with the notices we have in ancient authors of the abundance of silver in that country (Heeren, Idem, p. 64).

There is no mention of this metal in Scripture until the time of Abraham. Before that time brass and iron appear to have been the only metals in use (Gen. iv. 22). Abraham was rich in gold and silver, as well as in flocks and herds, and silver in his day was in general circulation as money, but it was uncoined, and estimated always by weight. Coined money was not in use among the Israelites until an advanced period of their history; indeed, as late as the time of Jeremiah, we find silver weighed in payment of a purchase (Jer. xxxii. 9, 10). The only mention of gold as a medium of exchange is in 1 Chron. xxi. 25. The Romans are said to have had only copper money until within five years of the first Punic war, when they began to coin silver (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 3, 13). Their coins were extensively introduced into Judæa after it became a Roman province.

Silver was largely used by the Jews in the manufacture of articles of ornament (comp. Gen. xxiv. 53; Prov. xxv. 11; Cant. i. 11; Zech. vi. 11), and of various vessels for domestic purposes, and also for the service of the temple (Gen. xlv. 2; Num. vii. 13; x. 2; 1 Chron. xviii. 15-17; Exod. xx. 23; Is. xl. 19; Hosea xiii. 2; Habak. ii. 19). Many of the idols and other objects belonging to the idolatrous nations are stated to have been of silver. This metal was so abundant as to be little thought of in the days of Solomon (1 Kings x. 21, 27).—W. L. A.

KESITAH (קֶסִיתָה). The meaning and derivation of this word, which only occurs thrice in the O. T., has been a subject of much controversy. The places where it is found—Gen. xxxiii. 19, recording Jacob's purchase of a piece of ground at Shechem; Josh. xxiv. 32, a verbal repetition from Genesis; and Job xlii. 11, where the presents made to Job by his friends are specified and it is joined with rings of gold—indicate either the name of a coin, or of some article used in barter. The principal explanations of the word are—

1. That of the LXX., and all ancient versions, which render it 'a lamb,' either the animal itself, or a coin bearing its impress (Hottinger, Dis. de Numm. Orient.), a view which has been revived in modern times by the Danish Bishop Munter in a treatise published at Copenhagen 1824, and more recently still by Mr. James Yates, Proc. of Numism. Soc., 1837-8, p. 141. The entire want of any etymological ground for this interpretation has led Bochart (Hierozoic, i. l. 2, c. 3) to imagine that there had been a confusion in the text of the LXX. between ἐκατὸν μῶν and ἐκατὸν δμῶν, and that this error has passed into all the ancient versions, which may be supported by the singular fact that in Gen. xxxi. 7, 41, we find עֶשְׂרֵת מִנִּים (A. V. 'ten times,' מִנָּה however more usually standing for a particular weight) translated by the LXX. δέκα δμῶν, which it is difficult to account for on any supposition save that of a mistake of the copyist for μῶν.

2. Others, adopting the rendering 'lamb,' have imagined a reference to a weight formed in the shape of that animal, such as we know to have been in use among the Egyptians and Assyrians, imitating bulls, antelopes, geese, etc. (see Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt, ii. 10; Layard, Ninev. and Babyl., pp. 600-602; Lepsius, Denkm. iii. plate 39, No. 3).

3. Faber, in the German edition of Harmer's Obs., th. ii., pp. 15-19, quoted by Gesenius, connects it with the Syriac ܩܣܬܐ, Heb. קֶסֶת, 'a vessel,' an etymology accepted by Grotefend, vide inf., and considers it to have been either a measure or a silver vessel used in barter, cf. Ælian, V. H., i. 22.

4. The most probable view, however, is that supported by Gesenius, Rosenmüller, Jahn, Kalisch, and the majority of the soundest interpreters, that it was, in Grotefend's words (Numism. Chron., vol. ii. p. 248), 'merely a silver weight of undetermined size, just as the most ancient shekel was nothing more than a piece of rough silver without any image or device.' The lost root was perhaps akin to the Arabic قَسَط, 'he divided equally.' Bochart, however (u.s.), is disposed to alter the punctuation of the Shin, and to connect the word with קֶסֶת, 'truth,' adding 'potuit ק id est vera dici moneta quæcunque habuit justum pondus, aut etiam moneta sincera et ἀκρίβητος.'

According to Rabbi Akiba, quoted by Bochart, a certain coin bore this name in comparatively modern times; so that he would render the word by קֶסֶת, δῶνakes.—E. V.

KETHEM (כֶּתֶם), a word occurring in the poetical portions of the O. T. and in the A. V., when standing by itself translated fine gold (Job xxxi. 24; Prov. xxv. 12). It is sometimes joined with אֹפִיר (Job xxviii. 16; Ps. xlv. 10 [9]; Is. xiii. 12), and sometimes with זָהָב (Job xxviii. 19; Cant. v. 11; Lam. iv. 1; Dan. x. 5). The Greek translators of Job and Proverbs seem to have regarded it as a precious stone, for in the one place they render it by λίθω πολυτελεί, and in the other by σάρδιω πολυτελής. Rosenmüller (Bib. Mineral., p. 47) derives it from an Arabic root signifying to conceal (كتم, Kalam), and with this Lee accords.

The latter says, 'I am inclined to think that the best, finest, most compact gold, or that usually brought from Ophir, is intended' (Comment. on Job, p. 403).—W. L. A.

KETTLE (קֶתֶל). The word only occurs once in the A. V. (1 Sam. ii. 14), where it is associated with other vessels of a similar purpose ('Quæ discrepabant vel materiâ vel figura vel usu,' Vatablus), between which it is probably hopeless now to distinguish.

The word קֶתֶל is rendered 'pot,' Job xli. 20; Ps. lxxxix. 6 (7); 'caldron,' 2 Chron. xxxv. 13; and 'basket,' 2 Kings x. 17; Jer. xxiv. 2.—E. V.

KETURAH (קֶטֶרֶת, incense; Sept. Xet-roûpa), the second wife, or, as she is called in 1 Chron. i. 32, the concubine of Abraham, by whom he had six sons, Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah, whom he lived to see grow to man's estate, and whom he established 'in the East country,' that they might not interfere with Isaac (Gen. xxv. 1-6). As Abraham was 100 years old when Isaac was born, who was given to him by the special bounty of Providence when 'he was as good as dead' (Heb. xi. 12), as he was 140 years old when Sarah died; and as he himself died at the age of 175 years,—it has seemed improbable that these six sons should have been born to Abraham by one woman after he was 140 years old, and that he should have seen them all grow up to adult age, and have sent them forth to form independent settlements in that last and feeble period of his life. If Isaac was born to him out of the course of nature when he was 100 years old, how could six sons be born to him in the course of nature after he was 140? It has therefore been suggested by good commentators, that as Keturah is called Abraham's 'concubine' in Chronicles, and as she and Hagar are probably indicated as his 'concubines' in Gen. xxv. 6, Keturah had in fact been taken by Abraham as his secondary or concubine-wife before the death of Sarah, although the historian relates the incident after that event, that his leading narrative might not be interrupted. According to the standard of morality then acknowledged, Abraham might quite as properly have taken Keturah before as after Sarah's death; nor can any reason why he should not have done so, or why he should have waited till then, be conceived. This explanation obviates many difficulties, and does not itself contain any. [ABRAHAM.]—J. K.

Addendum.—From Keturah descended the progenitors of several of the Arab tribes (Muir, Life of Mohammed I., cxii.) M. Caussin de Perceval thinks that the Bani Katoora, an Arab tribe who settled at Mecca with the Jorhomites, are direct descendants of Keturah, but he has no ground for this except the similarity of the names. It is improbable that where so many tribes, descended from Keturah's sons, took the names of their respective progenitors, one should have been distinguished by the name of the one mother of the whole; and besides, the Bani Katoora came from the south, whereas the descendants of Keturah seem to have resided in the north of the peninsula. The Midianites, the Dedanites, the Shebnites, are the descendants of Keturah connected with Arab associations.—W. L. A.

KETZACH (קֶצֶח; Sept. μελάνθιον), also written KEZACH and KETSAH, occurs only in Is. xxviii. 25, 27, and is translated fitches, that is, vetches, in the A. V. It is no doubt from the difficulty of proving the precise meaning of ketzach, that different plants have been assigned as its representative. But if we refer to the context, we learn some particulars which at least restrict it to a certain group, namely, to such as are cultivated. Thus, ver. 25, 'When he (the ploughman) hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches (ketzach):' And again, ver. 27, 'For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod.' From which we learn that the grain called ketzach was easily separated from its capsule, and therefore beaten out with a stick.

Although ketzach, in Chaldee kischa, is always acknowledged to denote some seed, yet interpreters have had great difficulty in determining the particular kind intended—some translating it pear, others, as Luther and the A. V., vetches, but without any proof. Meibomius considers it to be the white poppy, and others, a black seed. This last interpretation has the most numerous, as well as the oldest, authorities in its support. Of these a few are in favour of the black poppy-seed, but the majority, of a black seed common in Egypt, etc. (Celsius, Hierobot. ii. 70). The Sept. translates it μελάνθιον, the Vulg. git, and Tremellius melanthium, while the Arabic has shoonex. All these mean the same thing, namely, a very black-coloured and aromatic seed, still cultivated and in daily employment as a condiment in the East (Pliny, xx. 17, 71; Dioscor., iii. 93). The شونيز shoonex, of the Arabs is, moreover, the same plant or seed which is usually called 'black cummin.' So one kind of cummin is said by Dioscorides to have seeds like those of melanthion or nigella. It was commonly cultivated in Egypt, and P. Alpinus mentions it as 'Suneg Ægyptiis.' The Arabs, besides shoonex, also call it hub-alsouda, and the Persians seah dana, both words signifying black seed. One species, named N. Indica by Dr. Roxburgh, is called kala jeera in India, that is, black zeera or cummin, of the family of Ranunculaceæ. 'Nigella sativa is alone cultivated in India, as in most eastern countries, and continues in the present day, as in the most ancient times, to be used both as a condiment and as a medicine' (Himal. Bot., p. 46). If we consider that this appears to have been always one of the cultivated grains of the East, and compare the character of nigella with the passages in which ketzach is mentioned, we shall find that the former is applicable to them all. Indeed, Bartenora states, that the barbarous or vulgar name of the kezach was nielle, that is, nigella. The various species of nigella are herbaceous (several of them being indigenous in Europe, others cultivated in most parts of Asia), with their leaves deeply cut and linear, their flowers terminal, most of them having under the calyx leafy involucre which often half surround the flower. The fruit is composed of five or six capsules, which are compressed, oblong, pointed, sometimes said to be hornlike, united below, and divided into several cells, and enclosing numerous, angular, scabrous, black-coloured seeds. From the nature of the capsules, it is evident, that when they are ripe, the seeds might easily be shaken out by moderate blows of a stick, as is related to have been the case with the ketsach of the text.—J. F. R.

KETZIOTH (קֶצִיּוֹת) is translated CASSIA in the A. V., and is said to be derived from קָצַץ, to cut off: it therefore denotes 'pieces cut off,' or 'fragments,' and hence is applicable to cassia. But many of these derivations have often been traced out in ignorance of the names and properties of the various substances known to the nations of antiquity. Cassia is mentioned in three places (Exod. xxx. 24; Ezek. xxvii. 19; and in Ps. xlv. 8), in conjunction with myrrh, cinnamon, sweet calamus, and ahalim, or eaglewood. All these are aromatic substances, and, with the exception of myrrh, which is obtained from Africa, are products of India and its islands. It is probable, therefore, that ketsioth is of a similar nature, and obtained from the same countries. Both cinnamon [KINNAMON] and cassia [KIDDAH] were no doubt known to the ancients, and this is one step of the investigation; but to prove that the Hebrew words are correctly translated is another, which must be proceeded with before we can infer that the kiddah of Exod. xxx. 24 and Ezek. xxvii. 19, and the ketsioth of Ps. xlv. 8, both signify the same thing. This has not been the opinion of several translators and commentators; the first having been variously rendered iris, stacte, costus, ginger, canna, fistula, amber, ketsiah, and cassia; while ketsioth, or ketsiah, has been rendered cassia, acacia, amber, ginger, and aloes. The Arabic translator has considered it synonymous with the Arabic name salicha, which is no doubt applied to cassia.

Ketsioth occurs only once, in Ps. xlv. 8: 'All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes (ahalim), and cassia (ketsioth).' It has been observed, with reference to this passage, that 'The garments of princes are often embued with costly perfumes, those of the high-priests were anointed with holy ointment.' We have seen above that ketsioth has been variously translated, but no one seems to have noticed the resemblance of this word to the kooth and koost of the Arabs, of which Kooshtia is said to be the Syriac name, and from which there is little doubt that the κόστος of the Greeks, and costus of the Latins, are derived.

Kóστος is enumerated by Theophrastus (Hist. Pl. ix. 7) among the fragrant substances employed in making ointment. Three kinds of it are described by Dioscorides, among his Aromata (i. 15), of which the Arabian is said to be the best, the Indian to hold the second place, and the Syrian the third. Pliny mentions only two kinds (xv. 12), 'duo sunt ejus genera—nigrum, et quod melius, candicans.' The Persian writers on Materia Medica in use in India, in giving the above synonyms, evidently refer to two of the three kinds of Costus described by Dioscorides, one being called Koost Hinder, and the other Koost Arabee. The writer of this article obtained both these kinds in the bazaars of India, and found, moreover, that the koot or koost of the natives was often, by European merchants, called Indian orris, i. e., Iris root, the odour of which it somewhat resembles. Subsequently he ascertained that this article was known in Calcutta as Puchuk, the name under which it is exported to China. The identity of the substance indicated by these various names was long ago ascertained, though not then known to the present writer. Thus Garcias ab Horto, 'Est ergo Costus dictus Arabibus Cost aut Cast.'—'In Malacca, ubi ejus plurimus est usus, Pucho, et inde vehitur in Sinarum regionem.' Having obtained the koost in the north-western provinces of India, the writer traced it afterwards as one of the substances brought across the Indus from Lahore (Illust. Himal. Bot., p. 360). When Dr. Falconer proceeded on his journey to Cashmere, he was requested to make inquiries respecting this substance, and he discovered that it was exported from that valley in large quantities into the Punjab; whence it finds its way to Bombay (as in the time of Pliny to Patala) and Calcutta, for export to China, where it is highly valued as one of the ingredients in the incense which the Chinese burn in their temples and private houses. Finding the plant to belong to a new genus, he named it Aucklandia, in compliment to the Governor-General of India, and the species Aucklandia Costus (Linm. Trans. xix. 23). Considering, therefore, that costus was one of the articles of ancient commerce and is mentioned by Theophrastus as employed in the composition of perfumed unguents, and considering the similarity of the Syriac kooshtia, and the Arabic kast, to the ketsioth of Scripture, and from their correspondence in properties and uses, the latter appears more likely to be the costus of the ancients, than cassia, for which there is another name [KIDDAH].—J. KEUCHENIUS, PETRUS, a learned Dutch theologian, was born at Bois-le-Duc, 22d August 1654, and studied at Leyden and Utrecht, where he had Spanheim, Le Moynes, Witsius, and Leusden for his teachers; and was successively minister at Alem, Tiel, and Arnheim, at which last place he died 27th March 1689. He wrote Annotata in omnes N. T. libros, the second and only complete edition of which, superintended by Alberti, appeared at Leyden in 1755. The author's aim in these annotations is to throw light on the N. T. by determining the sense in which words and phrases were used at the time it was written, and among those with whom its writers were familiar. For this purpose he compares the language of the N. T. with that of the LXX., and calls in aid from the Chaldee and Syriac versions. His notes are characterised by sound learning and great good sense. Alberti commends in strong terms his erudition, his candour, solidity, and impartiality.—W. L. A.

KEY, מַפתֵּחַ. The only passage in which we read of a key being employed is Judg. iii. 25, where we find Eglon, after his assassination of Ehud, bolting and barring (נָעַל) the door, which could not be opened again until the servants brought 'the key' (the A. V. omits the article), and pushed back the bar. This corresponds with what we know of the construction of early Oriental locks, which consisted merely of a wooden slide, drawn into its place by a string, and fastened there by teeth or catches; the key being a bit of wood, crooked like a sickle, which lifted up the slide and extracted it from its catches, after which it was drawn back by the string. At a later period, when iron came into general use, keys were made of that metal, and Sir G. Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii. 109, ff., gives a drawing of one found at Thebes, about five inches long, with three teeth projecting from a bar at right angles to the shank. But even in the present day, as in Thevenot's time, both locks and keys are of wood, and the former are of so clumsy a construction that they can be easily opened without the key, as 'a little paste on the end of the finger will do the job as well.' An allusion to this has been seen in Cant. v. 4, 5 (Jahn, Heb. Ant.; Harmer, Obs., vol. i. 394; Wilkinson, u.s.) The 'key on the shoulder' is used as the emblem of official dignity, corresponding to the chamberlain's keys of modern days, in the case of Eliakim, Is. xxii. 22, when he succeeded Shebna, on his degradation, as master of the king's household, Is. xxii. 15-20; xxxvi. 3. The expression is transferred in a mystical or spiritual sense to Christ, Rev. iii. 7; cf. i. 18.

The Rabbins say that God has reserved to himself four keys, entrusting them to none, no not to the angels—those of rain, the grave, fruitfulness, and barrenness.—E. V.

KEZIZ, VALLEY OF קֵצִיז, 'Valley of the End,' or, perhaps, 'of Destruction;' Sept. Ἀνεκασίς, by combining the two Hebrew words; Alex. Ἀνεκασείς; vallis Casis. After describing the boundaries of Benjamin, Joshua enumerates its chief cities:—'Now the cities of the tribe of the children of Benjamin were Jericho, and Beth-hoglah, and the Valley of Keziz,' etc. (xviii. 21). There can be no doubt that the A. V. is here wrong in translating, with the Vulgate, the word Emek (עֵמֶק); it is as much a part of the proper name as Beth (בֵּית, 'house') in the preceding word. The name of the town was Emek-keziz, as it is rendered in the Septuagint. It must have stood in the Jordan valley near Jericho; but the site is now unknown.—J. L. P.

KIBROTH-HATTA'AVAH (קִבְרוֹת הַתְּאָוָה)

'graves of lust;' Μνημεῖα τῆς ἐκδυσίας; Sepulera concupiscentiæ. The origin of this name was as follows:—After the giving of the law at Sinai, the Israelites marched three days, and then rested. The people murmured for some reason, and fire from heaven consumed a number of them; hence the station was called Taberah, 'burning.' Again murmuring arose among 'the mixed multitude,' who craved for flesh-meat; and the Israelites cried, weeping, 'Who shall give us flesh to eat?' 'And there went forth a wind from the Lord, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, as it were a day's journey on this side, and a day's journey on the other side,' etc. The people killed and ate, 'and while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed . . . the Lord smote the people with a very great plague. And he called the name of that place Kibroth-hatta'avah, because there they buried the people that lusted' (Num. xi. 1-35). The same encampment was thus called by two names (cf. Num. xxxiii. 16; Deut. ix. 22). It lay between Sinai and Hazereth; three days from the former, and one from the latter. If Hazereth be identified with Ain el-Hudherah [HAZEROTH], there can be little difficulty in fixing the site of Kibroth. The camp must have been situated amid those dreary sand-hills and parched naked valleys which extend for miles away to the south-west of el-Hudherah [WANDERING]. See also Robinson. B. R., i. 150; Handbook for S. and P., 37; Stanley, S. and P., pp. 79, seq.—J. L. P.

KIBZAIM (קִבְצַיִם, 'two heaps,' omitted in the Vatican text of the LXX.; Alex. Καρβαίμ), a city of Ephraim assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 22). The parallel passage in 1 Chron. vi. 68 has Jokmeam, which was probably another name for the same place [see JOKMEAM].—J. L. P.

KID. [GEDI; EZ.]

KIDDAH (קִדָּה), as well as KETZIOTH, is rendered CASSIA in our A. V.; but translators do not uniformly coincide in, though the great majority are in favour of, this interpretation. It is well known that the Greeks were acquainted with several varieties of cassia; and as one of these was called kitto, κίττω (Dioscor. i. 12), this has been thought to be the same word as the Hebrew קִדָּה, from קָדַד, in Arabic كَسَد, to split, heav, or tear anything lengthwise, as must be done in separating cassia bark from the tree. But it does not follow that this is a correct interpretation of the origin of the name of an Eastern product. The word occurs first in Exod. xxx. 24, where cassia (kiddah) is mentioned in connection with olive oil, pure myrrh, sweet cinnamon, and sweet calamus; secondly, in Ezek. xxvii. 19, where Dan and Javan are described as bringing bright iron, cassia (kiddah), and calamus to the markets of Tyre. There is no reason why the substance now called cassia might not have been imported from the shores of India into Egypt and Palestine. Considerable confusion has, however, been created by the same name having been applied by botanists to a genus containing the plants yielding senna, and to others, as the cassia fistula, which have nothing to do with the original cassia. Cassia-buds, again, though no doubt produced by a plant belonging to the same, or to some genus allied to that producing cinnamon and cassia, were probably not known in commerce at so early a period as the two latter substances. There is some difficulty also in determining what the ancient cassia was. The author of this article, in his Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine, p. 84, has already remarked, 'The cassia of the ancients it is not easy to determine; that of commerce, Mr. Marshall says, consists of only the inferior kinds of cinnamon. Some consider cassia to be distinguished from cinnamon by the outer cellular covering of the bark being scraped off the latter, but allowed to remain on the former. This is, however, the characteristic of the (Cochin-Chinese) cinnamomum aromaticum, as we are informed by Mr. Crawford (Embassy to Siam, p. 470) that it is not cured, like that of Ceylon, by freeing it from the epidermis.' There is, certainly, no doubt that some cassia is produced on the coast of Malabar. The name also would appear to be of Eastern origin, as kasse koronde is one kind of cinnamon, as mentioned by Burmann in his Flora Zeylonica; but it will be preferable to treat of the whole subject in connection with cinnamon [KINNAMON].—J. F. R.

KIDDER, RICHARD, D.D., successively prebend of Norwich, dean of Peterborough, and bishop of Bath and Wells. He was born about the year 1635, and, according to Anthony Wood (Athen. Oxon., vol. ii., Fasli 123), at Brighton. He was admitted sizar of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in June 1649, took the degree of B.A. in 1652, and was elected fellow of his college in 1655. In 1662 he was ejected for nonconformity from the vicarage of Stanground, in Huntingdonshire, but conforming soon after, he was presented in 1664 to the rectory of Raine, in Essex. In 1674 the Merchant Taylors' Company gave him the rectory of St. Martin's Outwich. In 1681 he was made prebend of Norwich, and in 1689 dean of Peterborough; two years afterwards, on the deprivation of Ken, he was raised to the see of Bath and Wells. He died Nov. 26, 1703, at Wells, being killed in bed by the fall of a stack of chimneys occasioned by the great storm. His Biblical writings are—
1. A Commentary on the Five Books of Moses; with a dissertation concerning the author or writer of the said books, and a general argument to each, Lond. 1694, 2 vols. 8vo. The notes are exceedingly brief, and of no great value; the introductory dissertation is the most useful part of the work.
2. A Demonstration of the Messiah; in which the truth of the Christian religion is proved against all the enemies thereof; but especially the Jews, Lond. 1715, 3 vols. 8vo; 2d edition, 1726, fol. This work claims to be mentioned here because of the numerous, and oftentimes full, discussions of important and difficult scriptural passages which it contains.

KIDRON, in N. T. Cedron (קֶדְרוֹן, 'turbid'; LXX. and N. T., Κεδρών; Cedron). In every instance, except one, in which this name is mentioned in the O. T., the word nakhal (נַחַל, A. V. 'brook') is joined to it. This word appears to be exactly equivalent to the Arabic wady (وادي or واد), which signifies a 'valley' or 'ravine,' either with or without a river; the proper word for 'river' itself, both in Hebrew and Arabic, being nahar (נהר, نهر), which is never applied to the Kidron. In 2 Kings xxiii. 4, the 'fields of Kidron' are mentioned, and reference is made to the cultivated ground in the bottom of the Kidron valley. The word nakhal is uniformly rendered χειμαρρος by the LXX., and in John xviii. 1, the only passage of the N. T. in which the Kidron is mentioned, it is called χειμαρρος τῶν Κεδρών. Χειμαρρος signifies a 'winter stream'—a stream formed or swollen by winter rain or snow, and in this respect it is applicable to the Kidron; but Josephus usually applies to it the still more appropriate name φάραγξ, 'chasm' or 'ravine' (Antiq. ix. 7. 3). In the Vulgate the uniform rendering is torrens Cedron, except in 2 Kings xxiii. 6, where it is convallis, which is much more appropriate. The term 'brook' in our A. V. is an unfortunate translation, for it must convey to ordinary readers a totally wrong idea of the Kidron.

The Kidron is a mountain ravine, in most places narrow, with precipitous banks of naked limestone; but here and there its banks have an easy slope, and along its bottom are strips of land capable of cultivation. It contains the bed of a streamlet, but during the whole summer, and most of the winter, it is perfectly dry; in fact, no water runs in it except when heavy rains are falling in the mountains round Jerusalem.

On the broad summit of the mountain-ridge of Judæa, a mile and a quarter north-west of Jerusalem, is a slight depression; this is the head of the Kidron. The sides of the depression, and the elevated ground around it, are whitened by the broad jagged tops of limestone rocks, and almost every rock is excavated, partly as a quarry, and partly to form the façade of a tomb. The valley, or depression, runs for about half a mile towards the city; it is shallow and broad, dotted with corn-fields, and sprinkled with a few old olives. It then bends eastward, and in another half mile is crossed by the great northern road coming down from the hill Scopus. On the east side of the road, and south bank of the Kidron, are the celebrated Tombs of the Kings. The bed of the valley is here about half a mile due north of the city gate. It continues in the same course about a quarter of a mile farther, and then, turning south, opens into a wide basin containing cultivated fields and olives. Here it is crossed diagonally by the road from Jerusalem to Anathoth. As it advances southward, the right bank, forming the side of the hill Bezetha, becomes higher and steeper, with occasional precipices of rock, on which may be seen a few fragments of the ancient city wall; while, on the left, the base of Olivet projects, greatly narrowing the valley. Opposite St. Stephen's gate the depth is fully 100 feet, and the breadth not more than 400 feet. The olive trees in the bottom are so thickly clustered as to form a shady grove; and their massive trunks and gnarled boughs give evidence of great age. This spot is shut out from the city, from the view of public roads, and from the notice and interruptions of wayfarers. May not this be the site of Gethsemane, rather than the more public traditional site some distance farther down? [GETHSEMANE.] A zigzag path descends the steep bank from St. Stephen's gate, crosses the bed of the valley by an old bridge, and then branches. One branch leads direct over the top of Olivet. This path has a deep historical interest; it was by it that David went when he fled from Absalom:—'The king passed over the brook Kidron, and all the people passed over, toward the way of the wilderness' (2 Sam. xv. 23). [OLIVET.] Another branch runs round the southern shoulder of the hill to Bethany, and it has a deep sacred interest, for it is the road of Christ's triumphal entry (Matt. xxi. 1, seq.; Luke xix. 37). Below the bridge the Kidron becomes still narrower, and here traces of a torrent bed first begin to appear. Three hundred yards farther down, the hills on each side—Moriah on the right and Olivet on the left—rise precipitously from the torrent bed, which is spanned by a single arch. On the left bank is a singular group of tombs, comprising those of Absalom, Jehoshaphat, and St. James (now so called); while on the right, 150 feet overhead, towers the south-eastern angle of the temple wall, most probably the 'pinnacle' on which our Lord was placed (Matt. iv. 5). The ravine runs on, narrow and rocky, for 500 yards more; there, on its right bank, in a cave, is the fountain of the Virgin; and higher up on the left, perched on the side of naked cliffs, the ancient village of Siloam. A short distance farther down, the valley of the Tyrean falls in from the right, descending in terraced slopes, fresh and green, from the waters of the Pool of Siloam. The Kidron here expands, affording a level tract for cultivation, and now covered with beds of cucumbers, melons, and other vegetables. Here of old was the 'King's Garden' (Neh. iii. 15). The level tract extends down to the mouth of Hinnom, and is about 200 yards wide. A short distance below the junction of Hinnom and the Kidron is the fountain of EN-ROGEL, now called Bîr Ayûb, 'the Well of Job.' The length of the valley from its head to En-Rogel is 2½ miles, and here the historic Kidron may be said to terminate. Every reference to the Kidron in the Bible is made to this section. David crossed it at a point opposite the city (1 Sam. xv. 23); it was the boundary beyond which Solomon forbade Shimei to go on pain of death (1 Kings ii. 37); it was here, probably, near the mouth of Hinnom, that Asa destroyed the idol which Maachah his mother set up (xv. 13); and it seems to have been at the same spot, 'in the fields of Kidron,' that King Josiah ordered the vessels of Baal to be burned (2 Kings xxiii. 4). It would seem from 2 Kings xxiii. 6, that a portion of the Kidron, apparently near the mouth of Hinnom, was used as a burying-ground. The sides of the surrounding cliffs are filled with ancient rock tombs; and the greatest boon the dying Jew now asks is, that his bones be laid in the valley of Jehoshaphat. The whole of the left bank of the Kidron, opposite the temple area, far up the side of Olivet, is paved with the white tombstones of Jews. This singular longing is doubtless to be ascribed to the opinion which the Jews entertain that the Kidron is the valley of Jehoshaphat mentioned by Joel (iii. 2). This opinion, which has given its modern name to the valley, has been considered in the article JEHOSEPHAT (Reland, Pal., pp. 294-96; Robinson, B. R., i. 268-73; Ritter, Pal. und Syr., ii. 598-610; Handbook for S. and P., i. pp. 101-2).

Below En-Rogel the Kidron has little of historical or sacred interest. It runs in a winding course east by south, through the Wilderness of Judæa, to the Dead Sea. For about a mile below En-Rogel the bottom of the valley is cultivated and thickly covered with olive trees. Farther down a few fields of corn are met with at intervals, but these soon disappear, and the ravine assumes the bleak and desolate aspect of the surrounding hills. About seven miles from Jerusalem the features of the valley assume a much wilder and grander form. Hitherto the banks have been steep, with here and there a high precipice, and a jutting cliff, giving variety to the scene. Now they suddenly contract to precipices of naked rock nearly 300 feet in height, which look as if the mountain had been torn asunder by an earthquake. About a mile farther, on the side of this frightful chasm, stands the convent of St. Saba, one of the most remarkable buildings in Palestine, founded by the saint whose name it bears, in the year A. D. 439 (see Handbook, i. p. 204; Ritter, ii. 608, seq.). The sides of the chasm both above and below the convent are filled with caves and grottoes, once the abode of monks and hermits; and from these doubtless this section of the valley has got its modern name, Wady er-Rahab, 'Monk's Valley' (Wolcott, Researches in Pal., in Biblical Cabinet, vol. xliii. p. 38). Below Mar Saba the valley is called Wady en-Nar, 'Valley of Fire'—a name descriptive of its aspect, for so bare and scorched is it, that it seems as if it had participated in the doom of Sodom. It runs on, a deep, narrow, wild chasm, until it breaks through the lofty line of cliffs at Ras el-Feshkhah on the shore of the Dead Sea (Handbook, i. 245; Robinson, B. R., i. 531).

It will thus be seen that the head of the Kidron is just on the verge of the water-shed of the mountain-chain of Judah, about 2600 feet above the sea. Its length, as the crow flies, is only twenty miles, and yet in this short space it has a descent of no less than 3912 feet—the Dead Sea having a depression of 1312 feet (cf. Van de Velde, Memoir, pp. 179, 182; Ritter, l.c.).

Various opinions have been formed regarding the origin of the name Kidron. Some derive it from the root קדר, 'to be black' (Gesenius, Thesaurus; Stanley, S. and P.); but they are not agreed as to the cause of this name. It may arise from the gloominess of the glen, or from the 'turbid' stream; or from the blood and refuse of the temple sacrifices running into it (Reland, p. 294). Others think that it was so called from Cedar trees which grew in it. This is founded on the reading in the Text. Rec. of John xviii. 1, τῶν Κεδρῶν, which would seem to be the gen. pl. of ἡ Κέδρος, 'a cedar-tree' (Lightfoot, Opera, ii. 667). There can be no doubt, however, that Κεδρῶν is just the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew קדרון. It is not so easy to account for the τῶν if it be genuine. It is important to note, however, that some of the best MSS. have τοῦ, a reading which Lachmann adopts. The Cod. Sinait. has τοῦ κεδρῶν.

It was doubtless the Kidron valley which was in the mind of the prophet Ezekiel when he described the vision of the holy and healing waters flowing from the temple through the desert into the sea (xlvii. 8; cf. Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 32; Stanley, S. and P., 288).—J. L. P.

KIKAYON (כִּיקַיֹּן) occurs only in Jonah iv., where it is several times mentioned, as in ver. 6, 7, 9, 10. It is translated gourd in our A. V., probably from the κολοκύνθη of the Sept., often rendered cucurbita. In the margin of the English Bible, Palmerist is given. In the Vulg. kikayon is translated hedera, 'ivy.' Neither the gourd nor ivy is considered by modern writers to indicate the plant intended; which is remarkable for having given rise to some fierce controversies in the early ages of the Church. The difficulties here, however, do not appear to be so great as in many other instances. But before considering these, it is desirable to ascertain what are the characteristics of the plant as required by the text. We are told, 'The Lord God prepared a gourd (kikayon), and made it to come over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head,' etc. (ver. 6). 'But God prepared a worm when the morning rose the next day, and it smote the gourd that it withered' (ver. 7). And in ver. 10 it is said of the gourd that it 'came up in a night, and perished in a night.' Hence it appears that the growth of the kikayon was miraculous, but that it was probably a plant of the country, being named specifically; also that it was capable of affording shade, and might be easily destroyed. There does not appear anything in this account to warrant us in considering it to be the ivy, which is a plant of slow growth, cannot support itself, and is, moreover, not likely to be found in the hot and arid country of ancient Nineveh, though we have ourselves found it in more southern latitudes, but only in the temperate climate of the Himalayan Mountains. The ivy was adduced probably only from the resemblance of its Greek name, κισσός, to kikayon. That the kikayon was thought to be a gourd, seems to have arisen from the kiki of the Egyptians being the خروع, kherwa, of the Arabs, often incorrectly written kerwa, that is, without the aspirate, which makes it very similar to قرة, kura, when written in Roman characters; which last in the East is applied to the gourd or pumpkin (Avicenna, c. 622), and is probably the Lagenaria vulgaris. Many modern authors mistake the one for the other. To this plant, no doubt, the following passages refer: 'The Christians and Jews of Mosul (Nineveh) say it was not the kerwa whose shadow refreshed Jonah, but a sort of gourd, el-kerwa, which has very large leaves, very large fruit, and lasts but about four months' (Niebuhr, Arabie, as quoted by Dr. Harris). So Volney: 'Whoever has travelled to Cairo or Rosetta knows that the species of gourd called kerwa will, in twenty-four hours, send out shoots near four inches long' (Trav. i. 71).

The Hebrew name kikayon is so similar to the kiki of Dioscorides, that it was early thought to indicate the same plant. Dioscorides (iv. 164, περὶ κικεύων) states that the kiki, or croton, is called wild sesamum by some:—'Ricini autem nomen accepit a similitudine quæ est illius semini cum ricino animal. Arbustula est parvæ ficus altitudine, foliis platani, truncis ramisque cavis in calami modum, semine in uvis asperis. Ex eo oleum kikinum exprimitur, cibus quidem ineptum; sed alias et ad lucernas et emplastra utile.' Thus giving in a few words a graphic description of Ricinus communis, 298. Ricinus communis.

or castor-oil plant, of which the seeds have some resemblance to the insect commonly called tick in English, and which is found on dogs and other animals. It has also been called Pentadactylus and Palma Christi, from the palmate division of its leaves. It was known at much earlier times, as Hippocrates employed it in medicine; and Herodotus mentions it by the name of σαλκικύριον (ii. 94) when speaking of Egypt. That it has been known there from the earliest times is evident from Caillaud having found castor-oil seeds in some very ancient sarcophagi. That the Arabs considered their خروع, kherwa, to be the same plant, is evident from Avicenna on this article, or khirwaa of the translation of Plempius (p. 301):—'Plantum hoc, scribit Dioscorides, quidam crotone appellant, hoc est ricinum, a similitudine quæ est illius semini cum ricino animal.' So Serapion (iii. c. 79):—'Cherva sive kerua, sicuti ejus oleum, oleum kichas.' This oil was not only employed by the Greeks, but also by the Jews, being the כִּיק־אֵל, kik-oil of the Talmudists, prepared from the seeds of the ricinus (Rosenmüller, p. 127). Lady Calcott states that the modern Jews of London use this oil, by the name of oil of kik, for their Sabbath lamps, it being one of the five kinds of oil which their traditions allow them to employ.

Having ascertained that the kiki of the Greeks is what is now called Ricinus communis, we shall find that its characters correspond with everything that is required, except the rapidity of growth, which must be granted was miraculous. Dr. Harris indeed states that the passage means, 'Son of the night it was, and as a son of the night it died;' and that, therefore, we are not compelled to believe that it grew in a single night, but rather, by a strong Oriental figure, that it was of rapid growth. This, there is no doubt, it is highly susceptible of in warm countries where there is some moisture. It attains a considerable size in one season; and though in Europe it is only known as a herb, in India it frequently may be seen, especially at the margins of fields, the size of a tree. So at Busra Niebuhr saw an el-kerou which had the form and appearance of a tree. The stems are erect, round, and hollow; the leaves broad, palmate, 5 to 8 or 10 lobed, peltate, supported on long foot-stalks. The flowers in terminal panicles; the lower, male; the upper, female. Capsule trilocular, covered with spines. The seeds are oblong, oval, externally of a greyish colour, but mottled with darker-coloured spots and stripes. From the erect habit, and the breadth of its foliage, this plant throws an ample shade, especially when young. From the softness and little substance of its stem, it may easily be destroyed by insects, which Rumphius describes as sometimes being the case. It would then necessarily dry up rapidly. As it is well suited to the country, and to the purpose indicated in the text, and as its name kiki is so similar to kikayon, it is doubtless the plant which the sacred penman had in view.—J. F. KIMCHI, DAVID B. JOSEPH, commonly called by the Jews Redak, from the initial letters רד"ק = ר' דוד קמחי, R. David Kimchi, was born in Narbonne in 1160, and died about 1235. Very little is known of the private life of this celebrated commentator, grammarian, and lexicographer, who is justly regarded as the teacher of Hebrew of both Jews and Christians throughout Europe. He wrote—(1.) A Commentary on the Pentateuch (פרש

על התורה), of which, however, Genesis only has been published by A. Ginzburg, Pressburg 1842, cap. i. 1-10 being supplied by Kirchheim from the writings of Kimchi, as the MS. was defective; (2.)

A Commentary on the Earlier Prophets (פרש על נביאים ראשונים), i. e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, printed in the Rabbinical Bibles edited by Jacob b. Chajim, Venice 1525, 1548; Buxtorf 1619; and Frankfurter 1724-27; (3.)

A Commentary on the Later Prophets (פרש על נביאים אחרונים), i. e., Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the minor prophets, also given in the Rabbinical Bibles; (4.) A Commentary on the Psalms (פרש על תהלים), first printed in 1477, reprinted several times, and also given in the Rabbinical Bibles of Jacob b. Chajim, but not in those edited by Buxtorf and Frankfurter; (5.)

A Commentary on Ruth (פרש על מגילת רות), published for the first time by Mercier, Paris 1563; (6.)

A Commentary on Chronicles (פרש על דברי הימים), given in the Rabbinical Bibles; (7.)

A Commentary on Job (פרש

על איוב), which has not yet been published; (8.)

The celebrated work called Michlol (מכלול), or Perfection, which consists of two parts—a. A Hebrew Grammar (חלק הדקדוק), usually bearing the name Michlol, edited with notes by Elias Levita, Venice 1545, and by M. Hechim, Furth 1793;

and (9.) b. A Hebrew Lexicon (חלק הענין), commonly called The Book of Roots (ספר השורשים), the best editions of which are by Elias Levita, Venice 1546, and Biesenthal and Lebrecht, Berlin 1847; (10.) A Refutation of Christianity (דעות לנצרות), in which he tries to explain away some Messianic Psalms, printed together with the celebrated Nitzachon (נצחון) of Lippmann, Amsterdam 1709, 1711; Königsberg 1847; and (11.) Another polemical work called Ukha, also printed with the Nitzachon.

Kimchi does not pretend to originality; he frankly says, in his introduction to the Michlol, that his aim is to exhibit the results of the manifold and extensive labours of his numerous predecessors. Hence his lexicon is, to a great extent, a translation of Ibn Ganach's Book of Roots (1888 GANACH), and hence his repeated quotations from Saadia, Ibn Koriish, Chajug, Ibn Ganach, Ibn Gebirol, Ibn Giath, Ibn Balaam, Gikatilla, and many others. But though his claims are modest, yet his merits are great. He was the first who discovered the distinction between the long and short vowels, whereby the understanding of the changing of vowels has been greatly facilitated. He moreover defended a simple, natural, and grammatical exegesis, at a time when most of his Jewish brethren were enamoured of Hagadic, Kabbalistical, and astrological interpretations. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that he became so eminent among his brethren, that they applied to him, by a play of words, the saying in the Mishna (Aboth. iii. 17), אין קמח אין תורה, no Kimchi, no understanding of the Scriptures. Equally great was his reputation amongst Christians after the revival of learning, and at the time of the Reformation, notwithstanding his hostility to Christianity, which is displayed throughout his commentaries,* and which arose from the persecutions the Jews had to endure from the Crusaders in the name of Christ. The first Hebrew lexicons or glossaries compiled by Christians, as well as the grammars and the notes accompanying the Latin Bibles of Munster and Stephen, are derived from Kimchi. Excerpts of his Commentary on Isaiah were translated into Latin by Munster, and a Latin version of the whole of it was published by Malanimeus, Florence 1774. Leusden published Latin versions of Joel (Utrecht 1656); and Jonah (Utrecht 1657). De Muis published a Latin translation of Malachi (Paris 1618). Vehe published a German translation of Amos, Col. 1581; and Dr. M'Caul translated the Commentary on Zechariah into English (London 1837). A Latin translation of the Commentary on the Psalms was made by Janvier (Constance 1544). The grammatical part of his work called the Michlol was translated into Latin by Guidacier, Paris 1540; and a Latin version of the roots was published in 1535. Comp. Steinschneider, Catalogus Lib. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, col. 868-875; Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaica, ii. p. 183, seq.; the masterly biography of Kimchi by Geiger in Ozar Nechmad, Vienna 1857, p. 157, seq.—C. D. G.

* Many of these passages have been struck out by the Inquisition, and do not exist in the present editions of Kimchi's Commentaries. Pococke has collected all the passages which have been omitted from the Prophets, some of which he found in the Editio Pisarenensis (Pesaro 1515), and some in two MSS. in the Bodleian Library, and given them in Not. ad Portam Mosis, in his Theological Works, ed. London, 1740, vol. i. p. 241, seq.

KIMCHI, JOSEPH B. ISAAC, also called Mestre Petit, the father of the preceding writer, was compelled to leave Spain on account of the persecutions to which the Jews were subject by the Mohammedans, settled in Narbonne, where he died about 1180. He devoted his whole life to the science of the Hebrew language and Biblical exegesis, and succeeded, by his clear and independent judgment, in creating a new epoch in the study of the Hebrew Scriptures among his brethren in southern France, by introducing there the learning of Spain, and continuing the labours of Ibn Ezra. He wrote—(1.) A Commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled ספר תורה, The Book of the Law, which is lost, except fragments of it extant in MS., De Rossi 166, and in the quotation of his son D. Kimchi. (2.) A Commentary on the Earlier Prophets called המקנה, The Bill of Purchase, in allusion to Jer. xxxii. 11. (3.) A Commentary on the Later Prophets, called ספר הנלי, The Unfolded Book, in allusion to Jer. xxxii. 14. These works, too, have not as yet come to light, and we only know them through the numerous quotations from them dispersed through David Kimchi's Commentaries on the Prophets. (4.) A Commentary on Job, a defective MS. of which is both in the Bodleian Library and at Munich, 260. (5.) A Commentary on Proverbs, a perfect MS. of which exists in the Munich Library, No. 242. (6.) A Hebrew Grammar called ספר זכרון, The Book of Remembrance, which is the first written by a Jew in a Christian country, and is quoted by D. Kimchi in the Michlol, ב קנא. (7.) Another grammatical work, entitled ספר תהור הלל, also quoted in the Michlol קלל a. Both as a commentator and a grammarian Joseph Kimchi deserves the highest praise, and though his works still remain unpublished, his contributions to Biblical literature produced a most beneficial influence, inasmuch as they prepared the way in Christian countries for a literal and sound exegesis. His son, D. Kimchi, who constantly quotes him, both in his commentaries and under almost every root of his Hebrew Lexicon, has familiarised the Hebrew student with the grammatical and exegetical principles of this deservedly esteemed Hebraist. Comp. Biesenthal and Lebrecht's edition of D. Kimchi's Radicum Liber, Berlin 1847, col. xxiv. seq.; and Geiger's excellent Treatise in Osar Nechmad, I, Vienna 1856, p. 97-119.—C. D. G.

KIMCHI, MOSES B. JOSEPH, also called Remak, from the initial letters רמ"ק, R. Moses Kimchi, the eldest son of the preceding writer, flourished about 1160-1170. Though far below his father and brother, yet he has also distinguished himself as a commentator and grammarian. He wrote—(1.) A Commentary on Proverbs (פרוש ספר משלי), printed in the Rabbinic Bibles of Jacob b. Chajim, Venice 1526, 1548; Buxtorf, Basel 1619; and Frankfurter, Amsterdam 1724-27; which has been falsely ascribed to Ibn Ezra. Comp. Reifmann in Literaturblatt des Orients, 1841, 750-751; Zion, vol. I, Frankfurt-on-the-Maine 1841, p. 76; Lippmann, in Zion, vol. II, Frankfurt-on-the-Maine 1842, p. 113-117; 129-133; 155-157; 171-174; 185-188. (2.) A Commentary on Ezra and Nehemiah, also printed in the Rabbinical Bibles, and erroneously attributed to Ibn Ezra. (3.) A grammatical work, entitled מהך שבלי הדעת, which became a manual for both Jews and Christians who were anxious to acquire the rudiments of Hebrew grammar, through the recommendation of Elias Levita, who annotated and edited it in 1508. It was afterwards published, with a Latin translation, by Seb. Munster, Basel 1531, and was published at different times in various places, with diverse additions and modifications. The chief merit of this little volume consists in the fact, that M. Kimchi was the first to employ therein the word פסק as a paradigm of the regular verbs, instead of the less appropriate verb medie gutturalis פעל, which had been used by his predecessors in imitation of Arabic grammarians. (4.) A grammatical treatise on the anomalous expressions entitled ספר תחבולות, quoted by D. Kimchi in the Michlol. Comp. Biesenthal and Lebrecht's edition of D. Kimchi's Radicum Liber, Berlin 1847, col. xxxviii. seq.; Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaica, II. 187, seq.; Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodliana, col. 1838-1844; by the same author, Bibliographisches Handbuch, Leipzig 1859, p. 74, ff.; and the excellent treatise of Geiger, Osar Nechmad, vol. II, Vienna 1857, p. 17, ff.—C. D. G.

KIMMOSH (קמוש) occurs Is. xxxiv. 13, Hos. ix. 6; and in the pl. קמשינים, Prov. xxv. 31, where it is mentioned along with charul, which we believe to indicate charlock. The field of the slothful is there described as being grown over with thorns (charullim), 'and nettles (kimshon) had covered the face thereof.' In Isaiah it is said, 'And thorns (choach) shall come up in the palaces, nettles (kimosh) and brambles in the fortresses thereof.' Hos. ix. 6, 'The pleasant places for their silver, nettles (kimosh) shall possess them; thorns (choach) shall be in their tabernacles.'

Though different interpretations have been given of this word, as thorns, thistles, wild chamomile, etc., the greatest number of authors have united in adopting nettles, chiefly in consequence of the authority of Jewish writers. Thus, Rosenmüller says, Rabbi Tanchum, on Hos. ix. 6, explains kimosh by the common nettle, قرص in Pococke's

Comment. on Hosea. So R. Ben Melech, as quoted and translated by Celsius (Herobot, II. p. 207), 'ex antiquioribus Ebræis, ad Proverb. xxiv. 31, species est spinarum, et dicitur vulgo Urtica.' Nettles no doubt spring up rapidly in deserted as in inhabited places, in fields, ditches, and road sides, but most frequently where there is some moisture in the soil or climate. Though they are found in tropical situations, as well as in temperate climes, yet the springing up of nettles in deserted places is rather an European than an Oriental idea. Though kimosh has not yet been proved to indicate the nettle, this plant has been received by the rabbins, and is as well suited to the passages in which it occurs as any other which has hitherto been suggested.—J. F. R.

KINAH (קִינָה), 'lamentation'; ἰκνῆ; Alex. Kwd; Cina, a place on the southern border of Judah, towards Edom (Josh. xv. 22). It is only once mentioned, and its site is unknown.—J. L. P.

KINDRED. Five Hebrew words are thus translated in the A. V. :—

1. מִשְׁפָּחָה. This word answers to the Latin gens, only that it more distinctly includes the idea of original affinity or derivation from a common stock; it corresponds exactly with our word clan. It is used of the different tribes of the Canaanites (Gen. x. 18); of the subdivisions of the Hebrew people (Exod. vi. 14; Num. i. 20, etc.); sometimes for one of the tribes (Josh. vii. 17; Judg. xiii. 2, etc.), and in the later books tropically for a people or nation (Jer. viii. 3; xxv. 9; Ezek. xx. 32; Micah ii. 3). The passages in which it is translated kindred in the A. V. are Gen. xxiv. 41; Josh. vi. 23; Ruth ii. 3; Job xxxii. 2; in all of which it refers to relationship by consanguinity, more or less remote.

2. מוֹלֶדֶת. This word, from יָלַד, conveys primarily the idea of birth, nativity; hence a person born, a child (Gen. xxviii. 9; Lev. xviii. 9, 11), and persons of the same family or lineage (Gen. xii. 1; xxiv. 4; xxxi. 3; xliii. 7; Num. x. 30; Esth. ii. 10; viii. 6, in all which passages it is translated kindred in the A. V.). In some of these instances, however, the kinship is only the remote one of common nationality arising out of common descent.

3. מוֹרֶעֶת, from יָדַע, to know, is used to express blood-relationship in Ruth iii. 2; comp. מוֹרֵעַ (Ruth ii. 1; Prov. vii. 4).

4. נֶאֱלָה. By this word is properly designated such near relationship by blood as would confer the rights and obligations of a נָאֵל or kinsman, avenger, and redeemer, on the party [KINSMAN]. As commonly used, however, it denotes either the thing redeemed (Ruth iv. 6), or the right of redeeming (Lev. xxv. 29, etc.), or the redemption price (Lev. xxv. 26, etc.). The only passage in which it is translated kindred in the A. V. is Ezek. xi. 15. Hengstenberg (Christol. iii. 9, E. T.) and Hävernick (Comment. in loc.) contend that נֶאֱלָה is to be taken here not in the sense of relationship, but in that of suretyship or substitutionary action, and they would translate the passage, 'Thy brethren are the men of thy suretyship,' or 'redemption,' i.e., the men whom it lies on them to redeem or act for. The LXX. seem to have read בְּרֵיךְ, for they give αἰχμαλωσίας here.

5. אָח. This, which properly means brother, occurs only once with the rendering kindred in the A. V., in 1 Chron. xii. 29. It is frequently used elsewhere in a wide sense, and may be understood of nearly all collateral relationships whatever, whether by consanguinity, affinity, or simple association [BROTHER]. From this comes אֶחָיוּת, brotherhood (Zech. xi. 14).

Besides these terms, the Hebrews expressed consanguinity by such words and phrases as בָּשָׂר, flesh (Gen. xxxvii. 27; Is. lviii. 7); עֲצָמִי וּבָשָׂרִי, my bone and my flesh (Gen. xxix. 14; Judg. ix. 2; 2 Sam. v. 1, etc.); שָׂאֵר, flesh (Lev. xviii. 12, 13, etc.; Num. xxvii. 41), with נִשְׁאָרָה, coll. kinswomen (Lev. xviii. 17); and שָׂאֵר בָּשָׂרִי, flesh of his flesh (A. V., near of kin, Lev. xviii. 6; nigh of kin, xxv. 49).

among the Hebrews, see articles FATHER, BROTHER, etc.; see also AFFINITY, KINSMAN, MARRIAGE.—W. L. A.

KINE. 1. אֶלֶפִים (Deut. vii. 13; xxviii. 4; Ps. viii. 8), found only in plural, common gender.

Derived from אָלַף, 'assuevit,' denoting cattle tamed and accustomed to the yoke.

2. בָּקָר, collective, common gender, the ordinary word throughout the Bible for a herd of oxen, without distinction of age or sex; the word for an individual being שׁוֹר (cf. Exod. xxi. 37 [xxii. 1]), so called from breaking up the ground in ploughing, or, according to Ewald, from dividing the hoof.

3. פָּרוֹת, the feminine plural of פָּר, a bullock, once only (Amos iv. 1), metaphorically for the luxurious hard-hearted ladies of Samaria.—E. V.

KING, a title applied in the Scriptures to men (Luke xxii. 25; 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2; 1 Pet. ii. 13, 17), to God (1 Tim. i. 17; vi. 15, 16), and to Christ (Matt. xxvii. 11; Luke xix. 38; John i. 49; vi. 15; xvii. 32-37)—to men, as invested with regal authority by their fellows; to God, as the sole proper sovereign and ruler of the universe; and to Christ, as the Messiah, the Son of God, the King of the Jews, the sole Head and Governor of his church. The kingdom of Christ, in Luke i. 32, 33, is declared to be without end; whereas, in 1 Cor. xv. 28, we are taught that it will have a period when God shall be all in all. The contradiction is only in form and appearance. The kingdom of the Messiah, considered as a mediatorial instrumentality for effecting the salvation of the world, will of course terminate when the purposes for which it was established shall have been accomplished; while the reign of the Son of God, associated with his Father in the empire of the world, will last as long as that empire itself, and never cease, so long as the effects endure which the redemption of the world shall produce alike in its remotest as in its nearer consequences.

Regal authority was altogether alien to the institutions of Moses in their original and unadulterated form. Their fundamental idea was that Jehovah was the sole king of the nation (1 Sam. viii. 7); to use the emphatic words in Is. xxxiii. 22, 'The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king.' This important fact, however, does not rest on the evidence of single texts, but is implied in the entire Pentateuch, not to say the whole of the O. T. The Scriptural statements or implications are as follows:—God is the creator of the world; he saved a remnant from the flood; towards the descendants of Noah he manifested his special favour; to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, he promised a land flowing with milk and honey. In the fulness of time he accomplished, by apparently the most unlikely and untoward means, the oath which he more than once swore to the fathers of Israel; so that eventually, having furnished his people with a complete code of laws, he put them in possession of the promised territory, assuming the government, and setting forth sanctions alike of ample good and terrible ill, in order to keep the people loyal to himself as to the only Creator and God of the universe, and specially as their supreme sovereign.

We consider it as a sign of that self-confidence and moral enterprise which are produced in great men by a consciousness of being what they profess, that Moses ventured, with his half-civilized hordes, on the bold experiment of founding a society without a king, and that in the solicitude which he must have felt for the success of his great undertaking, he forewent the advantages which a regal government would have afforded. Nor is such an attempt a little singular and novel at a period and in a part of the world in which royalty was not only general, but held in the greatest respect, and sometimes rose to the very height of pure despotism. Its novelty is an evidence of the divine original to which Moses referred all his polity. Equally honourable is the conduct of Moses in denying to his lower nature the gratifications which a crown would have imparted—we say denying himself, because it is beyond a question that the man who rescued the Jews from bondage and conducted them to the land of Canaan, might, had he chosen, have kept the dominion in his own hands, and transmitted a crown to his posterity. If Washington, at this late period of human history, after the accumulating experience of above three thousand years has added its sanctions to the great law of disinterested benevolence, is held deserving of high honour for having preferred to found a republic rather than attempt to build up a throne, surely very unequal justice is done to Moses, if, as is too generally the case, we pass in neglect the extraordinary fact that, with supreme power in his hands, and, to all appearance, scarcely any hindrance to the assumption of regal splendour, the great Hebrew patriot and legislator was content to die within sight of the land of promise, a simple, unrewarded, unhonoured individual, content to do God's work regardless of self. It is equally obvious that this self-denial on the part of Moses, this omission to create any human kingship, is in entire accordance with the import, aim, and spirit of the Mosaic institutions, as being divine in their origin, and designed to accomplish a special work of Providence for man; and therefore affords, by its consistency with the very essence of the system of which it forms a part, a very forcible argument in favour of the divine legation of Moses.

That great man, however, well knew what were the elements with which he had to deal in framing institutions for the rescued Israelites. Slaves they had been, and the spirit of slavery was not yet wholly eradicated from their souls. They had, too, witnessed in Egypt the more than ordinary pomp and splendour which environ a throne, dazzling the eyes and captivating the heart of the uncultured. Not improbably the prosperity and abundance which they had seen in Egypt, and in which they had been, in a measure, allowed to partake, might have been ascribed by them to the regal form of the Egyptian government. Moses may well, therefore, have apprehended a not very remote departure from the fundamental type of his institutions. Accordingly he makes a special provision for this contingency (Deut. xvii. 14), and labours, by anticipation, to guard against the abuses of royal power. Should a king be demanded by the people, then he was to be a native Israelite; he was not to be drawn away by the love of show, especially by a desire for that regal display in which horses have always borne so large a part, to send down to Egypt, still less to cause the people to return to that land; he was to avoid the corrupting influence of a large harem, so common among Eastern monarchs; he was to abstain from amassing silver and gold; he was to have a copy of the law made expressly for his own study—a study which he was never to intermit till the end of his days; so that his heart might not be lifted up above his brethren, that he might not be turned aside from the living God, but observing the divine statutes, and thus acknowledging himself to be no more than the vicegerent of heaven, he might enjoy happiness, and transmit his authority to his descendants.

This passage has, indeed, been pronounced to stand apart from any connection in the Pentateuch, and to betray a much later hand than that of Moses. If our view is correct, it has a very obvious connection, and proceeds from the Hebrew legislator himself. Nor can it, we think, be denied that the reason is by no means an unlikely nor insufficient one, by which we have supposed Moses to have been prompted in promulgating the provisional and contingent arrangements which are found in the passage under consideration. Most emphatically is the act of taking a king ascribed by Moses to the people themselves, whom he represents as being influenced by considerations not dissimilar to those which we have assigned: 'When thou,' etc. 'and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me.' Winer, however, from whom (Real-wörterb.) we have taken this objection, argues in opposition to Stäudlin (Bertholdt's Theol. Journ., iii. 259, 361, sq.), that if Moses had anticipated a demand for a king, he would have made provision for such a demand at an earlier period—a remark which rests on no evidence of verisimilitude whatever, the opposite of the supposed course being just as probable. Besides, it may be affirmed, without the possibility of receiving any contradiction but that of mere assertion, that he made the provision as soon as he foresaw the probable need. Less solid, if possible, is Winer's other argument, namely, that in the passage (1 Sam. viii.) in which are recorded the people's demand of a king, and the prophet Samuel's reply, no trace is found of a reference to the alleged Mosaic law on the point. A reference in form Winer could scarcely expect; a reference in substance we see very clearly. We have not room to go into particulars, but recommend the reader carefully to compare the two passages.

The Jewish polity, then, was a sort of sacerdotal republic—we say sacerdotal, because of the great influence which, from the first, the priestly order enjoyed, having no human head, but being under the special supervision, protection, and guidance of the Almighty. The nature of the consequences, however, of that divine influence avowedly depended on the degree of obedience and the general faithfulness of the nation. The good, therefore, of such a superintendence in its immediate results was not necessary, but contingent. The removal of Moses and of Joshua by death soon left the people to the natural results of their own condition and character. Anarchy ensued. Noble minds indeed, and stout hearts, appeared in those who were termed Judges; but the state of the country was not so satisfactory as to prevent an unenlightened people, having low and gross affections, from preferring the glare of a crown and the apparent protection of a sceptre, to the invisible, and therefore mostly unrecognised, arm of Omnipotence. A king, accordingly, is requested. The misconduct of Samuel's sons, who had been made judges, was the immediate occasion of the demand being put forth. The request came with authority, for it emanated from all the elders of Israel, who, after holding a formal conference, proceeded to Samuel, in order to make him acquainted with their wish. Samuel was displeased; but having sought in prayer to learn the divine will, he is instructed to yield to the demand on a ground which we should not assuredly have found stated, had the book in which it appears been tampered with or fabricated for any courtly purposes or any personal ends, whether by Samuel himself, or by David, or any of his successors—'for they have not rejected thee (Samuel), but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them' (ver. 7, see also ver. 8). Samuel is, moreover, directed to 'protest solemnly unto them, and show them the manner of the king that shall reign over them.' Faithfully does the prophet depict the evils which a monarchy would inflict on the people. In vain: they said, 'Nay, but we will have a king over us.' Accordingly, Saul the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, was by divine direction selected, and privately anointed by Samuel 'to be captain over God's inheritance:' thus he was to hold only a delegated and subordinate authority. Under the guidance of Samuel, Saul is subsequently chosen by lot from among the assembled tribes; and though his personal appearance had no influence in the choice, yet when he was plainly pointed out to be the individual designed for the sceptre, Samuel called attention to those qualities which in less civilized nations have a preponderating influence, and are never without effect, at least, in supporting 'the divinity which doth hedge a king': 'See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people,' for he was higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward; 'and all the people shouted, God save the king.'

Emanating as the royal power did from the demand of the people and the permission of a prophet, it was not likely to be unlimited in its extent or arbitrary in its exercise. The government of God, indeed, remained, being rather concealed and complicated than disowned, much less superseded. The king ruled not in his own right, nor in virtue of the choice of the people, but by concession from on high, and partly as the servant and partly as the representative of the theocracy. How insecure, indeed, was the tenure of the kingly power, how restricted it was in its authority, appears clear from the comparative facility with which the crown was transferred from Saul to David; and the part which the prophet Samuel took in effecting that transference points out the quarter where lay the power which limited, if it did not primarily, at least, control the royal authority. It must, however, be added, that if religion narrowed this authority, it also invested it with a sacredness which could emanate from no other source. Liable as Israelite kings were to interference on the part of priest and prophet, they were, by the same divine power, shielded from the unholy hands of the profane vulgar; and it was at once impiety and rebellion to do injury to 'the Lord's anointed' (Ps. ii. 6, 7, sq.)

Instances are not wanting to corroborate and extend these general observations. When Saul was in an extremity before the Philistines (1 Sam. xxviii.), he resorted to the usual methods of obtaining counsel: 'Saul inquired of the Lord, the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets.' So David, when in need of advice in war (1 Sam. xxx. 7), resorted to Abiathar the priest, who, by means of the ephod, inquired of the Lord, and thereupon urged the king to take a certain course, which proved successful (see also 2 Sam. ii. 1). Sometimes, indeed, as appears from 1 Sam. xxviii., it was a prophet who acted the part of prime minister, or chief counsellor, to the king, and who, as bearing that sacred character, must have possessed very weighty influence in the royal divan (1 Kings xxii. 7, sq.) We must not, however, expect to find any definite and permanent distribution of power, any legal determination of the royal prerogatives as discriminated from the divine authority; circumstances, as they prompted certain deeds, restricted or enlarged the sphere of the monarch's action. Thus, in 1 Sam. xi. 4, sq., we find Saul, in an emergency, assuming, without consultation or deliberation, the power of demanding something like a levy en masse, and of proclaiming instant war. With the king lay the administration of justice in the last resort (2 Sam. xv. 2; 1 Kings iii. 16, sq.) He also possessed the power of life and death (2 Sam. xiv.) To provide for and superintend the public worship was at once his duty and his highest honour (1 Kings viii.; 2 Kings xii. 7; xviii. 4; xxiii. 1). One reason why the people requested a king was, that they might have a recognised leader in war (1 Sam. viii. 20). The Mosaic law offered a powerful hindrance to royal despotism (1 Sam. x. 25). The people also, by means of their elders, formed an express compact, by which they stipulated for their rights (1 Kings xii. 4), and were from time to time appealed to, generally in cases of 'great pith and moment' (1 Chron. xxix. 1; 2 Kings xi. 17; Joseph. De Bell. Jud. ii. 1. 2). Nor did the people fail to interpose their will, where they thought it necessary, in opposition to that of the monarch (1 Sam. xiv. 45). The part which Nathan took against David shews how effective, as well as bold, was the check exerted by the prophets; indeed, most of the prophetic history is the history of the noblest opposition ever made to the vices alike of royalty, priesthood, and people. If needful, the prophet hesitated not to demand an audience of the king, nor was he dazzled or deterred by royal power and pomp (1 Kings xx. 22, 38; 2 Kings i. 15). As, however, the monarch held the sword, the instrument of death was sometimes made to prevail over every restraining influence (1 Sam. xxii. 17).

After the transfer of the crown from Saul to David, the royal power was annexed to the house of the latter, passing from father to son, with preference to the eldest born, though he might be a minor. Jehoash was seven years old when he began to reign (2 Kings xi. 21). This rule was not, however, rigidly observed, for instances are not wanting in which nomination of a younger son gave him a preferable title to the crown (1 Kings i. 17; 2 Chron. xi. 21): the people, too, and even foreign powers, at a later period, interrupted the regular transmission of royal authority (2 Kings xxi. 24; xxiii. 30, 34; xxiv. 17). The ceremony of anointing, which was observed at least in the case of Saul, David, and Solomon (1 Sam. x. 1; xv. 1; xvi. 1, 12, 13; 2 Sam. ii. 4; 1 Kings i. 34; 1 Chron. xxix. 22), and in which the prophet or high-priest who performed the rite acted as the representative of the theocracy and the expounder of the will of heaven, must have given to the spiritual power very considerable influence; and both in this particular and in the very nature of the observance directs the mind to Egypt, where the same custom prevailed, and where the power of the priestly caste was immense (Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, v. 279). Indeed, the ceremony seems to have been essential to constitute a legitimate monarch (2 Kings xi. 12; xxiii. 30); and thus the authorities of the Jewish church held in their hands, and had subject to their will, a most important power, which they could use either for their own purposes or the common good. In consequence of the general observance of this ceremony, the term 'anointed,' 'the Lord's anointed' (1 Sam. ii. 10; xvi. 6; xxiv. 6; 2 Sam. xix. 21; Ps. ii. 2; Lam. iv. 20), came to be employed in rhetorical and poetical diction as equivalent in meaning to the designation king. We have seen in the case of Saul that personal and even external qualities had their influence in procuring ready obedience to a sovereign; and further evidence to the same effect may be found in Ps. xiv. 3; Ezek. xxviii. 12; such qualities would naturally excite the enthusiasm of the people, who appear to have manifested their approval by acclamations (1 Sam. x. 24; 1 Kings i. 25; 2 Kings ix. 13; xi. 12; 2 Chron. xxiii. 11; see also Joseph. De Bell. Jud., i. 33. 9). Jubilant music formed a part of the popular rejoicings (1 Kings i. 40); thank-offerings were made (1 Kings i. 25); the new sovereign rode in solemn procession on the royal mule of his predecessor (1 Kings i. 38), and took possession of the royal harem—an act which seems to have been scarcely less essential than other observances which appear to us to wear a higher character (1 Kings ii. 13, 22; 2 Sam. xvi. 22). A numerous harem, indeed, was among the most highly estimated of the royal luxuries (2 Sam. v. 13; 1 Kings x. 1; xx. 3). It was under the supervision and control of eunuchs, and passed from one monarch to another as a part of the crown property (2 Sam. xii. 8). The law (Deut. xvii. 17), foreseeing evils such as that by which Solomon, in his later years, was turned away from his fidelity to God, had strictly forbidden many wives; but Eastern passions and usages were too strong for a mere written prohibition, and a corrupted religion became a pander to royal lust, interpreting the divine command as sanctioning eighteen as the minimum of wives and concubines. In the original distribution of the land, no share, of course, was reserved for a merely possible monarch; yet the kings were not without several sources of income. In the earlier periods of the monarchy the simple manners which prevailed would render copious revenues unnecessary; and a throne which was the result of a spontaneous demand on the part of the people, would easily find support in free-will offerings, especially in a part of the world where the great are never approached without a present. There seems also reason to conclude that the amount of the contributions made by the people for the sustenance of the monarch depended, in a measure, on the degree of popularity which, in any particular case, he enjoyed, or the degree of service which he obviously rendered to the state (1 Sam. x. 27; xvi. 20; 2 Sam. viii. 11; 1 Kings x. 10, 25, sq.) That presents of small value and humble nature were not despised or thought unfit for the acceptance of royalty, may be learnt from that which Jesse sent to Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 20), 'an ass, with bread and a bottle of wine, and a kid.' The indirect detail 'of the substance which was king David's,' found in 1 Chron. xxvii. 25, sq. (comp. 1 Sam. viii. 14; 2 Chron. xxvi. 10, sq.), shews at how early a period the Israelitish throne was in possession of very large property, both personal and real. The royal treasury was replenished by confiscation, as in the case of Naboth (1 Kings xxi. 16; comp. Ezek. xli. 16, sq.; 2 Sam. xvi. 4). Nor were taxes unknown. Samuel had predicted (1 Sam. viii. 15), 'He will take the tenth of your seed and of your vineyards,' etc.; and so in other passages (1 Kings v. 13; ix. 21) we find that levies both of men and money were made for the monarch's purposes; and, in cases of special need, these exactions were large and rigorously levied (2 Kings xxiii. 35), as when Jehoiakim 'taxed the land to give the money according to the commandment of Pharaoh; he exacted the silver and the gold of the people of the land, of every one according to his taxation.' So long, however, as the native vigour of a young monarchy made victory easy and frequent, large revenues came to the king from the spoils of war (2 Sam. viii. 2, sq.). Commerce also supplied abundant resources (1 Kings x. 15). In the 14th verse of the chapter last referred to, it is said that 'the weight of gold that came to Solomon in one year was six hundred three score and six talents of gold.' In the same connection we find particulars which give a high idea of Solomon's opulence and splendour: 'Two hundred targets of beaten gold, each of six hundred shekels; three hundred shields of beaten gold, of three pounds of gold each; a great throne of ivory, overlaid with the best gold; drinking-vessels of gold: silver was accounted nothing of in Solomon's days.' A navy is also spoken of, which was at sea with the navy of Hiram, king of Tyre: this navy came once in every three years, bringing gold and silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks. 'So king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches.'

According to Oriental custom, much ceremony and outward show of respect were observed. Those who were intended to be received with special honour were placed on the king's right hand (1 Kings ii. 19). The most profound homage was paid to the monarch, which was required not merely by common usage, but by the voice of religious wisdom (Prov. xxiv. 21)—a requirement which was not unnatural in regard to an office that was accounted of divine origin, and to have a sort of vice-divine authority. Those who presented themselves before the royal presence fell with their face towards the ground till their forehead touched it (1 Sam. xxv. 23; 2 Sam. ix. 6; xix. 18), thus worshipping or doing obeisance to the monarch, a ceremony from which even the royal spouse was not exempted (1 Kings i. 16). A kiss was among the established tokens of reverence (1 Sam. x. 1; Ps. ii. 12), as were also hyperbolical wishes of good (Dan. ii. 4; iii. 9). Serious offences against the king were punished with death (1 Kings xxi. 10).

Deriving their power originally from the wishes of the people, and being one of the same race, the Hebrew kings were naturally less despotic than other Oriental sovereigns, mingled more with their subjects, and were by no means difficult of access (2 Sam. xix. 8; 1 Kings xx. 39; Jer. xxxviii. 7; 1 Kings iii. 16; 2 Kings vi. 26; viii. 3). After death the monarchs were interred in the royal cemetery in Jerusalem: 'So David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David' (1 Kings ii. 10; xi. 43; xiv. 31). But bad kings were excluded 'from the sepulchres of the kings of Israel' (2 Chron. xxviii. 27). In 1 Kings iv. will be found an enumeration of the high officers of state under the reign of Solomon (see also 1 Kings x. 5; xii. 18; xviii. 3; 2 Kings viii. 6; x. 22; xviii. 18; xix. 2; 1 Chron. xxvii. 25; Is. xxii. 15; Jer. lii. 25). The misdeeds of the Jewish crown, and the boldness with which they were reformed, may be seen exemplified in Jer. xxii.: 'Thus saith the Lord, Execute judgment and righteousness, and do no wrong; do no violence to the stranger, the fatherless, nor the widow; neither shed innocent blood. But if ye will not hear these words, this house shall become a desolation,' etc. Reference on the subject here treated of may be made to Schickard, Jus Regium Hebraeor., Tübing. 1621; Carpov, *Appar. KINGS, BOOKS OF. The two books of Kings formed anciently but one book in the Jewish Scriptures. The present division, following the Septuagint and Latin versions, has been common in Hebrew Bibles since the Venetian editions of Bomberg. That the book was originally an unbroken treatise is affirmed by Origen and Jerome, Melito of Sardis, and Josephus. (Thus Origen, apud Euseb. Præp. Evang. vi. 25, Βασιλείων τριτὴ καὶ τετάρτη, ἐν ἐνὶ Οὐαμμέλῃ Δαβὶδ; Hieronym. Prolog. Gal.; Joseph. Cont. Apion. i. 8.) Great stress cannot always be laid on the Jewish forms of the sacred books, as they were arranged so as to correspond with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The old Jewish name was borrowed, as usual, from the commencing words of the book, והמלך דוד, Græcized as in the quotation given from Eusebius. The Septuagint and Vulgate now number them as the third and fourth books of Kings, reckoning the two books of Samuel the first and second. The separation of Kings into two books is so awkwardly made, that it divides the lives of Ahaziah and Elijah, and carries over a portion of them into the second book. Their present title, מלכים, Bašileiōw, Régum, has, in the opinion of Hävernick, respect more to the formal than essential character of the composition (Einführung, sec. 168). Yet under such forms of government as those of Judah and Israel the royal person and name are intimately associated with all national acts and movements, legal decisions, warlike preparations, domestic legislation, and foreign policy. The reign of an Oriental prince is identified with the history of his nation during the period of his sovereignty. More especially in the theocratic constitution of the Jewish realm the character and personal influence of the monarch were an important element of national history, and, of necessity, had considerable influence on the fate and fortunes of the people.

The books of Kings contain the brief annals of a long period, from the accession of Solomon till the dissolution of the kingdom. The first chapters describe the reign of Solomon over the united kingdom, and the revolt under Rehoboam. The history of the rival states is next narrated in parallel sections till the period of Israel's downfall on the invasion of Shalmanezzer. Then the remaining years of the principality of Judah are recorded till the conquest of Nebuchadnezzar and the commencement of the Babylonish captivity. In the article ISRAEL, the period comprised has been exhibited under the name and reign of the kings who are mentioned in these books; and there also, and in the article JUDAH, the chronology of the books has been sufficiently considered. [See ISRAEL; JUDAH.]

The contents of the narrative exhibit many points of interest. The first book begins in sequel to those of Samuel, with the death of King David and the means taken to secure the succession of Solomon against the primogeniture of Adonijah. Then follow the erection and dedication of the Temple; the glories of the wise king; the visit of the Queen of Sheba; the disruption under Rehoboam; the invasion of Judah by Shishak; the idolatrous policy of Jeroboam as the head of the ten revolted tribes, and the doom of his house on account of his apostasy; the short and disturbed reigns of several of his successors; the wicked government of Ahab and his unscrupulous foreign queen; the grand episode of Elijah, and the alliances and fleet of Jehoshaphat. The second book opens with the translation of Elijah and the entrance on office of Elisha, second in greatness only to his predecessor, and records, among many other things, the siege of Samaria; the reforming zeal of Jehu; the energetic administration of Jeroboam II.; the invasion of Shalmanezzer; the treason of Athaliah; the restoration of the Temple under Jehoiada; the end of the kingdom of Israel under Hoshea; the lustre thrown by the good king Josiah over the last years of the kingdom of Judah; the fatal field of Megiddo, which led to a series of disasters; the interference of Pharaoh-Necho, and the ultimate overthrow and exile of the nation under Zedekiah. The kingdom of Israel lasted about 254 years, probably from 975 to 721 B.C., and that of Judah survived 135 years longer, lasting probably from 975 to 586 B.C. (Lepsius, Königsb. d. Ägypt., p. 107; Bosanquet, Transactions of the Chronological Institute, vol. ii., pt. 4). The narrative of those books, therefore, extends over a period of more than 400 years. But it is not easy to work out a satisfactory chronology on all points, whether we hold or give up the formal date of the building of the Temple as given in 1 Kings vi. 1. Nor needs such difficulty create surprise. The coincidence of the year of the one sovereign's accession with a parallel year in the reign of the rival sovereign is usually given; but the epochs appear to be computed sometimes by current and sometimes by complete years. There are interregna and periods of anarchy, especially in Israel; and the letters used as numerical symbols are liable to be mistaken by transcribers. Thus, on the one hand, eleven years of anarchy are supposed by many to have happened after the reign of Jeroboam II., and nine years of a similar kind prior to the accession of Hoshea. To equalise the result, Ewald and Thénios, on the other hand, lengthen the reigns of Jeroboam and Pekah. Lepsius and Bunsen propose a somewhat similar solution. The mention of several foreign princes in connection with the Hebrew sovereigns affords also some chronological data. Thus the fifth year of Rehoboam synchronises with some portion of the reign of Shishak; Hoshea sought alliance with So, king of Egypt; the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah brings into prominence both Sennacherib and Tirhakah; and Josiah is linked with Pharaoh-Necho. Yet, after all the labours of Bunsen, Lepsius, Hincks, and other scholars, there remains considerable doubt as to certain points, and only an approximation to accuracy can really be obtained. See CHRONOLOGY; Browne's Ordo Scriptorum, chap. iv., p. 221; Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, iii. 1, p. 261; Bunsen, Ägyptens Stelle, iv. p. 381; Ussher, Annales Vd. Test., Works, vol. viii. p. 108, Dublin.

There are some peculiarities in this succinct history worthy of attention. It is very brief, but very suggestive. It is not a biography of the sovereigns, not a mere record of political occurrences, nor yet an ecclesiastical register. King, church, and state, are all comprised in their sacred relations. It is a theocratic history, a retrospective survey of the kingdoms as existing under a theocratic government. The character of the sovereign is tested by his fidelity to the religious obligations of his office, and this decision in reference to his conduct is generally added to the notice of his accession. The new king's religious character is generally portrayed by its similarity or opposition to the way of David, of his father, or of Jeroboam son of Nebat, 'who made Israel to sin.' Ecclesiastical affairs are noticed with a similar purpose, and in contrast with past or prevalent apostasy, especially as manifested in the popular superstitions, whose shrines were on the 'high places.' Political or national incidents are introduced in general for the sake of illustrating the influence of religion on civic prosperity; of showing how the theocracy maintained a vigilant and vengeful guardianship over its rights and privileges—adherence to its principles securing peace and plenty, disobedience to them bringing along with it sudden and severe retribution. The books of Kings are thus a verification of the Mosaic warnings, and the author of them has kept this steadily in view. He has given a brief history of his people, arranged under the various political chiefs in such a manner as to show that the government was essentially theocratic, that its spirit, as developed in the Mosaic writings, was never extinct, however modified or inactive it might sometimes appear. So that these books appear in a religious costume, quite different from the form they would have assumed either as a political or an ecclesiastical narrative. In the one case legislative enactments, royal edicts, and popular movements, would have occupied a prominent place; in the other, sacerdotal arrangements, Levitical service, music and pageantry, would have filled the leading sections of the treatise. In either view the points adduced would have had a restricted reference to the palace or the Temple, the sovereign or the pontiff, the court or the priesthood, the throne or the altar, the tribute or tithes, the nation on its farms or the tribes in the courts of the sacred edifice. But the theocracy conjoined both the political and religious elements, and the inspired annalist unites them as essential to his design. The hand of Jehovah is continually acknowledged. The chief organ of theocratic influence enjoys also peculiar prominence. We refer to the incessant agency of the prophets, their great power and peculiar modes of action as detailed by the composer of the books of Kings. They interfered with the succession of Solomon, and their instrumentality was apparent in the great schism. They stirred up the people to a sense of duty, and they braved the sovereign when carrying out unconstitutional measures. The balance of power was in their hands; the regal dignity seemed to be sometimes at their disposal. In times of emergency they dispensed with usual modes of procedure, and assumed an authority with which no subject in an ordinary state can safely be intrusted, executing the law with a summary promptness which rendered opposition impossible, or at least unavailing. They felt their divine commission, and that they were the custodiers of the rights of Jehovah. At the same time they protected the interests of the nation, and, could we divest the term of its association with unprincipled turbulence and sedition, we would, like Winer, style them the demagogues of Israel (Winer, Realwört. art. Prophet). The divine prerogative was guarded by them with sacred jealousy, as well from royal usurpation as from popular invasion; and the interests of the people were as religiously protected against encroachments, too easily made under a form of government which had not the safeguard of popular representation or the check of aristocratic privilege. The priesthood became in many instances, though there are some illustrious exceptions, merely the creature of the crown, and therefore it became the prophetenthum to assert its dignity and stand forth as the majestic embassy of heaven.

The truth of these sentiments, as to the method, design, and composition of the books of Kings, is confirmed by ample evidence.

1. Large space is occupied with the building of the Temple—the palace of the Divine Protector—his throne in it being above the mercy-seat and between the cherubim (ch. v.-viii.) Care is taken to record the miraculous phenomenon of the descent of the Shekinah (ch. viii. 10). The prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the house is full of theocratic views and aspirations.

2. Reference is often made to the Mosaic Law with its provisions; and allusions to the earlier history of the people frequently occur (1 Kings ii. 3; iii. 14; vi. 11, 12; vii. 56, etc.; 2 Kings x. 31; xiv. 6; xvii. 13, 15, 37; xviii. 4-6; xxi. 1-8). Allusions to the Mosaic code are found more frequently toward the end of the second book, when the kingdom was drawing near its termination, as if to account for its decay and approaching fate.

3. Phrases expressive of Divine interference are frequently introduced (1 Kings xi. 31; xii. 15; xiii. 1, 2, 9; and xx. 13, etc.)

4. Prophetic interposition is a very prominent theme of record. It fills the vivid foreground of the historical picture. Nathan was occupied in the succession of Solomon (1 Kings i. 45); Ahijah was concerned in the revolt (xi. 29-40). Shemaiah disbanded the troops which Rehoboam had mustered (xii. 21-24). Ahijah predicted the ruin of Jeroboam, whose elevation he had promoted (xiv. 5-16). Jehu the prophet doomed the house of Baasha (xvi. 1). The reign of Ahab and Ahaziah is marked by the bold, rapid, mysterious movements of Elijah. Under Ahab occurs the prediction of Micaiah (xxii. 8). The actions and oracles of Elisha form the marvellous topics of narration under several reigns. The agency of Isaiah is also recognised (2 Kings xix. 20; xx. 16). Besides 1 Kings xiii. presents another instance of prophetic operation; and in xx. 35, the oracle of an unknown prophet is also rehearsed. Huldah the prophetess was an important personage under the government of Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 14). Care is also taken to report the fulfilment of striking prophecies, often in the phrase, 'according to the word of the Lord' (1 Kings xii. 15; xv. 29; xvi. 12; 2 Kings ix. 36; xiii. 15-18; xxiv. 2). Thus, the Old Syriac version prefixes, 'Here follows the book of the kings who flourished among the ancient people; and in this is also exhibited the history of the prophets who flourished during their times.'

5. Theocratic influence is recognised both in the deposition and succession of kings (1 Kings xiii. 33; xv. 4, 5, 29, 30; 2 Kings xi. 17, etc.). Compare on the whole of this view Hävernick, Einleit., sec. 168; Jahn, Introduct., sec. 46; Gesenius, Ueber Jes., vol. i. p. 934; Keil, Einleit., sec. 56; Stähelin, Spec. Einleit., p. 124. It is thus apparent that the object of the author of the books of Kings was to describe the history of the kingdoms, especially in connection with the theocratic element. This design accounts for what De Wette (Einleit., sec. 185) characteristically terms der steife prophetische Pragmatismus, and for the frequent myths which this writer and others find in these books.

These truths are plainly developed in the annals of the royal succession of the northern and larger kingdom of Israel. One son only of Jeroboam died a natural death, the rest were given over to the dogs and birds. His successor Nadab fell by the hand of Baasha, 'of the house of Issachar,' and Elah the son of Baasha was assassinated by Zimri, who put to death also 'his kinsfolk and friends.' After a reign of a few days, Zimri, to avoid the vengeance of Omri his rival, 'burned the king's house over him with fire and died.' Omri triumphed over his competitor Tibni, and 'did worse than all that were before him.' Ahab his son 'sold himself to work wickedness,' and fell in ignoble disguise at Ramoth-Gilead. Jehu extirpated the house of Ahab; Jehoahaz was a vassal of Hazael, though Jehoash and the second Jeroboam were somewhat more prosperous. But Jeroboam's son Zachariah was murdered by Shallum, and Shallum, after a month's reign, was in turn murdered by Menahem. Menahem bribed off the Assyrian king, and his son Pekahiah had reigned but two years when he was slain by Pekah, who soon met the same fate from Hoshea, the last of the kings. How could a country prosper under a government so unsettled, and of which so many of its heads were crowned assassins and usurpers? And all this though it was the scene of the labours of Elijah, Elisha, Jonah, Hosea, and Amos. In the other, or the kingdom of Judah, several of its sovereigns walked in the ways of David, and their prosperous reigns are joyously recorded. Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah, are specially noted; and while several of the worse monarchs were assassinated, the succession still remained in the house of David. But the idolatries of Solomon are not overlooked any more than those of Jeroboam, and the book which describes the glory of the temple tells also of its overthrow.

The authorship as well as the age of this history

may admit of several suppositions. Whatever were the original sources, the books are evidently the composition of one writer. The style is generally uniform throughout. The same forms of expression are used to denote the same thing, e.g., the male sex (1 Kings xiv. 10, etc.); the death and burial of a king (1 Kings xi. 43, etc.); modes of allusion to the law (1 Kings xi. 11); fidelity to Jehovah (1 Kings viii. 63, etc.); God's selection of Jerusalem (1 Kings viii. 16); and the references to the high places (1 Kings iii. 2); (De Wette, Einleit., sec. 184, a; Hävernick, Einleit., sec. 171). Similar idioms are ever recurring, so as to produce a uniformity of style (Monotonie der Darstellung, Hävernick, l.c.) Expressions which seem proverbial are repeated in the same terms, as the phrase, 'shut up and left' (1 Kings xiv. 10; 2 Kings ix. 8). There is not, however, perfect sameness of style in all places. There are also apparent discrepancies, but the solution must have been evident to the compiler. Thus 1 Kings xxi. 19, containing the doom of Ahab, 'in the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine,' is often said to be opposed to 1 Kings xxii. 38, where the prophecy is said to have been fulfilled when the armour of the deceased Ahab was washed at Samaria. But the fulfilment was yet waiting its culmination in the fate of Joram his son, whose corpse was 'cast into that plat of ground' by Jehu, who said at the time to his comrade, 'remember how that when I and thou rode together after Ahab his father, the Lord laid this burden on him' (2 Kings x. 25, 26). The retribution, as to its degradation, was fulfilled in the father, and as to its locality in the son. The phrase, 'unto this day,' is often used proverbially, and not with strict reference to subsequent reality. It seems to be repeated as it occurred in the original archives out of which the books have been compiled. The repetitions, as 1 Kings ix. 27, 28, and x. 22, are inserted from a different point of view; or, as in 2 Kings xiii. 12, 13, compared with xiv. 15, 16, the passages may have been inserted from erroneous transcription. We have not the perfect and colourless redaction of a modern abridgment, in which all anomalies are smoothed down, all chasms neatly bridged over, and seeming contradictions displaced or explained; but we have the varied style, loose connection, abrupt transitions, and occasional repetitions and dislocations, of an honest and artless compiler, whose work is not to interpret but to narrate.

The sources whence the historic information has been derived have been variously given. That annals contemporary with the events which they describe were written in the early period of the Jewish state, may be at once admitted. Eichhorn supposes that the sources of 'Kings were private historical works' (Einleit., sec. 482). De Wette, from the legends related in them, cannot believe them to be official documents. Bertholdt, Hävernick, and Movers, hold that the books are extracts from the public annals (comp. Hävernick, sec. 169). The inspired historiographer refers his readers to these sources of evidence in such frequent phrases as וְיָרָא, and 'the rest of the acts.' Such a reference is made especially to the sources, when other royal acts than those narrated in the books of Kings are glanced at. These sources are styled the book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah, or Israel. Similar phraseology is used in Esther x. 2; vi. 1, to denote the official annals of the Persian empire. Public documents are spoken of in the same way (Neh. xii. 23). There is little reason to suppose that the book referred to in this last passage is that styled Chronicles in our copy of the Scriptures (Movers, Chronik, sec. 234). Therefore we infer that the 'Book of the Chronicles of the Kings,' so often alluded to, was an authentic document—public and official state papers.

That the prophets themselves were employed in recording contemporaneous events, is evident from 1 Chron. xxix. 29; 2 Chron. xx. 34, etc. In the course of the narrative we meet with many instances of description, having the freshness and form of nature, and which are apparently direct quotations from some journal, written by one who testified what he had seen (1 Kings xx. 10; 2 Kings xii. 15; xiv. 8). Thus we have in those books, for the period of David, 'the book of Samuel the seer, the book of Nathan the prophet, and the book of Gad the seer;' and these may have been the source and authority of the 'Acts of David the king,' referred to in 1 Chron. xxix. 29. The 'Book of the Acts of Solomon' seems to have been a separate independent document, and may have had its origin in the works referred to in 2 Chron. ix. 29. as in 'the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, and in the visions of Iddo the seer.' There are several Hebrew words peculiar to the account of the reign of Solomon, and found nowhere else in Kings. It is therefore wrong, as Bleek says, on the part of Stähelin and De Wette, to assign Solomon's consecration-prayer to the period of the captivity. In the same books of Chronicles, the prophetic annalists are named in connection with many of the kings—Shemaiah and Iddo with Rehoboam, Jehu the son of Hanani with Jehoshaphat, Isaiah with Uzziah and Hezekiah, Azariah the son of Oded with Asa, Micah the son of Imiah with Ahab, and Jeremiah with Josiah. No less than thirteen of such works—or contemporary annals—are mentioned in the books of Chronicles, besides the ordinary and oft-recurring authority, 'The Book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel and Judah.'—Rawlinson's Bampton Lecture, Lect. iii. The stories of Elijah and Elisha appear to have been distinct and separate compositions incorporated into the narrative.

Besides being virtually, and in source, the work of contemporary writers or prophets, these books receive confirmatory evidence of their historical verity from external or profane sources. On the one hand, Shishak and his conquest of Judah, So or Sevek, Tirhakah of Cush, and Pharaoh-Necho, are distinctly deciphered on the Egyptian monuments. On the other hand, the names of Jehu, Menahem, Hezekiah, and Manasseh, are found on the Assyrian tablets, along with the names of Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, and Sennacherib, who records at length his victory over many towns of Israel, and the immense tribute paid to him by Hezekiah. Among the tributaries of Esarhaddon appears Manasseh king of Judah. The Tyrian annals, as preserved by Menander, and the fragmentary notices of Syria found in ancient authors, are in general harmony with the Scripture annals. It is not to be forgotten also, that the historical incidents of these books receive confirmatory illustration from the prophets of the O. T. A portion of Isaiah and Jeremiah is historical, and light is cast on the same subjects by many allusions to manners and social condition in Amos and Hosea. Though there appears to be occasional exaggeration in numbers, arising from the blunders of transcribers, yet the credibility of the history rests upon a sure and unbroken foundation. What neologists style their mythical character or colouring, furnishes to every believer in the reality of the theocratic government established by Moses, continued evidence that the Jews were God's peculiar people, and that Jehovah was their sovereign (Hävernick, sec. 170; Hengstenberg, Beitr., ii. 169). The miraculous element is so imbedded in the history, that the history depends upon it, and cannot be well understood without it. The supernatural is all the more credible, if it be adapted to the age and people, and its manifestations be ever in harmony with the spirit of the theocracy, or in vindication of its claims.

As to what has been termed the anti-Israelitish spirit of the work (Bertholdt, Einleit., p. 949), we do not perceive it. Eichhorn affirmed that Judah was introduced only on account of the synchronisms (Einleit., iii. p. 542). But truth required that the kingdom of Israel should be described in its real character. Idol-worship was connected with its foundation; moscholatry was a state provision; fidelity obliged the annalist to state that all its kings patronized the institutions of Bethel and Dan, while eight, at least, of the Jewish sovereigns adhered to the true religion; and that the majority of its kings perished in insurrection, while those of Judah were, in general, exempted from seditious tumults and assassination.

Now, the compiler from these old documents—he who shaped them into the form which they have in our present books of Kings—must have lived in a late age. The Second Book of Kings concludes with an account of the liberation of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from prison in Babylon. Jahn and Hävernick place the composition of 'Kings' in the reign of Evil-merodach; De Wette, and Keil virtually, towards the end of the Captivity. Instances of later phraseology occurring in the books of Kings are given by De Wette (sec. 185). But the majority of his instances do not prove his opinion. Many of the words and forms of spelling instanced by him are found also in some of the earlier books. Thus the forms מִלְחָמָה for מִלְחָמָה and מִלְחָמָה for מִלְחָמָה , found in Kings, are found also in the earlier books—the former in Judges xvii. 2, and the latter in Leviticus xv. 18, etc. The Chaldee official title רַב (2 Kings xxv. 8) is given appropriately to a Chaldee general. The use of the distinctive term הַיְיָ , in 2 Kings xviii. 26, was necessitated by the request of Eliakim that Rabshakeh should speak not in the tongue of the people but in his native Aramæan. The lists of later words given by Stähelin only prove that the period of the exile is the most probable date of composition. There are indeed some peculiar terms occurring in Kings which seldom or never occur in the other books, though occasionally in Chronicles and the parallel sections of Isaiah. Calmet ascribes the authorship to Ezra. Jewish tradition makes Jeremiah the author (Baba-bathra, fol. 15. 1). This opinion, adopted by Grotius, and lately revindicated by Hävernick and Graf, certainly appears the more probable. Thenius conjectures that the author was a pupil of Jeremiah; Stähelin that he may have been an imitator; and Keil, that he was a citizen of Judah, long in the Babylonian exile, and filled with the prophetic spirit. There is considerable linguistic affinity between the books of Kings and the prophecy of Jeremiah (Küper, Jerem. p. 56).

Kings.	Jeremiah.
2 K. xvii. 14 . . .	vii. 26.
1 K. ix. 8 . . .	xxii. 8.
2 K. xxiv.-xxv. . .	lii.
1 K. ii. 4; viii. 25;	xxxiii. 17; xiii. 13;
ix. 5.	xvii. 25.
2 K. xxi. 12 . . .	xix. 3.

In the absence of certain evidence this opinion may be deemed the most likely, and is a more simple theory than that of Movers, who supposes that Jeremiah compiled a more ancient production—a book of Kings—the source of our present treatise. It explains the close similarity of the books of Kings and Jeremiah in spirit, style, and tendency, more easily and more satisfactorily than the supposition of De Wette, or any other conjecture of like nature. Objections against this opinion, from the hasty way in which Jeremiah has described his own times, admit of an easy solution. Contemporaries were familiar with his life and times, while his own prophecy contains some of the desired information. Another objection, that Jeremiah could not have lived longer than Evil-merodach, is noticed and refuted by Hävernick (Ueber Daniel, p. 14). The age of the Jewish tradition as to the authorship of the books of Kings may be inferred from the fact that they are placed among the נביאים. The conjecture of Gesenius that the book was written in Babylon gathers no proof from the phrase עבר הנהר (1 Kings iv. 24), as if it meant on the other or west side of the river, and was employed by one living to the east of the Euphrates; for the phrase is not uniform in meaning (Josh. i. 14, etc.). The idiom seems to have acquired a geographical currency, without any exact allusion to the locality of the person using it.

It has been sometimes thought, as by Thénius, that the books of Samuel were the production of the same redactor who composed the books of Kings. Both compositions form a history almost contiguous, though 2 Sam. xx.-xxiv. is evidently an appendix. That there should be many points of similarity in two works of history on kindred themes, and having a similar purpose in view, surprises no one. The close philological affinity on which Stähelin insists so much (Spec. Einleit., sec. 36), may thus be easily accounted for. Yet there are also points of dissimilarity. The language of 'Samuel' has few marks of later usage; the style has more traces of an early age about it. The books of Samuel have not the compactness and symmetry of the books of Kings. The greater portion of them seems to be an original work, rather than a compilation. Vaihinger (art. Könige, Bücher der, in Herzog's Encyclo.) holds that Judges, as well as Samuel and Kings, are the production of one author. Ewald (Geschich., i. 175) also thinks that from Judges to 2 Kings the hand of one author is apparent. But the instances adduced by Vaihinger will not suffice as proofs. The allusions in very similar language to an event so singular and of such national interest as the Exodus in Judges ii. 1-8, and 2 Kings xvii. 7; the like terms in which religious apostasy is described in Judg. xi. 17, and 2 Kings xvii. 13, are insufficient to warrant the conclusion. Nor will the use of הִכָּתִים, signifying to provoke to anger, as found in Judges ii. 12 and 2 Kings xvii. 11, 17, give any additional proof of sameness of style, for the verb is found elsewhere, as in Deut. xxxi. 29; Ps. lxxviii. 58; Hosea xii. 14. The same may be said of the other phrase, 'to deliver into the hand of spoilers,' which in Kings may have been copied from the earlier book and applied to a similar juncture in the history of their sin and punishment. There are, indeed, many points of similarity between Samuel and Kings, repeated turns of idiomatic expression which may not prove identity of authorship, but only shew that the compiler of the later books regarded the earlier one as his model.

The relation of Kings to Chronicles need not be dwelt on [see CHRONICLES]. In Kings we have some things not in Chronicles—as the attempt to secure the throne by Adonijah; David's last charge; the deposition of Abiathar, and the execution of Joab; the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter; his judgment in the case of the two harlots; the organisation of his royal household; his idolatries, and his enemies, etc. On the other hand, many things passed over in Kings are detailed in Chronicles—such as David's preparations for building the Temple; the orders and arrangements of the Levites; the expostulation of Azariah with Asa; Jehoshaphat's reforming energy; and Hezekiah's passover, etc. etc. In point of number the books of Kings give generally smaller figures than Chronicles, as 1 Kings v. 16 comp. with 2 Chron. ii. 18; 1 Kings vii. 26 comp. with 2 Chron. iv. 5; 1 Kings ix. 28 comp. with 2 Chron. viii. 18; 2 Kings viii. 26 comp. with 2 Chron. xxii. 2. In the case of Jehoiachin in Kings, ten years are added to his age at his accession, 2 Kings xxiv. 8 comp. with 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9. 1 Kings iv. 26 presents an enormous exaggeration (2 Chron. ix. 25), giving according to the present reading 40,000 for 4000—having ארבעה for ארבעים.

The age of the books of Kings may be intermediate between the early books of Samuel and the later ones of Chronicles. The extraordinary handling of the books of Kings in the Septuagint has been often remarked on. There are transpositions, which only obscure the order of the narrative, some omissions, and several additions; one especially containing sentences of some length with regard to Jeroboam. There are also misrenderings and translations which would seem to imply a different Hebrew reading. The matter is fully gone into by Thénius (die Bücher der Könige erklärt; Einleit. p. 17). We need not wonder that the books of Kings, containing the history of the covenant people, are so often referred to in the N. T. Our Lord himself alludes to Solomon's glory; to the visit of the queen of Sheba; to the widow of Sarepta, and Elijah's mission to her; and to Naaman the Syrian in the days of Elisha (Matt. vi. 29; xii. 42; Luke iv. 25-27). The rough robe of Elijah and his complaint, the great drought, and the resuscitation of the Shunamite's child, are also referred to (Mark i. 6; Rom. xi. 3; James v. 17; Heb. xi. 35).

The 'Introductions' referred to in the course of this article may be consulted. Modern commentators upon 'Kings' are scarce, and there are not many old ones; Theodoret, Questiones in libros iii. et iv. Regnorum, Opera, vol. i.; Seb. Leonhardi Προμνηματα, in Libb. Reg., Erf. 1606, Lips. 1610-14; Seb. Schmidii Annot. in Lib. Reg., Strasb. 1687; the various authors in the Critici Sacri; Cornelius à Lapide, Comment., Opera, vol. ii., 1718; Maurer, *Comment. KING'S DALE (מֶלֶךְ הַדָּלָה; τὸ πεδῖον τῶν Βασιλέων; vallis regis). In only two passages of Scripture is this place mentioned, and from neither of them can we get any information as to its position. When Abraham was returning with the spoil of Sodom, the king of Sodom went out to meet him 'at the valley of Shaveh, which is the king's dale' (Gen. xiv. 17); and in the narrative of the death of Absalom, the incidental remark is inserted by the historian—'Now Absalom in his lifetime had reared up for himself a pillar which is in the king's dale' (2 Sam. xviii. 18).

We have no direct indication of the geographical position of the king's dale either in the Bible or any ancient author. Some have supposed that it is identical with the valley of Jehoshaphat or Kidron; and that the well-known monument, now called the tomb of Absalom, is the pillar raised by that prince (Benjamin of Tudela, in Early Travels in Palestine, p. 84; Raumer, Pal., p. 303; Barclay, City of Great King, p. 92). The style of the monument, which is of the later Roman age, makes this theory impossible; and the name given to the valley, Emek (מֶעָק; מֶעָק), proves that a 'plain' or 'broad valley' was meant, and not a ravine like the Kidron. Others locate the king's dale at Beersheba, others at Lebanon (Reland, Pal., p. 357), others near the Jordan (Stanley, Lectures on the Jewish Church, p. 44). But if we identify Salem with Jerusalem, then doubtless the king's dale was close to that city; and it seems highly probable besides that Absalom should have raised his memorial pillar in the vicinity of the capital (Krafft, Die Topographie Jerusalems, p. 88). Josephus says that Absalom's marble pillar in the king's dale was two furlongs distant from Jerusalem (Antiq. vii. 10. 3). Let it be observed also that the other name of the king's dale, Shaveh (שָׁוֶה), signifies 'a level place,' a 'plain.' Now in the immediate neighbourhood of Jerusalem there is one place, and only one, which appears to answer to these indications, and it is the Plain of Rephaim. It is on the direct route from the north to Hebron; a practicable road leads down from it through the wilderness to the shore of the Dead Sea; and it is so close to Jerusalem that Melchisedec, from the heights of Zion, could both see and hear the joyous meeting of the princes of Sodom with the victorious band of Abraham, and the reclaimed captives (cf. Kurtz, Hist. of the Old Covenant, i. 218; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, i. 488; Kalisch on Gen. xiv. 17).—J. L. P.

KINNAMON (קִינָמון), translated 'cinnamon,'

occurs in three places of Scripture; first, about 1600 years before the Christian era, in Exod. xxx. 23, where it is enumerated as one of the ingredients employed in the preparation of the holy anointing oil. It is next mentioned in Prov. vii. 17, again in Cant. iv. 14, while in Rev. xviii. 13, among the merchandise of Babylon, we have 'cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincense.' In the earliest notice it is called kinnamon besem, or 'sweet cinnamon.' Dr. Vincent is inclined to consider khennah besem and khinnamon besem as derived from the same root.

Many writers have doubted whether the kinnamon of the Hebrews is the same article that we now call cinnamon. Celsius quotes R. Ben Melech (ad Cant. iv. 14) and Saadiah (Exod. xxx.) as considering it to be the Lign Aloe, or Agallochum. Others have doubted whether our cinnamon was at all known to the ancients. But the same thing has been said of almost every other drug which is noticed by them. If we were to put faith in all these doubts, we should be left without any substances possessed of sufficiently remarkable properties to have been articles of ancient commerce. The word κιννάμωμον occurs in many of the Greek authors, as Herodotus, Hippocrates, Theophrastus, Dioscorides, Galen, etc. The first of these, writing 400 years before the Christian era, describes cinnamon as a product of Arabia, and of cinnamon he says, 'which we, as instructed by the Phœnicians, call κιννάμωμον.' He states, moreover, that the Arabians were unacquainted with the particular spot in which it was produced, but that some asserted it grew in the region where Bacchus was educated. From all this we can only infer that it was the production of a distant country, probably India, and that it was obtained by the route of the Red Sea. Theophrastus (ix. 5) gives a fuller but still fabulous account of its production, and it is not until the time of Dioscorides, Galen, and the Periplus of the Erythraean sea, that we get more definite information. Galen says that cassia and cinnamon are so much alike that it is not an easy matter to distinguish the one from the other. This is a difficulty that still continues to be experienced. Dioscorides (i. 12) says that cassia grows in Arabia, and that there are several kinds of it; and of cinnamon he states also (i. 13) that there are several species, named from the different places where it is procured. But the best sort is that which is like the cassia of Mosylon, and is itself called Mosyllitic, or as Pliny says, 'Portus Mosyllites quo cinnamomum devehitur' (vi. 29). Several kinds are described by Dioscorides, and no fewer than ten kinds in the Periplus of Arrian (vid. Vincent, Periplus, ii. p. 711), and among these the Σκληρότερον, from the Greek σκληρός, 'hard,' which he translates 'xylocassia,' or 'wood cinnamon,' and states to be 'a term which occurs frequently, and perhaps distinguishes the cassia lignea (wood cinnamon) from the cassia fistula (cannella, or pipe cinnamon).'

Cinnamon of the best quality is imported in the present day from Ceylon, and also from the Malabar coast, in consequence of the cinnamon plant (Cinnamomum Zeylanicum) having been introduced there from Ceylon. An inferior kind is also exported from the peninsula of India, the produce of other species of cinnamomum, according to Dr. Wight. From these countries the cinnamon and cassia of the ancients must most likely have been obtained, though both are also produced in the islands of Sumatra and Borneo, in China, and in Cochinchina.

Cassia bark, as we have seen, was distinguished with difficulty from cinnamon by the ancients. In the present day it is often sold for cinnamon; indeed, unless a purchaser specify true cinnamon, he will probably be supplied with nothing but cassia. It is made up into similar bundles with cinnamon, has the same general appearance, smell, and taste; but its substance is thicker and coarser, its colour darker, its flavour much less sweet and fine than that of Ceylon cinnamon, while it is more pungent, and is followed by a bitter taste; it is also less closely quilled, and breaks shorter than genuine cinnamon. There can be no reasonable doubt, as cinnamon and cassia were known to the Greeks, that they must have been known to the Hebrews also, as the commerce with India can be proved to have been much more ancient than is generally supposed [KIDDAN].—J. KINNIM (כִּנְמִים and כִּנְמִים, Exod. viii. 16, 17, 18: cf. Heb. 12, 13, 14; Ps. cv. 31; Sept. σκνίφες or σκνίπες; Vulg. cynipēs and scynipēs: Wisd. xix. 10; Sept. σκνίπα; Alex. Ald. σκνίφας; Vulg. muscas). The name of the creature employed in the third plague upon Egypt, miraculously produced from the dust of the land. Its exact nature has been much disputed. Those who reason from the root of the word in the Hebrew text, and assume it to be derived from כָּנַן, to fix, settle, or establish, infer lice to be meant, from their fixing themselves on mankind, animals, etc. The meaning of the root is, however, too general to afford by itself any assistance in ascertaining the particular species intended. Dr. A. Clarke has further inferred from the words 'in man and in beast,' that it was the acarus sanguisugus, or 'tick' (Comment. on Exod. viii. 16). But since it is spoken of as an Egyptian insect, the name for it may be purely Egyptian, and may have no connection with any Hebrew root (Michaelis, Suppl. ad Lex., n. 1174). However this may be, the preposition from which Dr. Clarke argues is too various in meaning to assist his hypothesis. Nor is it certain whether the word is singular or plural. The variation, both in letters and points, seems to betoken uncertainty somewhere, though Gesenius takes כִּנְמִים in the collective sense. Michaelis also remarks that if it be a Hebrew word for lice, it is strange that it should have disappeared from the cognate tongues, the Aramaic, Samaritan, and Ethiopic. The rendering of the Septuagint seems highly valuable when it is considered that it was given by learned Jews resident in Egypt, that it occurs in the most ancient and best executed portion of that version, and that it can be elucidated by the writings of ancient Greek naturalists, etc. Thus Aristotle, who was nearly contemporary with the Septuagint translators of Exodus, mentions the κνίπες (the σκνίφες of the Septuagint) among insects able to distinguish the smell of honey (Hist. Animal., iv. 8), and refers to species of birds which he calls σκνιποφάγα, that live by hunting σκνίπες (viii. 6). 'The κνίπες are born in certain trees, as the oak, the fig-tree, and they seem to subsist upon the sweet moisture which is collected under the bark. They are also produced on some vegetables' (Hist. Plant., iv. 17, and ii. ult.) This description applies to aphides, or rather to the various species of 'gall flies' (Cynips, Linn.) Hesychius, in the beginning of the third century, explains σκνίψ, ζῶον χλωρὸν τε τετράπτερον, 'a green four-winged creature,' and quotes Phrynichus as applying the name to a sordid wretch, and adds, ἀπὸ τοῦ θηρίδιου τοῦ ἐν τοῖς ξύλοις, τοῦ κατὰ βραχὺ αὐτὰ καταβλῶντος, 'from the little creature among trees, which speedily devours them.' Philo (A.D. 40) and Origen in the second century, who both lived in Egypt, describe it in terms suitable to the gnat or mosquito (Philo, Vita Mosis, i. 97. 2, ed. Mangey; Origen, Homilia tertia in Exod.); as does also Augustine in the third or fourth century (De Continentia, etc.) But Theodoret, in the same age, distinguishes between σκνίπες and κνώπες (Vita Jacobi). Suidas (A.D. 1100) says, σκνίψ, ζῶον κνωπῶδες, 'resembling gnats,' and adds, ἐστὶ γὰρ ὁ σκνίψ ζῶον μικρὸν ξυλοφάγον, 'a little creature that eats wood.' These Christian fathers, however, give no authority for their explanations; and Bochart remarks that they seem to be speaking of gnats under the name σκνίπες, which word, he conjectures, biassed them from its resemblance to the Hebrew. Schleusner adds, 'Glossaria in Octateuch. σκνίφες, ζῶα μικρά ὑπὸ τοῖς κνώπας (less than gnats), Lex. Cyrilli, MS. Brem. σκνίφες ζῶοφις ἐστὶν ἐοικότα κνώπῳ (very small creatures like gnats). From this concurrence of testimony it would appear, that not lice, but some species of gnats is the proper rendering, though the ancients, no doubt, included other species of insects under the name. Mr. Bryant, however, gives a curious turn to the evidence derived from ancient naturalists. He quotes Theophrastus, and admits that a Greek must be the best judge of the meaning of the Greek word, but urges that the Septuagint translators concealed the meaning of the Hebrew word, which he labours to prove is lice, under the word they have adopted, for fear of offending the Ptolemies, under whose inspection they translated, and the Egyptians in general, whose detestation of lice was as ancient as the time of Herodotus (ii. 37), (but who includes τι ἄλλο μυσσάρων, 'any other foul creature'), and whose disgust, he thinks, would have been too much excited by reading that their nation once swarmed with those creatures through the instrumentality of the servants of the God of the Jews (Plagues of Egypt, Lond. 1794, p. 56, etc.) This suspicion, if admitted, upsets all the previous reasoning. It is also inconsistent with Bryant's favourite hypothesis, that the plagues of Egypt were so adapted as to afford a practical mortification of the prejudices of the Egyptians. Nor could a plague of lice, upon his own principles, have been more offensive to them than the plague on the river Nile, and the frogs, etc., which he endeavours to show were most signally opposed to their religious notions. Might it not be suggested with equal probability that the Jews in later ages had been led to interpret the word lice as being peculiarly humiliating to the Egyptians? (see Joseph. Antiq. ii. 14. 3, who, however, makes the Egyptians afflicted with phthiriasis.) The rendering of the Vulgate affords us no assistance, being evidently formed from that of the Septuagint, and not being illustrated by any Roman naturalist, but found only in Christian Latin writers (see Faccioliati, in voc.) The other ancient versions, etc., are of no value in this inquiry. They adopt the popular notion of the times, and Bochart's reasonings upon them involve, as Rosenmüller (apud Bochart) justly complains, many unsafe permutations of letters. If, then, the Septuagint be discarded, we are deprived of the highest source of information. Bochart also reasons upon the similarity of the word כִּנִּים to κνίδες, the word in Aristotle for the eggs of fleas, lice, bugs, etc., whether infesting mankind or beasts (vi. 26), but which is not more like it than κνώσπες; and an enthusiast in etymology might remark that κνίδες means both 'dust' and 'lice,' which Scaliger explains lendes, 'nits,' ab exiguitate similes pulveri, 'from their minuteness, like dust' (p. 518). It is strange that it did not occur to Bochart that if the plague had been lice, it would have been easily imitated by the magicians, which was attempted by them, but in vain (Exod. viii. 18). Nor is the objection valid, that if this plague were gnats, etc., the plague of flies would be anticipated, since the latter most likely consisted of one particular species having a different destination [FLY]; whereas this may have consisted of not only mosquitoes or gnats, but of some other species which also attack domestic cattle, as the astrus, or tabanus, or zimb (Bruce's Travels, ii. 315, 8vo); on which supposition these two plagues would be sufficiently distinct.

293. Laurus kinnamomum.

But since mosquitoes, gnats, etc., have ever been one of the evils of Egypt, there must have been some peculiarity attending them on this occasion, which proved the plague to be 'the finger of God.' From the next chapter, ver. 31, it appears that the flax and the barley were smitten by the hail; that the former was beginning to grow, and that the latter was in the ear—which, according to Shaw, takes place in Egypt in March. Hence the כִּנִּים would be sent about February, i. e., before the increase of the Nile, which takes place at the end of May, or beginning of June. Since, then, the innumerable swarms of mosquitoes, gnats, etc., which every year affect the Egyptians, come, according to Hasselquist, at the increase of the Nile, the appearance of them in February would be as much a variation of the course of nature as the appearance of the astrus in January would be in England. They were also probably numerous and fierce beyond example on this occasion; and as the Egyptians would be utterly unprepared for them (for it seems that this plague was not announced), the effects would be signally distressing. Bochart adduces instances in which both mankind and cattle, and even wild beasts, have been driven by gnats from their localities. It may be added, that the proper Greek name for the gnat is εμπis, and that probably the word κνώσψ, which much resembles κνώψ, is appropriate to the mosquito. Hardouin observes, that the ol κνίπες of Aristotle are not the εμπίδες, which latter is by Pliny always rendered culices, but which word he employs with great latitude [GNAT]. For a description of the evils inflicted by these insects upon man, see Kirby and Spence, Introduction to Entomology, Lond. 1828, i. 115, etc.; and for the annoyance they cause in Egypt, Maillet, Description de l'Égypte par l'Abbé Mascari, Paris 1755, xc. 37; Forskal, Descript. Animal., p. 85. Michaelis proposed an inquiry into the meaning of the word σκνίπες to the Société des Savants, with a full description of the qualities ascribed to them by Philo, Origen, and Augustine (Recueil, etc., Amst. 1744). Niebuhr inquired after it of the Greek patriarch, and also of the metropolitan at Cairo, who thought it to be a species of gnat found in great quantities in the gardens there, and whose bite was extremely painful. A merchant who was present at the inquiry called it dubâb-el-keb, or the dog-fly (Description de l'Arabie, Pref. pp. 39, 40). KINSMAN. Of the four Hebrew words thus translated in the A. V., three, כִּנִּים (Num. xxvii. 11), מִדְרֵעַ (Ruth ii. 1), and קִרְבֹּב (Ps. xxxviii. 12 [11]; Job xix. 14, A. V. 'kinsfolk'), indicate simple relationship. The remaining one, נָאֵל, along with that, implies certain obligations arising out of that relationship.

The term נָאֵל is derived by the lexicographers from the verb נָאֵל, to redeem. That the two are closely connected is certain, but whether the meaning of the verb is derived from that of the noun, or the converse, may be made matter of question. The comparison of the cognate dialects leads to the conclusion that the primary idea lying at the basis of both is that of coming to the help or rescue of one, hence giving protection, redeeming, avenging.

Comp. Ar. جَال, ivit, venit; جَال, circumivit, obivit; Syr. ܝܠܡܝܫܬܐ misertus est, protexit. In this case the לָנֶפֶשׁ of the O. T. would, in fundamental concept, answer pretty nearly to the παράκλητος of the N. T.

The Goel among the Hebrews was the nearest male blood relation alive. To him, as such, three rights specially belonged, and on him corresponding duties devolved towards his next of kin.

1. When an Israelite through poverty sold his inheritance and was unable to redeem it, it devolved upon one of his kin to purchase it (Lev. xxv. 25-28; Ruth iii. 4; iv.) So also, when an Israelite had through poverty sold himself into slavery, it devolved upon the next of kin as his Goel to ransom him in the Jubilee year (Lev. xxv. 47, ff. [JUBILEE, YEAR OF]). In allusion to this, God is frequently represented as the Goel of His people, both as He redeems them from temporal bondage (Exod. vi. 6; Is. xliii. 1; xlviii. 20; Jer. i. 34; etc.) and from the bondage of sin and evil (Is. xli. 14; xlv. 6, 22; xlix. 7; Ps. ciii. 4; Job xix. 25; etc.). In some of these passages there is an obvious Messianic reference, to which the fact that our redemption from sin has been effected by One who has become near of kin to us by assuming our nature gives special force (comp. Heb. ii. 14).

2. When an Israelite who had wronged any one sought to make restitution but found that the party he had wronged was dead without leaving a son, it fell to the next of kin of the injured party, as his Goel, to represent him and receive the reparation (Num. v. 6, ff.) The law provided that in case of his having no one sufficiently near of kin to act for him in this way, the property restored should go to the priest as representing Jehovah the King of Israel; a provision which the Jews say indicates that the law has reference to strangers, as 'no Israelite could be without a redeemer, for if any one of his tribe was left he would be his heir' (Maimon. in Baba Kama, ix. 11).

3. The most striking office of the Goel was that of acting as the avenger of blood in case of the murder of his next of kin; hence the phrase לֹמֵם

הַדָּם, the blood-avenger. In the heart of man

there seems to be a deep-rooted feeling that where human life has been destroyed by violence, the offence can be expiated only by the life of the murderer. Hence in all nations where the rights of individuals are not administered by a general executive acting under the guidance of law, the rule obtains that where murder has been committed the right and duty of retaliation devolves on the kindred of the murdered person. Amongst the Shemitic tribes this took the form of a personal obligation resting on the nearest of kin; a custom which still prevails among the Arabs (Niebuhr, Des. d'Arabie, ch. 7). This deep-rooted feeling and established usage the Mosaic legislation sought to place under such regulations as would tend to prevent the excesses and disorders to which personal retaliation is apt to lead, without attempting to preclude the indulgence of it.* Certain cities of refuge were provided to which the manslayer might endeavour to escape. If the Goel overtook him before he reached any of these cities he might put him to death; but if the fugitive succeeded in gaining the asylum he was safe until at least an investigation had been instituted as to the circumstances of the murder. If on inquiry it was found that the party had been guilty of deliberate murder, the law delivered him up to the Goel to be put to death by him in any way he pleased; but if the murder was accidental the manslayer was entitled to the protection of the asylum he had reached [ASYLUM; CITIES OF REFUGE]. He was safe, however, only within its precincts, for if the Goel found him beyond these he was at liberty to kill him. Among some of the Oriental nations the right of blood-revenge might be satisfied by the payment of a sum of money; but this practice, which obviously gave to the rich an undue advantage over the poor in matters of this sort, the law of Moses absolutely prohibits (Num. xxxv. 31).

From the narrative in Ruth iii. and iv. it has been concluded that among the duties of the Goel was that of marrying the widow of a deceased kinsman so as to raise up seed to the deceased; thus identifying the office of the Goel with that of the Levir, as provided for Deut. xxv. 5-10 [MARRIAGE]. But the levirate law expressly limits the obligation to a brother, and, according to the Jewish commentators, to a full brother by the father's side (Maimonides, quoted by Othon, Lex. Rabbin. Phil., p. 372), and in this relation neither Boaz nor the other kinsman stood to Elimelech or his sons. It is further evident that the question here was one of right rather than one of duty, and that the kinsman who waived his right incurred no disgrace thereby, such as one who declined to fulfil the levirate law incurred. The nearest kinsman had the right to redeem the land, and the redemption of the land probably involved the marrying of the widow of the deceased owner, according to usage and custom; but the law did not enjoin this, nor did the Goel who declined to avail himself of his right come under any penalty or ban. The case of the Goel, and that of the Levir, would thus be the converse of each other: the Goel had a right to purchase the land, but in so doing came under an obligation from custom to marry the widow of the deceased owner; the Levir was bound to marry the widow of his deceased brother, which involved, as a matter of course, the redemption of his property if he had sold it (see Winer, Real-wörb., s. v. Ruth; Selden, De Success. in bon. defunct., c. 15; Benary, De Hebraeorum Levirate, p. 19, ff.; Bertheau, *Exeg. Hdb. zum A. In 1793 he brought out at the University Press a very handsome edition of the famous

'Codex Beza,' with fac-simile types (Codex Beza, Quadratis literis, Græco-Latinis, 2 vols. fol.), which was immediately assailed with a virulence amounting to personal hostility by the party which had espoused the cause of the once notorious Friend, who was banished the university for Unitarianism, and in whose case Kipling had come forward as promoter, or public prosecutor. Dr. Edwards, the leader of the party, charged him with ignorance and want of fidelity. But though his Prolegomena do not manifest much accurate scholarship, and he commits the serious error of printing the corrections instead of the original reading of the text, which he relegated to the notes at the end, Tregelles (Introd. to Text. Crit. of N. T.) allows that he 'appears to have used scrupulous exactitude in performing his task efficiently according to the plan which he had proposed to himself.' He was rewarded with the deanery of Peterborough, in which dignity he died in 1822.—E. V.

KIPPOD (כִּפּוֹד). This name occurs but three times in Scripture (Is. xiv. 23; xxxiv. 11; and Zeph. ii. 14), and has been variously interpreted—owl, osprey, tortoise, porcupine, otter, and, in the Arabic, bustard. Bochart, Shaw, Lowth, and other great authorities, have supported the opinion that it refers to the porcupine. The main stress of their argument seems to depend upon the component parts of the original word, of which the first syllable is said to be derived from כִּנָּה, kana, 'spine;' in confirmation of which Bochart, with his wonted learning, cites the Chaldee, Hebrew, Arabic, and Ethiopian names of the porcupine and hedgehog, which apparently confirm his opinion; but although derivations, when they are supported by apparent identity of meaning in other kindred languages, may satisfy the judgment of mere philologists, something more will be demanded by naturalists, who, looking for more positive indications than apparent synonyma and inferential derivation, have recourse mainly to the context for the real conditions, which must determine the meaning of disputed terms. Now, in Is. xiv. 23, 'I will make it a possession for the kippod (bittern), and pools of water,' etc., the words are plain and natural. Marshes and pools are not the habitation of hedgehogs, for they shun water. In Is. xxxiv. 11, it is said, 'The cormorant (Sterna caspia) and the kippod (bittern) shall possess it, the owl also and the raven shall dwell in it,' etc.; that is, in the ruins of Idumæa. Here, again, the version is plain, and a hedgehog most surely would be out of place. Zeph. ii. 14, 'Both the cormorant (Sterna caspia) and the kippod (bittern) shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; and their voice shall sing in the windows,' etc. Surely here kippod cannot mean the hedgehog, a nocturnal, grovelling, worm-eating animal, entirely or nearly mute, and incapable of climbing up walls; one that does not haunt ruins, but earthy banks in wooded regions, and that is absolutely solitary in its habits. We thus see that the arguments respecting kippod, supplied by kephud, or kephod—for we find these various readings—are all mere speculations, producing at best only negative results. Those drawn from indications of manners, such as the several texts contain, are, on the contrary, positive, and leave no doubt that the animal meant is not a hedgehog, nor even a mammal, but a bird. Hence, though we admit the assumed root of the denomination, still it must bear an interpretation which is applicable to one of the feathered tribes, probably to certain wading species, which have, chiefly on the neck, long pointed feathers, more or less speckled. The Arabian bustard, Otis houbara, might be selected, if it were not that bustards keep always in dry deserts and uplands, and that they never roost, their feet not admitting of perching, but rest on the ground. We think the term most applicable to the heron tribes, whose beaks are formidable spikes that often kill hawks; a fact well known to Eastern hunters. Of these Nycticorax europæus, or common night heron, with its pencil of white feathers in the crest, is a species, not uncommon in the marshes of Western Asia; and of several species of bittern, Ardea (botaurus) stellaris has pointed long feathers on the neck and breast, freckled with black, and a strong pointed bill. After the breeding-season it migrates and passes the winter in the south, frequenting the marshes and rivers of Asia and Europe, where it then roosts high above ground, uttering a curious note before and after its evening flight, very distinct from the booming sound produced by it in the breeding-season, and while it remains in the marshes. Though not building, like the stork, on the tops of houses, it resorts, like the heron, to ruined structures, and we have been informed that it has been seen on the summit of Tauk Kesra at Ctesiphon.—C. H. S.

KIR (כִּיר, 'a wall'; Cyrene), the place to which the inhabitants of Damascus were carried captive by the king of Assyria (2 Kings xvi. 9). It is worthy of note that in the four passages in which alone this word occurs in Scripture, the authors of the Septuagint mistook its meaning or omitted it. They omit it in 2 Kings xvi. 9; in Is. xxii. 6 they render it συναγωγῇ, perhaps mistaking it for 'π'; in Amos i. 5 they translate ἐκκλητος, probably reading כִּירָא; and in Amos ix. 7 they have βόβρος, deriving it from כִּיר, 'to dig.' No indication is given of the geographical position of Kir, nor can we learn from Scripture whether it was a city or district. Some suppose that Kir is identical with the Koῖρρα, or Curna, of Ptolemy, a city of Media on the river Mardus (Ptolemy, vi. 2; Bochart, Opera, i. 294; Winer, R. W., s. v.) Others think that Kir was a province or district along the banks of the river Cyrus, which flows down from the loftiest summits of the Caucasus range into the Caspian Sea (Pliny, H. N., vi. 10; Ptol. v. 12). This river lies on the extreme northern frontier of ancient Assyria. It still retains its ancient name, Kūr (Bonomi, Nineveh, pp. 47, 71). Isaiah mentions Elam and Kir together (l. c.), and hence Keil (on 2 Kings xvi. 9) thinks it more natural to identify the latter with Curna of Media, or with Xapῖν, also a city of Media (Ptol. vi. 2), now called Kerend (Ritter, Erdkunde ix. 391). The latter supposition is adopted by Vittinga (apud Is. xxii. 6), and seems to be supported by the Targum, which has כִּירָא; it would also locate Elam and Kir close together, as the former lay along the southern border of Media, whereas the river Cyrus lies north of Media. It is now impossible satisfactorily to settle the question; we cannot even state with certainty whether the Kir of 2 Kings is identical with that of Isaiah; the latter may perhaps have been in Media near Elam, and the former on the banks of the Cyrus.—J. L. P.

KIR-HARESH, KIR-HERES, KIR-HARASETH, KIR-HARESETH, and KIR-MOAB (קִיר חָרֶשֶׁת, Is. xvi. 11; קִיר חָרֶשֶׁת, Jer. xlvi. 31, 36; קִיר חָרֶשֶׁת, 2 Kings iii. 25; קִיר חָרֶשֶׁת, Is. xvi. 7, 29; קִיר מוֹאֵב, Is. xv. 1), a strong city of Moab. It is remarkable that in not a single instance does the Vulgate version render this as a proper name; and the authors of the LXX. only make it a proper name in one passage, Is. xvi. 7, and there corruptly. Kir was one of the chief fortresses and cities of Moab; and the word heres or harseth would seem to imply that its wall was built of 'brick.' When Joram king of Israel invaded Moab, Kir was the only city left standing in the whole country; and it was saved by an act of savage cruelty, which is recorded in 2 Kings iii. 25-27. In the Chaldee paraphrase Kir-Moab of Isaiah is rendered כִּרְמֹאב, Kerakka of Moab; and in 2 Mac. xii. 17 the city is called Χάρακα. Ptolemy (v. 17) has it Χαρακώμα, and Steph. Byzant. Χαρακώβα. The city became the seat of a bishopric in the province of Palestina Tertia (Reland, p. 705). The Crusaders captured it, rebuilt its fortifications, and, mistaking it for Petra, established there, in A.D. 1167, a Latin bishopric of that name (Will. Tyr. xi. 26; xv. 21; Jacobi de Vitri. in Gesta Dei, ch. lvi. p. 1077; cf. Winer, R. W., s. v.; Robinson, B. R., ii. 166). There can be no doubt of the identity of Kir and Kharacca with the Kerak of Arab geographers (Schultens, Index Geogr. in Vul. Salad, s. v. Caracha), and the modern village of that name.

Kerak stands on the top of a rocky hill about ten miles from the south-east corner of the Dead Sea, and near the southern frontier of Moab. The hill is encompassed by deep narrow ravines, beyond which rise loftier mountains, shutting it in on all sides except the west, where a sublime glen descends 3000 feet to the shore of the Dead Sea. The city was at one time strongly fortified; and is still enclosed by a half ruinous wall, flanked by seven massive towers. Originally there were but two entrances, one on the north, the other on the south, and both tunnelled through the rock for a distance of nearly a hundred feet. On the western side stands the citadel, a strong building, separated from the town by a deep moat hewn in the rock. It appears to have been built by the Crusaders. Within it is a ruinous church, on whose walls are a few traces of rude paintings. The present population numbers about 3000, one-third of whom are Greek Christians. Their strong position, numbers, and valour, make them the rulers of a large district, and almost independent of the Turkish government. (Handbook for S. and P., i. pp. 59, seq.; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 387; De Saulcy, Journey round the Dead Sea, i. 366-98; Lynch, Expedition, pp. 263, seq., English ed.)—J. L. P.

KIRJATH (קִירְיָת). This word means town or city, and is much used in the formation of names of places, like our own town. The following are the principal places distinguished by this term:—

1. KIRJATH, a town belonging to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28). It is identified by Rosenmüller and others with Kirjath-jearim, but v. Kaumer and Keil object to this on the ground that Kirjath-jearim is not only reckoned among the cities of Judah (xv. 60), but is expressly called the city of the children of Judah. Eusebius (Onomast., s. v. Kapidd) says Kirjath was a city under the metropolis of Gabatha (Gibeath); but this gives us no clue to its site.—W. L. A.

2. KIRJATHAIM, KIRIATHAIM (קִירְיָתַיִם, 'two cities,' or 'double city'; Kapiaθαιμ; Alex. Kapiaθαιμ; Cariathaim). i. A city of Reuben, situated a little to the south of Heshbon (Num. xxxii. 37). Though taken and rebuilt by this tribe, it was again, on the decline of Jewish power, occupied by the Moabites; and in pronouncing a prophetic curse on that nation Jeremiah mentions Kirjathaim with Nebo, Heshbon, and some other principal cities (xlviii. 1, 23). It appears from an incidental statement of Ezekiel that Kirjathaim was on, or near, the frontier of Moab. 'Therefore, behold, I will open the shoulder of Moab from its cities on its frontiers . . . Beth-jeshimoth, Baal-meon, and to Kiriathaim' (xxv. 9). The reading in this passage is קִירְיָתַיִם, which is intended for קִירְיָתַיִם, with ה local added, as is seen in the Keri; the LXX., however, renders it παραθαλάσσιος, 'of the maritime city,' having read ים 'sea,' instead of the termination θαιμ.

Kiriathaim is mentioned by both Eusebius and Jerome, who state that in their day it was a large Christian village, situated ten miles west of Medeba, and called Coraitha (Kapiaθαιμ, according to Eusebius, Onomast., s. v. Cariathaim). About eleven miles south-west of the ruins of Medeba is a ruined village called Kureiyât, which is doubtless identical with the Coraitha of Jerome, and most probably with Kiriathaim. It lies on the south-western slope of Jebel Attarus. It was visited by Seetzen (Reise, ii. 342; cf. Ritter, Pal. and Syr., ii. 583). Burckhardt thought that the ruins of Et-Teym, some miles farther north, might be Kiriathaim (Travels in Syria, p. 367; Ritter, id. p. 1185).

Kiriathaim is one of the oldest of Bible cities. It was on the 'plain of Kiriathaim' (A. V. SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM, which see) that the Emims were smitten by the eastern kings who plundered Sodom (Gen. xiv. 5). Burckhardt tells us that a few miles south of Kureiyât is a level plateau, still called el-Koura, 'a term often applied in Syria to plains.' He would identify it with the 'Plain of Moab' (Travels in Syria, p. 371).

ii. A town of Naphtali allotted to the Ievites (1 Chron. vi. 76 [61]). The parallel passage in Josh. xxi. 32 has KARTAN, which see.—J. L. P.

3. KIRJATH-ARBA (קִירְיָת אַרְבָּה; Sept. πόλις Ἀρβάς, πόλις Ἀργύβ, Καριαθαρβός), the name of Hebron previous to the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites (Gen. xxiii. 2; xxxv. 27; Josh. xiv. 15; xv. 13, 54; xx. 7; xxi. 11), and which was apparently still in the use in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. xi. 25). There is reason to believe that Hebron was the original name of the place, that this was by the Canaanites changed into Kirjath-Arba, and that the Israelites when they took it restored the ancient name (Hengstenberg, Bair. iii. 187, ff.). Sir J. Maundeville says that in his time the place was called by the Saracens 'Kari-carba, that is, the Place of Patriarchs,' and by the Jews 'Arbothe' (Early Trav. in Palestine, p. 161). The partial resemblance of these names to Kirjatharba is probably purely accidental. Whether the אַרְבַּע in this word is a proper name or the numeral four, has been made matter of question.

Jerome received from the Jews the tradition that the city was called 'of four,' because there Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had been buried; and this he not only mentions in various parts of his writings, but has introduced into the text of the Vulgate: Adamus maximus ibi inter Enakim situs est (Josh. xiv. 15), and in the Onomast. he renders it by villula quattuor; but the older tradition was that Arba was the name of a man, one of the famous ancestors of the Anaqim, for there is no other way of making sense of Josh.

xiv. 15, than by taking the words הָאָדָם הַגָּדוֹל בְּעֶנְקִים הָיוּ, 'the great man among the Anaqim was he,' as in apposition to and descriptive of Arba (comp. xxi. 11). It is true that the naming of cities after individuals rarely occurs in the O. T.; but Arba was, doubtless, a heroic person in the esteem of the Canaanites, and the case of Kirjath-Baal shews that the names of deities and deified heroes might be so employed [HEBRON].—W. L. A.

4. KIRJATH-BAAL קִרְיַת בָּעַל; Sept. Καριαθ Βάαλ; Baal's town), the place commonly called Kirjath-Jearim (Josh. xv. 60; xviii. 14).

5. KIRJATH-HUZOTH קִרְיַת חֻצוֹת; Sept. πόλις ἑρῶν), the place to which Balaam was conducted by Balak to offer sacrifice (Num. xxii. 39). Knobel identifies it with the Kereyat of Burckhardt on the ridge of the Jebel Attarus to the east of the Dead Sea, or the ruins described by Seetzen as bearing the name of d Kœrriol, near the same locality, if the two be not the same.

6. KIRJATH-JEARIM קִרְיַת יְעָרִים, city of forests; Sept. Καριαθιαριμ; also KIRJATH-ARIM (Ezra ii. 25), one of the towns of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17). It was to this place that the ark was brought from Bethshemesh, after it had been removed from the land of the Philistines, and where it remained till removed to Jerusalem by David (1 Sam. vii.; 1 Chron. xiii.) This was one of the ancient sites which were again inhabited after the exile (Ezra ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29). Eusebius and Jerome speak of it as being in their day a village nine miles from Diospolis (Lydda), on the road to Jerusalem. Dr. Robinson thinks it possible that the ancient Kirjath-jearim may be recognised in the present Kuryet-el-Enab. The first part of the name (Kirjath, Kuryet, signifying city) is the same in both, and is most probably ancient, being found in Arabic proper names only in Syria and Palestine, and not very frequently even there. The only change has been, that the ancient 'city of forests' has, in modern times, become the 'city of grapes.' The site is also about three hours, or nine Roman miles from Lydda, on the road to Jerusalem, and not very remote from Gibeon, from which Kirjath-jearim could not well have been distant. So close a correspondence of name and position seems to warrant the conclusion of Dr. Robinson in favour of Kuryet-el-Enab. This place is that which ecclesiastical tradition has identified with the Anathoth of Jeremiah, which Dr. Robinson refers to Anata [ANATHOTH]. It is now a poor village, its principal buildings being an old convent of the Minorites, and a Latin church. The latter is now deserted, but not in ruins, and is said to be one of the largest and most solidly constructed churches in Palestine (Robinson, ii. 109; 334-337).—J. K.

7. KIRJATH-SANNAH (city of palms; Josh. xv. 49), otherwise KIRJATH-SEPHER (city of the book), a city of the tribe of Judah, called also DEBIR, which see (Josh. xv. 15, 16; Judg. i. 11, 12).

KIR-MOAB (קִיר-מוֹאָב), 'the town, stronghold, or citadel of Moab,' Sept. τὸ τεῖχος τῆς Μωαβιτιδος; Is. xv. 1) [KIR-HARESETH].

KISH (קִישׁ; Sept. and N. T. Kis). The name of four persons mentioned in the O. T., of whom the most important was the father of Saul, the first king of Israel. He was a Benjamite of Gibeah, the son of Ner, and the grandson of Jehiel or Abiel (1 Sam. xiv. 51; 1 Chron. ix. 35). One of his uncles also bore the name of Kish (1 Chron. ix. 36). This was the name also of the great-grandfather of Mordecai, who was taken captive at the time Jeremiah was carried to Babylon (Esther ii. 5); and of a Merarite (1 Chron. xxiii. 21; xxiv. 29), who is also called KISHI (1 Chron. vi. 44) and KUSHALAH (1 Chron. xv. 17); the ancestor of Jeduthun or Ethan [JEDUTHUN].—W. L. A.

KISHION and KISHON (קִישִׁיֹן, 'hardness'; Κισίων; Alex. Κισίων; Cesion), a town of Issachar, apparently situated in the great plain of Esdraelon, where most of those with which it is grouped also stood (Josh. xix. 20). It was one of four allotted to the Levites (xxi. 28). It is called Kedesh in 1 Chron. vi. 72, which may perhaps have been a later name for it [KEDESH]. Some think that Kishon owes its name to the more celebrated river Kishon; and others that it took its name from the river. The two names, however, though similar in sound, have different roots, קִישִׁיֹן coming from קָשָׁה, 'to be hard'; and קִישִׁיֹן, from קָשָׁה, 'to be bent as a bow' (cf. Gesenius, Thesaurus; Keil on Josh. ad loc.) The site of the town is unknown.—J. L. P.

KISHON (קִישִׁיֹן, 'tortuous,' from קָשָׁה, 'to be bent'; Κισίων, Κισίων; Alex. Κισίων and Κεσιών; Cison), a celebrated river of Palestine, which drains nearly the whole plain of Esdraelon, and falls into the Mediterranean near the northern base of Mount Carmel. The Kishon has a vast number of little branches or tributaries falling into it from the hills on the north and south sides of the plain. Its highest sources on the north-east are at Tabor, as is stated by Jerome (Onomast., s. v. Cison). This has been denied by Shaw (Travels, i. 168), but its truth has been satisfactorily established by many recent travellers (Robinson, B. R., ii. 356, 363; Munro, Summer Ramble, i. 281). The watershed on this part of the plain might be defined, with a near approach to accuracy, by a line drawn from the base of Tabor to the village of Nain on the opposite hill; on the west side of that line the water flows to the Mediterranean through the Kishon; on the east to the Jordan. During the summer all the water-courses are perfectly dry, but when the heavy rains of winter and early spring fall, large torrents rush down from Tabor and the hills of Galilee, speedily fill the deep miry beds in the alluvial plain, and render the passage of them both difficult and dangerous. In the end of March 1858 the writer travelled from Nazareth to Jenin; rain had fallen for two days before, and he had extreme difficulty in crossing one of the channels through which a considerable stream was flowing westward (cf. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 434, English ed.) The soil of the whole plain is so soft and deep, and the natural drainage so defective, that a fall of rain converts large sections of it into dangerous swamps. During the battle between the French and the Arabs, on April 16th, 1799, many of the latter are said to have been drowned in the stream which flows westward through the plain from Deburieh, at the foot of Tabor (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 339; cf. Robinson, ii. 363). The highest source of the Kishon on the south-east is the large fountain of Jenin, the ancient En-gannim, the water from which, increased by a number of the streamlets from the surrounding hills, flows westward across the plain through a deep channel, during the winter months; but in summer this channel, like the northern one, is perfectly dry (Van de Velde, Travels, i. 362; Thomson, 435). The two channels unite at a point a few miles north of the site of Megiddo. The channel of the united stream is here deep and miry; the ground for some distance on each side is low and marshy; and the fords during winter are always difficult, and often, after heavy rain, impassable; yet in summer, even here, the whole plain and the river bed are dry and hard (Robinson, ii. 364; Thomson, l.c.) These facts strikingly illustrate the narrative of the defeat of Sisera. The battle was fought on the south bank of the Kishon, at Megiddo (Judg. iv. 13; v. 19). While the battle raged a violent storm of wind and rain came on (Judg. v. 4, 20; cf. Joseph. Antiq. v. 5. 4). In a short time the hard plain was turned into a marsh, and the dry river-bed into a foaming torrent. The Canaanites were driven back on the river by the fiery attack of Barak, and the fury of the storm; for 'the earth trembled, the heavens dropped . . . the stars in their courses fought against Sisera.' The war-horses and chariots dashing madly through the marshy ground made it much worse; and the soldiers, in trying to cross the swollen torrent, were swept away. 'The river Kishon swept them away, that ancient river, the river Kishon' (Judg. v. 21).

From this place the river flows through a tortuous bed to a narrow pass between the base of Carmel and a projecting spur from the hills of Galilee, where it passes from the plain of Esdraelon to that of Acre. Here was the scene of another of the most memorable incidents in sacred history. High up on the brow of Carmel, above the stream, is a spot called Muhrakah, 'the sacrifice' (محرقة), Holocaustum; Freitag, Lex. Arab.) ; it is the place where Elijah offered his sacrifice; and on the banks of the Kishon beneath, the eight hundred and fifty prophets of Baal were slain by his command (1 Kings xviii.; Handbook, ii. 371; Van de Velde, Travels, i. 321; Stanley, S. and P., 347). The river continues to flow close along the rocky base of Carmel, in a tortuous bed, cut to the depth of fifteen or twenty feet in the loamy soil. The writer forded it in the month of May, on his way from the convent to Nazareth; the stream was about three feet deep and thirty wide, with a very easy current, but the soft mud made the passage difficult (cf. Robinson, ii. p. 365). The largest perennial source of the Kishon is the fountain of Saadfyeh, which springs from the base of Carmel, about three miles east of Haifa (Thomson, p. 435; Handbook, ii. 383). From this point to the sea the river winds through marshes. At its mouth are banks of fine sand, which any unusual swell in the river converts into dangerous quicksands (Van de Velde, i. 289).

Such is the river Kishon, 'that ancient river.' Its modern name is Nahr el-Mukutta, which some have thought means 'the river of slaughter,' in allusion to the slaughter of the prophets of Baal on its banks. It may have this meaning, from the root قَطع, 'to cut,' or 'slay;' but the name may also signify 'river of the ford,' from another meaning of the same root (Freitag, Lex. Arab., s. v.; cf. Robinson, ii. 365); the latter is the interpretation given of the name by the people of the country (but see Schwarze, pp. 49, seq.; Stanley, S. and P., p. 347; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 86).—J. L. P.

KISHUIM (כִּשְׁוִיִּם) is translated cucumbers in our A. V., and the correctness of this rendering has been almost universally admitted. It first occurs in Num. xi. 5, in the verse already quoted in ABATTICHIM, where the Israelites, when in the desert, express their longings for the melons and the Kishuim or cucumbers of Egypt. Reduced from the plural form, the word kisha is so similar to the Arabic كِيسا kissa, that there can be very little doubt of their both meaning the same thing. Celsius gives keta, kati, and kusua, as different pronunciations of the same word in different Oriental languages. It does not follow that these names always indicate exactly the same species; since in the different countries they would probably be applied to the kinds of cucumber most common, or perhaps to those which were most esteemed in particular localities. Thus in Egypt the name kati appears to be applied to the species which is called Cucumis chate by botanists, and 'queen of cucumbers' by Hasselquist, who describes it as the most highly esteemed of all those cultivated in Egypt [ABATTICHIM]. In India the name kissa is applied by the Mohammedans to the Cucumis utilisimus, or the common kukree of the natives; while in Persia and Syria the same name would probably be applied only to the common cucumber, or Cucumis sativus, as the two preceding species are not likely to be much known in either country. All travellers in the East notice the extensive cultivation and consumption of cucumbers and other herbs of the same tribe, especially where there is any moisture of soil, or the possibility of irrigation. Thus even in the driest parts, the neighbourhood of a well is often occupied by a field of cucurbitaceous plants, generally with a man or boy set to guard it from plunder, perched up on a temporary scaffolding, with a slight protection from the sun, where he may himself be safe from the attacks of the more powerful wild animals. That such plants appear to have been similarly cultivated among the Hebrews is evident from Is. i. 8, 'The daughter of Zion is left like a cottage in a vineyard, like a lodge in a garden of cucumbers;' as well as from Baruch vi. 70, 'As a scarecrow in a garden of cucumbers keepeth nothing, so are their gods of wood' [ABATTICHIM].—J. KISS. Originally the act of kissing had a symbolical character, and, though this import may now be lost sight of, yet it must be recognised the moment we attempt to understand or explain its signification. Acts speak no less, sometimes far more forcibly, than words. In the early period of society, when the foundation was laid of most even of our Western customs, action constituted a large portion of what we may term human language, or the means of intercommunication between man and man; because then words were less numerous, books unknown, the entire machinery of speaking, being in its rudimental and elementary state, less developed and called into play; to say nothing of that peculiarity of the Oriental character (if, indeed, it be not a characteristic of all nations in primitive ages) which inclined men to general taciturnity, with occasional outbreaks of fervid, abrupt, or copious eloquence. In this language of action, a kiss, inasmuch as it was a bringing into contact of parts of the body of two persons, was naturally the expression and the symbol of affection, regard, respect, and reverence; and if any deeper source of its origin were sought for, it would, doubtless, be found in the fondling and caresses with which the mother expresses her tenderness for her babe. That the custom is of very early date appears from Gen. xxix. 13, where we read—'When Laban heard the tidings of Jacob, his sister's son, he ran to meet him, and embraced him and kissed him, and brought him to his house;' the practice was even then established and recognised as a matter of course. In Gen. xxvii. 26, 27, a kiss is a sign of affection between a parent and child. It was also, as with some modern nations, a token of friendship and regard bestowed when friends or relations met or separated (Tobit vii. 6; x. 12; Luke vii. 45; xv. 20; Acts xx. 37; Matt. xxvi. 48; 2 Sam. xx. 9). The church of Ephesus wept sore at Paul's departure, and fell on his neck and kissed him. When Orpah quitted Naomi and Ruth (Ruth i. 14), after the three had lifted up their voice and wept, she 'kissed her mother-in-law, but Ruth clave unto her.' It was usual to kiss the mouth (Gen. xxxiii. 4; Exod. iv. 27; xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xx. 41; Prov. xxiv. 26), or the beard, which was then taken hold of by the hand (2 Sam. xx. 9). Kissing of the feet was an expression of lowly and tender regard (Luke vii. 38). Kissing of the hand of another appears to be a modern practice: the passage of Job xxxi. 27, 'Or my mouth hath kissed my hand,' is not in point, and refers to idolatrous usages, namely, the adoration of the heavenly bodies. It was the custom to throw kisses towards the images of the gods, and towards the sun and moon (1 Kings xix. 18; Hosea xiii. 2; Minuc. Felix, ii. 5; Tac. Hist. iii. 24. 3; Lucian, De Salt. c. 17; Plin. Hist. Nat. xviii. 5). The kissing of princes was a token of homage (Ps. ii. 12; 1 Sam. x. 1; Xenoph. Cyrop. vii. 5. 32). Xenophon says (Agesil. v. 4) that it was a national custom with the Persians to kiss whomsoever they honoured; and a curious passage to this effect may be found in the Cyropædia (i. 4. 27). Kissing the feet of princes was a token of subjection and obedience; which was sometimes carried so far that the print of the foot received the kiss, so as to give the impression that the very dust had become sacred by the royal tread, or that the subject was not worthy to salute even the prince's foot, but was content to kiss the earth itself near or on which he trod (Is. xlix. 23; Micah vii. 17; VOL. II.

Ps. lxxii. 9; Dion Cass. lix. 27; Seneca, De Benef. ii. 12). The Rabbins did not permit more than three kinds of kisses, the kiss of reverence, of reception, and of dismissal (Breschith Rabba on Gen. xxix. 11).

The peculiar tendency of the Christian religion to encourage honour towards all men, as men; to foster and develop the softer affections; and, in the trying condition of the early church, to make its members intimately known one to another, and unite them in the closest bonds—led to the observance of kissing as an accompaniment of that social worship which took its origin in the very cradle of our religion. Hence the exhortation—'Salute each other with a holy kiss' (Rom. xvi. 16; see also 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26; in 1 Peter v. 14, it is termed 'a kiss of charity'). The observance was continued in later days, and has not yet wholly disappeared, though the peculiar circumstances have vanished which gave propriety and emphasis to such an expression of brotherly love and Christian friendship.

KISSOS (Gr. κισσός), 'ivy,' is mentioned only once, and that in the Apocrypha (2 Maccab. vi. 7), where the Temple is described as being desecrated by the Gentiles, and the Jews forced to depart from the laws of their fathers: 'And when the feast of 301. Hedera helix.

Bacchus was kept, the Jews were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus, carrying ivy. The term κισσός or κισσός seems to have been applied by the Greeks in a general sense, and to have included many plants, and, among them, some climbers, as the convolvulus, besides the common ivy, which was especially dedicated to Bacchus, and which was distinguished by the name of 'Hedera poetica, Dionysia aut Bacchica, quod ex ea poetarum coronæ consenserunt.' It is well known that in the Dionysia, or festivals in honour of Dionysus, and in the processions called thiasoi, with which they were celebrated, women also took part, in the disguise of Bacchæ, Naiades, Nymphæ, etc., adorned with garlands of ivy, etc.: thus Ovid (Fasti, iii. 766):—

Cum hedera cincta est? hedera est gratissima Baccho.

Bacchus is generally thought to have been educated in India, and the Indian Bāghēs has been supposed to be the original of the name. The fact of Bāghēs being a compound of two words signifying tiger and master or lord, would appear to confirm the identity, since Bacchus is usually represented as drawn in his chariot by a tiger and a lion, and tigers, etc., are described as following him in his Indian journey. As the ivy, however, is not a plant of India, it might be objected to its being characteristic of an Indian god. But in the mountains which bound India to the north, both the ivy and the vine may be found, and the Greeks were acquainted with the fact that Mount Mero is the only part of India where ivy was produced. Indeed, Alexander and his companions are said to have crowned themselves with ivy in honour of Bacchus. The ivy, Hedera Helix, being a native of most parts of Europe, is too well known to require special notice.—J. F. R.

KITE. [AJAH; DAAB.]

KITHLISH (כִּתְלִישׁ; Μααχῶς; Alex. Χααλῶς; Cethlis), a town of Judah, situated in the Shephelah or plain of Philistia, and grouped with Lachish and Eglon (Josh. xv. 33-40). It appears to have stood in the plain between Eglon and Eleutheropolis, but the site has not been discovered.—J. L. P.

KITRON (קִּטְרוֹן; Sept. Κέδρων; Alex. Σεβρών; Cetron), one of the places from which the children of Zebulun did not drive out the Canaanites (Judg. i. 30). This place is not mentioned in Josh. xix. as among the possessions of Zebulun. Bertheau suggests (Exeg. Hdb., in loc.) that the word may be an erroneous reading for קִּטְרוֹן, mentioned Josh. xix. 15, and Rosenmüller proposes to identify it with the קִטָּה of the same passage; but all this is purely conjectural. 'In the Talmud (Meqillah, as quoted by Schwarz, 173), it is identified with Zippori, i.e., Sepphoris, now Seffurich' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, ii. 47). We can find no trace of any such identification in the tract referred to.—W. L. A.

KITTIM. [CHITTIM.]

KITTO, JOHN, was born at Plymouth, 4th November 1804. The circumstances of his birth were very unfavourable to his education, and at the age of twelve he met with an accident which destroyed his hearing for life, and reduced him almost to the condition of a deaf mute. Though he was the inmate of a poor and unhappy home, his juvenile energy rose above adversity; and the poor, hungry, and ragged boy strove to maintain himself, and pay for a few books from a small circulating library, by groping for old ropes and iron in Sutton-pool and selling them, and by painting rude labels for shop windows. On the 15th of November 1819 he was seized and sent to the Plymouth Workhouse for pity's sake. In this place his powerful will soon asserted his position against older and stronger boys, and here he began a diary which is still preserved, and large excerpts from which have been printed in his life. It contains many self-portraits, physical and mental, and shows the awakening of his mind to literary tastes and ambition. He learned shoemaking; but was often so dull and dispirited that he called himself 'John the Comfortless,' and twice had thoughts of bringing his life to a premature end. Some gentlemen at length took notice of him, and he removed to Exeter to work as a dentist with Mr. Groves. His spirit was now growing in pious fervour, and, disabled though he was, he longed to be a missionary. In July 1825 he removed for this purpose to the missionary college at Islington, and having learned, among other things, to print, he was sent out to Malta, but returned to England in infirm health in 1829. Mr. Groves, who was now preparing to go as a missionary to the East, took Kitto with him as a tutor to his boys, and the party arrived at Bagdad in December of the same year. During his residence in this city Kitto had experience of the sad results of war, plague, and inundation in succession. After four years' absence, and having passed through Trebizond and Constantinople on his return, he arrived in England in June 1833. Through the influence of friends, he at once set to work as a regular contributor to the Penny Magazine. One set of his papers bore the suggestive title of the 'Deaf Traveller.' The Pictorial Bible was commenced in the end of 1835. His experiences in the East gave him great delight in the work and some qualification for it, and it has passed through several editions. The Pictorial Bible was followed by the Fictorial History of Palestine and the Holy Land. After other smaller works had passed through his hands, the Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature was begun by him as editor, and brought to a conclusion in 1848. The present edition of it, formally the third edition, is, however, to a great extent a new work. Then Kitto projected the Journal of Sacred Literature, which, having passed through the hands of various editors, still holds its way. His last and most popular work was the Daily Bible Illustrations, completed in eight volumes. During its progress his health gave way, and through the kind assistance of some friends, he was enabled to retire to Canstatt, in Germany, where he died on the 25th of November 1854. Dr. Kitto's services to the cause of Scripture learning were great in his own sphere. He revived and freshened the study of Eastern manners, and his origination of this Cyclopædia marks an epoch in the Biblical literature of our country. His life itself, with his physical defect and early privations, was a marvel of self-education and heroic perseverance. The University of Giessen in 1844 gave him a theological diploma, though he was a layman. An interesting autobiography is contained in his Lost Senses.—J. E.

KLEUKER, JOH. FRIED., was born at Osterode 29th Oct. 1749, and died at Kiel 31st May 1827. He was successively prorector of the gymnasium at Lemgo, rector of a school at Osnabrück, and professor of Theology at Kiel. He devoted himself chiefly to Oriental studies. His works in the department of Biblical literature are—1. Salomo's Schriften, 3 vols., 1777-1785; and 2. Ausführl. Untersuchung. der Gründe für d. Aechtheit und Glaubwürdigkeit d. Schriftl. Urkunden des Christenthums, 5 vols., 1794-1800. These are inferior in importance to his works on Oriental literature and philosophy. His German translation of the Zendavesta, 3 vols. 4to, Riga 1776-78; his abridgment of the same, with relative essays and illustrations, Riga 1789; and his treatises Ueb. die Natur u. d. Ursprung der Emanationslehre bei der Kabbalisten, 1786, and Ueb. das Brahmanische Religionsystem, 1797, have placed his name high in the list of Orientalists.—W. L. A.

KNAPP, GEORG CHRISTIAN, was born Sept. 17, 1753, at Glaucha, near Halle, his father being director of the celebrated orphan asylum and educational institute founded in this town by A. H. Francke.* His studies were carried on first in the schools, and afterwards in the university of his native town. During a single session he studied at Göttingen. In 1777 he was appointed professor extraordinary of theology at Halle, and in 1782 was placed on the staff of ordinary professors. In 1785 he was also appointed, along with Niemeyer, to the directorate of the institution at Glaucha, and in the division of labour the superintendence of the Bible and Missionary department fell to his lot. The duties of these several offices he discharged with honour to himself and to the credit of his university during nearly half a century. He died Oct. 14, 1825. In theology he ranks amongst the expounders and defenders of a Biblical supranaturalism in opposition to the doctrines of the rationalistic school. Tholuck has described him as the latest offshoot of the old theological school of Halle. His Biblical works are—1. A translation of the book of Psalms, with comments, Die Psalmen übersetzt und mit Anmerkungen, Halle 1778, 8vo, 3d ed. 1789. 2. A very carefully edited and useful edition of the Greek Testament, Novum Testamentum graece recognovit atque insignioris lectionum varietatis et argumentorum notitiam subjunxit G. Ch. Knapp, Halle 1797, 4to; the last edition in 1829, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. Scripta varii argumenti maximam partem exegetica atque historica, Halle 1805, 8vo; a second and enlarged edition in 1823, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. The following dissertations—Ad vaticinium Jacobi, 1774; De versione Alexandrina in emendanda lectione exempli Hebraici caute adhibenda, Halle 1773, 1776.—S. N.

KNATCHBULL (Sir NORTON), Bart., the representative of an ancient family settled at Mer-sham Hatch, in Kent, born 1601, inherited his uncle's estates 1636, created a baronet 1641. He was a man of considerable erudition, and devoted himself with some success to the exposition of the N. T. In 1659 he gave to the world Animadversiones in Libro Novi Test., which speedily went through a considerable number of editions—a translation by himself, or under his superintendence, appearing at Cambridge, 1693. The original work was reprinted both at Amsterdam and Frankfort, at which latter place it formed part of the supplement to N. Gurtler's edition of Walton's Polyglot, 1695-1701. Knatchbull's remarks are sensible, and shew very fair learning; but they are entirely wanting in depth, and we cannot read them without wonder at the small amount of knowledge which procured for their author such a wide-spread reputation. He died in 1684, and was buried at Mer-sham, his epitaph styling him 'Criticorum Coryphaeus et Oraculum,' and attributing to him the eloquence of Cicero and Chrysostom, and the judgment of Varro and Jerome.—E. V.

KNEADING-TROUGH (כִּנְיָה). The word occurs four times in the Bible, Exod. viii. 3; xii. 34; Deut. xxviii. 5, 17. In the two former places it is translated 'kneading-trough' (margin, 'dough'); in the two latter (where it is joined with כִּנְיָה = 'basket') 'store.' The LXX. render it φύραμα, in which they are followed by Kimchi, and ἐγκατάλειμμα, as if from נָשָׂא, 'to remain over,' in which the Targum of Jerusalem, Jonathan, and Rashi, and the Vulgate, 'reliquiae ciborum tuorum,' agree. There can, however, be little doubt that our version is substantially correct, and that the word signifies the small wooden bowl still used by the Arabs for kneading and serving up their cakes, and which they carry about with them wrapped up in the long flowing haik or plaid worn by the Bedouins. Large kneading-troughs, such as are in use among ourselves, were unnecessary then as now in the East, where every family bakes the needful supply of cakes every day (Thevenot, Shaw, quoted by Harmer, Obs., vol. iv., pp. 366-370, Clarke's edition). Harmer, u. s., inclines to a kind of bag described by Pococke and Niebuhr, Voyage, i. 171, consisting of a piece of leather, drawn together by rings and chains, with a hook to hang it by, used by the Bedouins both as a table-cloth and as a wallet. But a wooden bowl was certainly used for kneading in Egypt—Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii. 386 [BREAD].—E. V.

KNIFE. The purposes for which knives are mentioned in Scripture as being used are—for the slaying of sacrifices (Gen. xxii. 6), for circumcision and other ritual purposes (Exod. iv. 25; Josh. v. 2, 3; 1 Kings xviii. 28; Ezra i. 9), for cutting in pieces a body (Judg. xix. 29), for shaving off the hair (Ezek. v. 1), and for mending pens and other purposes of the scribe (Jer. xxxvi. 23). Knives were also doubtless used in dividing into portions the animals sacrificed (Lev. viii. 15, 20, 25; ix. 13; Num. xviii. 18; 1 Sam. ix. 24, etc.) In the Talmudic Tract Tamid (4. 3) are detailed instructions for the cutting up of the victims. That they were also used at meals may be inferred—1. from the primary meaning of the common Hebrew word for knife כִּנְיָה, from נָשָׂא to eat; 2. from the allusions in Prov. xxx. 14; xxiii. 2; and 3. from the statement of Josephus (Antiq. xvii. 7, Bell. Jud. i. 33. 7) concerning the use of a knife for the paring of apples.

Of the shape and material of the knives used by the Hebrews we know little. The earliest knives were probably of flint or some other species of hard stone; hence the name צַר (Exod. iv. 25), and the combination חרב צר (Josh. v. 2; LXX., μαχαίρας περπivas ἐκ πέτρας ἀκροβου) and צר חרב (Ps. lxxxix. 44). But that metal knives were also used by them cannot be doubted. That the חרב, which signifies both sword and knife, was of metal, is shewn both from the uses to which it was put, and from the allusions to its shining (Nah. iii. 3; comp. Gen. iii. 24).

The probable form of the knives of the Hebrews will be best gathered from a comparison of those of other ancient nations, both Eastern and Western, which have come down to us. No. 1 represents the Roman culter used in sacrificing, which may be compared with No. 2, an Egyptian sacrificial knife. Nos. 3, 4, and 5 are also Egyptian knives, of which the most remarkable, No. 3, is from the Louvre collection; the others are from the Monumenti Reali of Rosellini. Nos. 6-9 are Roman from Barthelemy. In No. 7 we have probably the form of the pruning-hook of the Jews (מסרת), Is. xviii. 5), though some rather assimilate this to the sickle (פֶּלֶס). It was probably with some such instrument as No. 9 that the priests of Baal cut themselves.—W. L. A.

KNITTEL, FRANZ ANTON, successively archidiaconus, general superintendent, and consistorialrath at Wolfenbüttel, was born at Salzdahlum, 3d April 1721, and died at his residence, 13th April 1792. In 1756 he discovered in the library at Wolfenbüttel a MS. containing some fragments of the Epistle to the Romans in the Gothic version of Ulfilas. The MS. is a palimpsest, the newer surface being occupied with the Origines and some letters of Isidorus Hispalensis. The portions of the Gothic version of the Epistle to the Romans contained in it are ch. xi. 33-36; xii. 1-5, 17-21; xiii. 1-5; xiv. 9-20; xv. 3-13. These Knittel printed in a volume entitled Ulfila Versionem Gothicam nonnullorum capitum Ep. ad Rom. venerandum antiquitatis monumentum . . . e latina codicis ejusd. MSti rescripti . . . una cum variis variae litteraturae monumentis huc usque ineditis, etc. The text is printed on one side of the page in Gothic letters; under each word is Knittel's reading of it in italics; and under that a Latin translation of each. On the other side, there is a Latin version found in the Codex, under that the reading in the Vulgate, and under that the Greek text. The volume contains also two fragments from ancient Greek codices of the N. T. in the Wolfenbüttel library, and a copious critical commentary by Knittel. There are twelve plates, containing admirably-executed fac-similes of different codices; and among the notes is found an extract of considerable length from Otfried's Gospel-Harmony. The book is altogether a splendid one; but its literary merits are not quite equal to its sumptuous appearance. Knittel was not a man of large endowments, his knowledge of Gothic was imperfect, and he was too fond of the 'varia litteratura' (to use his own expression) to be very profound or exact in any one department of knowledge. He deserves, however, the praise of great laboriousness, and his honest endeavours to make his work worthy of the acceptance of scholars have enabled him to collect a vast amount of curious matter not elsewhere to be found. The volume bears no date, but it is usually referred to the year 1762 or 1763. It is now rare, and of the copies in the shops few have all the plates.—W. L. A.

KNOP, in the A. V., is the translation of two Hebrew words—1. כִּנּוֹר; LXX. σφαῖρα; Vulg. Sphaerula; Joseph. Antiq. iii. 6. 7, σφαῖρα. Ornaments on the stem and branches of the golden candlestick, Exod. xxv. 31, 36; xxxvii. 17-22. Their precise form is unknown, but it is evident that they were of a globular form, perhaps resembling pomegranates (Josephus speaks of πόταροι as well as σφαῖρα), or, with Bähr (Symbolik, i. 416), apples.

The word occurs again, Amos ix. 1; Zeph. ii. 14, where it is commonly rendered 'lintel,' the marginal reading, 'chapter or knop,' being more correct. It probably means the capital of a pillar in the form of a pomegranate or its flower.

2. פִּקְעִים, 1 Kings vi. 18; vii. 24; margin 'gourds,' architectural ornaments of a gourd shape (cf. פִּקְעִות, 2 Kings iv. 39, cucumeres asinini), on the cedar panelling of Solomon's temple, and beneath the brim of the 'molten sea.'—E. V.

KOÄ (קוֹעַ), a word occurring along with Pekod (פֶּקֶד) and Shoa (שׁוֹא) in the prophet's description of the lovers of Aholibah (Ezek. xxii. 23). The versions here differ very much. The LXX., according to the Vat. Codex., has φακοὺς καὶ Σοῦ καὶ Τχοῦ (in the last word uniting the preposition with the name); but the Cod. Alex. has καὶ φοῦδ καὶ σούδ και λούδ. The Chald. gives אִשְׁתִּי, אִשְׁתִּי, אִשְׁתִּי; the Syr. ܐܬܬܝܢ ܕܥܡܐܢܐ, Put, and Lud, and Kua. In these the words are taken as the names of places or peoples; and this view has been followed by Grotius, Junius, Ewald, and others. The Vulg., on the other hand, translates them as appellatives, 'nobiles tyrannosque et principes;' and this view most recent interpreters have followed. There is, however, some difference of opinion as to the meaning of the words. According to Jarchi, they are to be explained as מְלָכִים occurs here only, and has no affinity with any Hebrew word, unless it be קָה, to be strong or robust.

Michaelis (Supplem. ad Lex. Heb., p. 2175) compares the Arab. كاه (for كاه), a stallion; Hävernicks, the Syr. ܩܕܐ to cry, and ܩܕܐ shout, uproar; and Hitzig the Sansc. kara, lord, and the Turk. khan. There is something to be said in favour of the oldest opinion, that these words are names of places. In the Talmud and other Jewish writings, mention is made of a town, נְהַר־פְּקֹד, Nhar-Pqod, in Babylonia, where there was a great Jewish school, and the inhabitants of which are characterised by Rab in some verses (Fürst, Heb. u. Chald. H.-W.-B. s. v.) This may be the Pekod or Pqod of our passage. Then, in 1 Kings x. 28, it is said, that 'Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn,' etc. The word rendered 'linen yarn' here is מִקָּו, a word which nowhere else occurs in this sense, and regarding the meaning of which here the greatest uncertainty prevails. Gesenius translates the passage, 'And a company of the king's merchants brought [from Egypt] a company [of horses] at a price,' taking מִקָּו in the sense of troop or company; but the arrangement of the words in the parallel passage, 2 Chron. i. 16, is not favourable to this translation. The ancient versions regard this word as naming the place whence the horses were brought; the LXX. ἐκ Θεκουέ; Vulg. de Coa; Syr. ܩܕܐ ܕܥܡܐܢܐ, city of the Aphelites, Arab. cities of the South. The Vulg. may be right here, and Coa or Koa may be the name of some place known to the Jews.—W. L. A.

KOECHER, JOHANN CHRISTOPH, D.D., successively rector of the Gymnasium at Osnabrück, superintendent at Brunswick, and professor of theology at Jena, was born 23d April 1699, at Lobenstein, and died 21st September 1772, at Jena. Koecher published a continuation of Wolf's Curæ Philologica, under the title Analecta Philologica et Exegetica in Quatuor Evangelia, 4to, Altenburg 1766. 'It supplies,' says Orme, 'some of the desiderata of Wolf's work, and brings down the account of the sentiments of the modern writers on the gospels to the period of its publication' (Biblioth. Bib., p. 276).—W. L. A.

KOHATH (תִּרְקָה, assembly; Sept. Kadθ), son of Levi, and father of Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel (Gen. xlv. 11; Exod. vi. 18-22; 1 Chron. xxiii. 12). The descendants of Kohath formed one of the three great divisions of the Levitical tribe. This division contained the priestly family which was descended from Aaron, the son of Amram. In the service of the tabernacle, as settled in the wilderness, the Kohathites had the distinguished charge of bearing the ark and the sacred vessels (Exod. vi. 16; Num. iv. 4-6).—J. K.

KOPH (קֹפֶה; Gr. κήπος, κήπος; whence the Latinized name Cephus). In the Hebrew and Semitic cognate tongues, and in the classical languages, these names, under various modifications, designate the Simiadæ, including, no doubt, species of Cercopithecus, Macacus, and Cynocephalus, or Guenons, apes, and baboons; that is, all the animals of the quadrumanous order known to the Hebrews, Arabs, Egyptians, and the classical writers. Accordingly, we find Pliny and Solinus speaking of Ethiopian Cephi exhibited at Rome: and in the upper part of the celebrated Prænestine mosaic representing the inundation of the Nile, figures of Simiadæ occur in the region which indicates Nubia; among others, one in a tree, with the name KHIEN beside it, which may be taken for a Cercopithecus of the Guenon group. But in the triumphal procession of Thothmes III. at Thebes, nations from the interior of Africa, probably from Nubia, bear curiosities and tribute, among which the Camelopardalis or Giraffe and six quadrumana may be observed. The smallest and most effaced animals may be apes, but the others, and in particular the three figured and coloured from careful drawings, in Plate xxi. of Rosellini's work, are undoubtedly Macaci or Cynocephali, that is, species of the genus baboon, or baboon-like apes. Naturalists and commentators, not deterred by the interminable list of errors which the practice has occasioned, are often unnecessarily anxious to assign the names of animals noticed in Scripture and in the ancient classics, to species characterised by the moderns; although the original designations are to be taken in a familiar sense, and often extend even beyond a generic meaning. In the instance before us we have the futility of this practice fully exemplified; for Buffon presumed his Mona (Cercopithecus Mona) to be the Kebos of the Greeks, and not without plausibility, since the western Arabs, it seems, apply the word Moune to all long-tailed apes. Linnæus referred Cephus to his Simia Cephus, now Cercopithecus Cephus, or Moustache Guenon, of a different group; while Lichtenstein referred it to his Simia, or rather, as now arranged, Cercopithecus Diana. But as none of these are known to inhabit eastern Africa, it is more probable that the Keipen of the Prænestine mosaic is in reality the Cercopithecus Griseoviridis, or Grivet of Cuvier, which, with equal pretensions in regard to form, has the advantage of being a native of Ethiopia and Nubia, and belongs, with the two last mentioned, to the group which has been called Callitrix.

303. Apes from Rosellini's Monumenti dell' Egitto.

But these considerations do not serve to point out the Koph of Scripture; for that animal, named only twice (1 Kings x. 22, and 2 Chron. ix. 21), is in both cases associated with תוכים, Thoukium, perhaps erroneously rendered 'peacocks.' Now neither peacocks nor pheasants are indigenous in Africa: they belong to India and the mountains of high Asia, and therefore the version 'peacocks,' if correct, would decide, without doubt, not only that Koph denotes none of the Simiadae above noticed, but also that the fleet of Tarshish* visited India or the Australasian islands. Thoukium, apparently meaning crested, indicates birds, perhaps parrots, but cannot refer to the pintado or Guinea hen, the Numidia of naturalists and the Meleagris of the ancients; nor to the Pterocles or Sandgrouse, both being familiarly known in Upper Egypt, and the last mentioned, in particular, abundant in Arabia and Palestine. The interpretation proposed by Hase, which would convert Kophim into Succim—dwellers in caves—is inadmissible, such a description being quite inapplicable to long-tailed monkeys. Like the whole order of quadrumana, they are constituted not for troglodyte, but arboreal life, or to be dwellers in trees; baboons alone venturing beyond woody covers in steep rocky situations, and sometimes finding shelter in clefts. For these reasons we conclude that the Hebrew koph, and names of the same root, were, by the nations in question, used generically in some instances and specifically in others, though the species were not thereby defined, nor on that account identical.

Baboons, we have already shewn, were known to the Egyptians, and cannot well have escaped observation among the people of Palestine, since they resided close upon the great caravan-routes, which, as is well known, were frequented from the earliest antiquity by showmen exhibiting wild beasts. In Egypt, however, a baboon was the type of some abstract power in nature or in metaphysics; as such the animal was idolized, and figures of a cynocephalus were invariably placed on the summit of weighing-scales, where they still appear on the monuments.

If there be truth, as the following authorities show, in the existence of a large ape or baboon in 304. Macacus Arabicus.

Yemen, and even in Mesopotamia, the untractable and brutal character of the whole genus would be sufficient to sanction the Arabic name Saadan, and the Hebrew שדים, Sadim; which indicate the satyrs of the desert, noticed in Mr. Rich's Memoir on the Ruins of Babylon, p. 30, where they are denominated Sied Assad, and described as found in woody places near Semana, on the Euphrates. Thus we have the שערין, Scirim, or 'hairy ones' of Lev. xvii. 7, in accordance with Pliny, who conceived satyrs to be large apes. In the Prænestine mosaic, before quoted, a baboon is figured which, we are assured, had the name CATYPOC, or Satyros, by its side.* The only species of ape of the baboon form known in Arabia is the Mocko of Edwards, noticed in our illustrated series of drawings as Macacus Arabicus, a species nearly allied to Cynocephalus Hamadryas on the one hand, and to Mac. Silenus on the other—all three powerful, fierce, and libidinous animals. Mac. Arabicus may ultimately prove to be a true baboon, and the same as Simia cynomolgus of Hasselquist. It is a remarkable species for stature and aspect, having the dog-like nose and approximating eyes of baboons; the skin of the face of a reddish colour; the snout, lips, and chin black; the forehead low, and the sides of the head furnished with bushy, long, white hair; the breast, arms, and shoulders similarly covered, but the loins and lower extremities of a fine chestnut; the tail of the same colour, of no great length, tufted at the end, and all the hands black. It is found from the straits of Babel-Mandeb, through Southern Arabia to the Euphrates, and even beyond the junction of that river with the Tigris. Like other large and formidable Simiadae, it is less solicitous about the vicinity of trees, because it is armed with powerful canines; holds its enemy firmly grasped, and fights, not singly, but assisted by the whole troop: it frequents scrubby underwood near water, but becomes more rare eastward of Yemen.† Comparing the characters of this species, we find it by configuration, colours, and manners, peculiarly adapted to the purposes of idolatry in its grossest and most debasing aspect. The Hebrew people, already familiar with a similar worship in Egypt, may have copied the native tribes in the wilderness, and thus drawn upon themselves the remonstrance in Lev. xvii. 7, where the allusion to these animals is very descriptive, as is that in Is. xiii. 21; and again, xxxiv. 14, where the image is perfect, when we picture to ourselves the 'hairy ones' lurking about the river in the juniper and liquorice jungle, as described by Mr. Rich.

It is not unlikely that the baboon idol may have had goat's horns, since we find the same attribute on rams' heads in Egypt; on lions' heads on coins of Tarsus, and on horses' and elephants' heads on medals of Syrian kings. The Greek mythologists, ignorant of the baboon figure, may have preferred an imaginary compound of man and goat to that of the cynocephalus, which they confounded with the hyæna, or, in their love of ideal beauty, may have considered it too disgusting even for an idol. Perhaps the most ancient form of the Arabian Urolalt was that of a baboon, male or female, the name apparently having some reference to red, and to the Indian monkey-worship (see Gesner, s. v. 'Hyæna'). Urolalt and monkey-worship are connected with a solar mythus.—C. H. S.

KOPHER, or CIPHER (כֹּפֶר), occurs twice in the Song of Solomon (i. 14; iv. 13), and is in both places translated camphire in the A. V. It has been supposed to indicate a bunch of grapes (Botrus kopher), also camphor. The word camphire is the old mode of spelling camphor, but this substance does not appear to have been known to ancient commerce; at least we cannot adduce any proof that it was so. The word Kopher is certainly very like Kafoor, the Eastern name for camphor, but it also closely resembles the Greek κῦρος, or Kypros, usually written Cypros. Indeed, as has been observed, it is the same word, with the Greek pronunciation and termination. The κῦρος of the Greeks is, no doubt, the Lawsonia inermis of botanists, and is described by Dioscorides (i. 125) and by Pliny (xii. 24). There is reason to regard the Cypros as the plant called by the Arabs hinna, and as this is known to be the Lawsonia inermis, we conclude the Cyprus to be the same. This identity is now universally acknowledged: the Kypros, therefore, must have been Lawsonia inermis, as the Hinna of the Arabs is well known to be. If we examine the works of Oriental travellers and naturalists, we shall find that this plant is universally esteemed in Eastern countries, and appears to have been so from the earliest times, both on account of the fragrance of its flowers, and the colouring properties of its leaves.

Thus Rauwolf, when at Tripoli (Travels, iv.), 'found there another tree, not unlike unto our privet, by the Arabians called Alkana, or Henna, and by the Grecians, in their vulgar tongue, Schenna, which they have from Egypt, where, but above all in Cayre, they grow in abundance. The Turks and Moors nurse these up with great care and diligence, because of their sweet-smelling flowers. They also, as I am informed, keep their leaves all winter, which leaves they powder and mix with the juice of citrons, and stain therewith against great holidays the hair and nails of their children of a red colour, which colour may perhaps be seen with us on the manes and tails of Turkish horses: see also Belon (ii. 74). This custom of dyeing the nails and the palms of the hands and soles of the feet, of an iron-rust colour, with henna, exists throughout the East, from the Mediterranean to the Ganges, as well as in Northern Africa. In some parts the practice is not confined to women and children, but is also followed by men, especially in Persia. In dyeing the beard, the hair is turned to red by this application, which is then changed to black by a preparation of indigo. In dyeing the hair of children, and the tails and manes of horses and asses, the process is allowed to stop at the red colour which the henna produces. In reference to this universal practice of the East, Dr. Harris observes that 'the expression in Deut. xxi. 12, 'pare her nails,' may perhaps rather mean 'adorn her nails,' and imply the antiquity of this practice. This is a universal custom in Egypt, and not to conform to it would be considered indecent. It seems to have been practised by the ancient Egyptians, for the nails of the mummies are most commonly of a reddish hue.' Seeing, then, that the henna is so universally admired in the East, both on account of the fragrance of its flowers and the dye yielded by its leaves, and as there is no doubt that it is the κῦρος of the Greeks, and as this word is so similar to the kopher of the Hebrews, there is every probability of this last being the henna of the Arabs, Lawsonia alba of botanists.—J. F. R.

KOPPE, JOHANN BENJAMIN, was born at Dantz, Aug. 19, 1750. He received his early education in the gymnasium of his native city, and distinguished himself there by his rapid progress information in the text is derived from an officer who was in the Honourable East India Company's surveying service.

In Greek and Hebrew. During the two years 1769-71 he studied at Leipzig, and during the following two years at Göttingen. In the former university he was aided by Ernesti, and in the latter by Heyne, in the study of the Greek language. In 1774 he was appointed, at the recommendation of Heyne, to the chair of Greek in the recently formed gymnasium of Mittau. In 1776 he was called to a chair of theology in Göttingen, to which were shortly afterwards added the offices of preacher to the university, and director of the seminary for preachers (Prediger-seminarium). In 1784 he was invited to Gotha, and to the high offices of superintendent-general, counsellor of the superior consistory, and chief pastor. In 1788 he was appointed preacher to the Court, and counsellor of the consistory at Hanover. He died in his forty-first year, Feb. 12, 1791. Koppe is chiefly known by the edition of the N. T., which he projected under the title: Novum Testamentum græce perpetua annotatione illustratum. The first volume, containing the epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, and Thessalonians, was published in 1778, and was intended to exhibit the plan of the entire work. It contained a corrected text, the more important various readings, prolegomena, philological notes, and excursus on those passages and phrases which needed a more lengthened discussion. His purpose, as explained in the preface, was to supply the Biblical student with the same kind of assistance towards the determination of the grammatical sense of the writings of the N. T., as was provided for the classical student in the better editions of the Greek and Roman authors. Accordingly, he abstained from all doctrinal discussions, and laboured chiefly to illustrate the phraseology, to explain historical and archaeological references, and to exhibit the order of the writer's thoughts. Koppe's early death prevented the completion of his purpose. A second volume, containing the Epistle to the Romans, appeared in 1783. This was intended to be the fourth volume, and the former the sixth of the entire work, which he purposed to complete in eight volumes. Since the death of Koppe new editions of these two volumes have been published, that on Galatians, Ephesians, and Thessalonians, in 1823, under the editorship of T. C. Tychsen, and that on the Romans in 1824, by C. F. Ammon. In both cases the additional notes are carefully distinguished. Several other volumes have at different periods been contributed towards the completion of the work by J. H. Heinrichs and D. J. Pott, those edited by the former containing the Acts of the Apostles, Philippians, Colossians, Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Hebrews, and the Apocalypse; those published by the latter containing I Corinthians, chap. i.-x., and the Catholic Epistles. Koppe was also the author of a translation, with notes, of Lowth on Isaiah: D. Robert Lowth's Jesais neu übersetzt; nebst einer Einleitung und kritischen, philologischen und erläuternden Anmerkungen. Aus dem Engl. mit Zusätzen und Anmerkungen, Leipzig 1779-90, 3 vols. 8vo; and of several dissertations and programmata, most of which are contained in the Sylloge Commentt. Theoll. of Pott and Ruperti.—S. N.

KORAH (כֹּרֵחַ, ice; Sept. Koré, in the A. V. of Jude 11, Core), a Levite, son of Izhar, the brother of Amram, the father of Moses and Aaron, who were therefore cousins to Korah (Exod. vi.

21). From this near relationship we may, with tolerable certainty, conjecture, that the source of the discontent which led to the steps afterwards taken by this unhappy man, lay in his jealousy that the high honours and privileges of the priesthood, to which he, who remained a simple Levite, might, apart from the divine appointment, seem to have had as good a claim, should have been exclusively appropriated to the family of Aaron. When to this was added the civil authority of Moses, the whole power over the nation would seem to him to have been engrossed by his cousins, the sons of Amram. Under the influence of these feelings he organized a conspiracy, for the purpose of redressing what appeared to him the evil and injustice of this arrangement. Dathan, Abiram, and On, the chief persons who joined him, were of the tribe of Reuben; but he was also supported by many more from other tribes, making up the number of 250, men of name, rank, and influence, all who may be regarded as representing the families of which they were the heads. The private object of Korah was apparently his own aggrandizement, but his ostensible object was the general good of the people; and it is perhaps from want of attention to this distinction that the transaction has not been well understood. The design seems to have been made acceptable to a large body of the nation, on the ground that the first-born of Israel had been deprived of their sacerdotal birthright in favour of the Levites, while the Levites themselves announced that the priesthood had been conferred by Moses (as they considered) on his own brother's family, in preference to those who had equal claims; and it is easy to conceive that the Reubenites may have considered the opportunity a favourable one for the recovery of their birthright—the double portion and civil pre-eminence—which had been forfeited by them and given to Joseph. These are the explanations of Aben-Ezra, and seem as reasonable as any which have been offered.

The leading conspirators, having organized their plans, repaired in a body to Moses and Aaron, boldly charged them with their usurpations, and required them to lay down their ill-gotten power. Moses no sooner heard this than he fell on his face, confounded at the enormity of so outrageous a revolt against a system framed so carefully for the benefit of the nation. He left the matter in the Lord's hands, and desired them to come on the morrow, provided with censers for incense, that the Lord himself, by some manifest token, might make known his will in this great matter. As this order was particularly addressed to the rebellious Levites, the Reubenites left the place, and when afterwards called back by Moses, returned a very insolent refusal, charging him with having brought them out of the land of Egypt under false pretences, 'to kill them in the wilderness.'

The next day Korah and his company appeared before the tabernacle, attended by a multitude of people out of the general body of the tribes. Then the Shekinah, or symbol of the divine presence, which abode between the cherubim, advanced to the entrance of the sacred fabric, and a voice therefrom commanded Moses and Aaron to stand apart, lest they should share in the destruction which awaited the whole congregation. On hearing these awful words the brothers fell on their faces, and, by strong intercession, moved the Lord to confine his wrath to the leaders in the rebellion.

and spare their unhappy dupes. The latter were then ordered to separate themselves from their leaders, and from the tents in which they dwelt. The terrible menace involved in this direction had its weight, and the command was obeyed; and after Moses had appealed to what was to happen as a proof of the authority by which he acted, the earth opened, and received and closed over the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. The Reubenite conspirators were in their tents, and perished in them; and at the same instant Korah and his 250, who were offering incense at the door of the tabernacle, were destroyed by a fire which 'came out from the Lord;' that is, most probably, in this case, from out of the cloud in which his presence dwelt. The censers which they had used were afterwards made into plates, to form an outer covering to the altar, and thus became a standing monument of this awful transaction (Num. xvi.) On, although named in the first instance along with Dathan and Abiram, does not further appear either in the rebellion or its punishment. It is hence supposed that he repented in time: and Abendana and other Rabbinical writers allege that his wife prevailed upon him to abandon the cause.

It might be supposed from the Scripture narrative that the entire families of the conspirators perished in the destruction of their tents. Doubtless all who were in the tents perished; but as the descendants of Korah afterwards became eminent in the Levitical service, it is clear that his sons were spared. They were probably living in separate tents, or were among those who sundered themselves from the conspirators at the command of Moses. There is no reason to suppose that the sons of Korah were children when their father perished.—J. K.

KORAHITE, KORHITE, or KORATHITE (קֹרַחִי; Sept. υἱὸς [δῆμιος, γερερεῖς] Κορέ; Vulg. Coritæ), a descendant of Korah, used of those who are usually called sons of Korah. To them was assigned an important part in the conducting of the temple music, Heman himself being a descendant of Korah (1 Chron. vi. 31-37). They had also the office of keeping the door in the temple assigned to them (1 Chron. ix. 17-19, 22-29; Jer. xxxv. 4). The appointment of the Korahites to this office dated from the time of David (1 Chron. xxvi. 1, ff.) One of their number, Mattithiah, had charge over the things that were made in the pans (1 Chron. ix. 31).

Of the Psalms, several (xlii., xlix., lxxiv., lxxv., lxxvii., lxxviii.) are inscribed 'for the sons of Korah.' Whether this implies that they were the composers of these Psalms, or merely that they received them to set them to music, or to sing them in the temple service, is matter of dispute [PSALMS]. These Psalms are marked by peculiar elevation of sentiment and poetical power.—W. L. A.

KOTZ or KOZ (קֹז) occurs in several passages of Scripture; in two of which it is mentioned along with dardar, where kos and dardar may be considered equivalent to the English thorns and thistles. The Septuagint translates it in all the passages by ἄκανθα, and it probably was used in a general sense to denote plants which were thorny, useless, and indicative of neglected culture or deserted habitations, growing naturally in desert situations, and useful only for fuel. But if any particular plant be meant, the Ononis spinosa or 'Rest-harrow,' mentioned by Hasselquist, may be selected as fully characteristic. 'Spinosissima illa et perniciosissima

KRAUSE, FRIED. AUG. WILH., doctor in philosophy and private teacher at Vienna, was born at Dobrilugk in 1767, and died 24th March 1827. He published Pauli ad Corinthios epistolæ Gr., perpetua annotatione illustratæ, vol. i., Franc. ad Moen. 1792; intended as a continuation of Koppe's New Testament, but never carried further. He had previously published Die Briefe an die Philipp. und Thessal. übersetzt und mit Anmerk. begleitet, Frankf. 1790.—W. L. A.

KRAUSE, JOH. FRIED., D.D., successively diakonus in Reichenbach, domprediger at Naumburg, and professor of theology at Königsberg, was born at Reichenbach 26th October 1770, and died 31st March 1820. His Biblical writings consist of several academical programmes, two on the epistle of the Philippians, one on the 1st epistle of Peter, and four on the 2d epistle to the Corinthians. These, with some discussions pertaining to philosophy and theology, were collected by him and issued together under the title Opuscula Theologica, sparsim edita collegit, ineditisque auxit, etc., Regiom. 1818.—W. KREBS (JOH. FRED.), born at Bayreuth, March 5, 1651; studied at Jena; became rector of the gymnasium at Heilsbrunn in 1675, where he afterwards filled the posts of professor of theology and Hebrew, and Inspector; and died August 16, 1721. He was a copious writer, his works filling five closely-printed columns in Adelung. They embrace natural and moral philosophy, historical and political science, and theology. His only direct contribution to Biblical literature is a work on the first five chapters of Genesis, illustrated from the Syriac, Chaldee, Persian, Æthiopic, and other Oriental languages.—E. V.

KREBS (JOH. TOBIAS), born at Buttelsstadt in 1718. From his twentieth year he studied theology and philology under J. A. Ernesti at Leipsic, where, in 1740, he became Magister, and read lectures on the N. T. He died in 1782, rector of the Fürstenschule at Grimma. He was the compiler of two works of considerable value for the illustration of the facts and language of the N. T., De usu et præstantia Romane Historie in N. T. interpretatione, Lips. 1745; Observationes in N. T. e Flavio Joseph., Lips. 1755. The latter contains a rich collection of examples of the peculiarities of N. T. phraseology.—E. V.

KRINON (κρινον). This plant is mentioned in the well-known and beautiful passage (Matt. vi. 28): 'Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these;' so also in Luke xii. 27. Here it is evident that the plant alluded to must have been indigenous or grown wild, in the vicinity of the Sea of Galilee, must have been of an ornamental character, and, from the Greek term κρινον being applied to it, of a liliaceous nature. The name κρινον occurs in the old Greek writers. Theophrastus uses it, and is supposed by Sprengel to apply it to species of Narcissus and to Lilium candidum. Dioscorides indicates two species, but very imperfectly: one of them is supposed to be the Lilium candidum, and the other, with a reddish flower, may be L. martagon, or L. chalcedonicum. He alludes more particularly to the lilies of Syria and of Pamphylia being well suited for making the ointment of lily. Pliny enumerates three kinds—a white, a red, and a purple-coloured lily. Travellers in Palestine mention that in the month of January the fields and groves everywhere abound with various species of lily, tulip, and narcissus. Benard noticed, near Acre, on Jan. 18th, and about Jaffa, on the 23d, tulips, white, red, blue, etc. Gumpenberg saw the meadows of Galilee covered with the same flowers on the 31st. Tulips figure conspicuously among the flowers of Palestine, varieties probably of Tulipa gesneriana (Kitto's Palestine, p. ccxv.) So Pococke says, 'I saw many tulips growing wild in the fields (in March), and any one who considers how beautiful those flowers are to the eye, would be apt to conjecture that these are the lilies to which Solomon in all his glory was not to be compared.' This is much more likely to be the plant intended than some others which have been adduced, as, for instance, the scarlet amaryllis, having white flowers with bright purple streaks, found by Salt at Adowa. Others have preferred the Crown imperial, which is a native of Persia and Cashmere. Most authors have united in considering the white lily, Lilium candidum, to be the plant to which our Saviour referred; but it is doubtful whether it has ever been found in a wild state in Palestine. Some, indeed, have thought it to be a native of the new world. Dr. Lindley, however, in the Gardeners' Chronicle (ii. 744), says, 'This notion cannot be sustained, because the white lily occurs in an engraving of the Annunciation, executed somewhere about 1480 by Martin Schongauer; and the first voyage of Columbus did not take place till 1492. In this very rare print the lily is represented as growing in an ornamental vase, as if it were cultivated as a curious object.' This opinion is confirmed by a correspondent at Aleppo (Gardeners' Chronicle, iii. 429), who has resided long in Syria, but is acquainted only with the botany of Aleppo and Antioch: 'I never saw the white lily in a wild state, nor have I heard of its being so in Syria. It is cultivated here on the roofs of the houses in pots as an exotic bulb, like the daffodil.' In consequence of this difficulty, the late Sir J. E. Smith was of opinion that the plant alluded to under the name of lily was the Amaryllis lutea (now Oporanthus luteus), 'whose golden liliaceous flowers in autumn afford one of the most brilliant and gorgeous objects in nature, as the fields of the Levant are overrun with them; to them the expression of Solomon, in all his glory, not being arrayed like one of them, is peculiarly appropriate.' Dr. Lindley conceives, 'it to be much more probable that the plant intended by our Saviour was the Ixiolirion montanum, a plant allied to the amaryllis, of very great beauty, with a slender stem, and clusters of the most delicate violet flowers, abounding in Palestine, where Col. Chesney found it in the most brilliant profusion' (l. c., p. 744). In reply to this, a correspondent furnishes an extract of a letter from Dr. Bowring, which throws a new light upon the subject: 'I cannot describe to you with botanical accuracy the lily of Palestine. I heard it called by the title of Lilia syriaca, and I imagine under this title its botanical characteristics may be hunted out. Its colour is a brilliant red; its size about half that of the common tiger lily. The white lily I do not remember to have seen in any part of Syria. It was in April and May that I observed my flower, and it was most abundant in the district of Galilee, where it and the Rhododendron (which grew in rich abundance round the paths) most strongly excited my attention.' On this Dr. Lindley observes, 'It is clear that neither the white lily, nor the Oporanthus luteus, nor Ixiolirion, will answer to Dr. Bowring's description, which seems to point to the Chalcedonian or scarlet martagon lily, formerly called the lily of Byzantium, found from the Adriatic to the Levant, and which, with its scarlet turban-like flowers, is indeed a most stately and striking object' (Gardeners' Chronicle, ii. 854). As this lily (the Lilium chalcedonicum of botanists) is in flower at the season of the year when the sermon on the Mount is supposed to have been spoken, is indigenous in the very locality, and is conspicuous, even in the garden, for its remarkable showy flowers, there can now be little doubt that it is the plant alluded to by our Saviour.—J. F. R.

KROCHMAL, NACHMAN B. SHALMON, born in Brody, Feb. 18, 1780, and died in Tarnopol, July 31, 1840. This erudite critic and eminent Hebraist was the first among the Jews who, with a rare sagacity and independency of mind, investigated the Hebrew Scriptures, in order to ascertain the origin, unity, and date of each book, as well as to characterise its peculiarity of style and language, irrespective of the fixed traditional opinions held alike by the synagogue and the church about the authors and ages of the respective canonical volumes. He, however, published very little in his lifetime, but immediately after his death four treatises of his appeared in the Hebrew Annual, called Kerem Chemed, vol. v., Prag 1841, p. 51 ff., on The Sacred Antiquities and their Import (קדמוניות קדש והכנות). i. On the age of the comforting promises in the second part of Isaiah, chap. xl.-lxvi. (זמן)

(בבואות הנחמות שבחלק שני מספר ישעיה, in which he tries to demonstrate the late date of this part of the volume, and to show that Ibn Ezra was of the same opinion, only that he veiled it in enigmatical language [IBN EZRA]. ii. On the date and composition of Ezra and Chronicles, with an investigation of the ancient statement on this subject contained in the Talmud, Baba Bathra, 14, b (על דבר בריתא); which is very important. He tries to trace and analyse the different parts of which these books are composed, and to shew that they extend to the destruction of the Persian empire. iii. On the date and composition of Ezekiel, the Minor Prophets, Daniel, and Esther, with an examination of the ancient statement on this subject contained in the same passage of the Talmud (בבאור פסוקא), (אחרית הבאה בבריתא הזכורה), which is still more important, inasmuch as Krochmal shews here what is meant by the Great Synagogue, and tries to demonstrate, that some portions of the Minor Prophets belong to the period of the Greek empire.

iv. On Origin and date of Ecclesiastes (ספר קהלת), (זמן חבורו מחברו וגו'), in which he shews, that it is the latest composition in the canon. The learned Dr. Leopold Zunz, to whom Hebrew scholars are so much indebted for some of the most masterly treatises on Hebrew literature, has edited a work which Krochmal has left behind him, entitled, More Neboche Ha-Seman, Leopoli 1851, which is a treasury of criticisms on Jewish philosophy, Biblical literature, and sacred antiquities.—C. KUINOEL, CHRISTIANUS THEOPHILUS (KÜHNÖL, CHRISTIAN GOTTLIEB), was born at Leipzig, Jan. 2, 1768. His father was archdeacon of the church of St. Thomas. His education was commenced in the school of St. Thomas, and from thence he proceeded to the university of his native city. After taking the double degree of D.D. and Ph. D., he commenced, by the advice of Wolf, to deliver, as a privat-docent, courses of lectures on Greek and Latin Philosophy, and on Biblical Exegesis. In 1790 he was appointed extraordinary professor of philosophy, and in 1796 preacher at St. Paul's, the university church. His reputation as a Hellenist brought him, in 1799, an invitation to the Greek chair in Copenhagen, but not wishing to leave Germany, he declined to accede to it. Two years afterwards he was appointed to the chair of Poetry and Eloquence in the university of Giessen, and in 1806 to one of the theological chairs. He died at Giessen, Oct. 15, 1841. He was a man greatly beloved by his students, and distinguished by the power of securing the strong attachment of persons of various sentiments. His published works are numerous. Of those which are devoted to the elucidation of the Scriptures, the following are the most important:—1. Commentarius in Libros Novi Testamenti Historicis, Lips. 1807-18, 4 vols. 8vo. A fourth edition of vol. i. was published in 1837, and of vol. ii. in 1843; of vol. iii. the last edition (the third) appeared in 1825, and of vol. iv. a second edition in 1827. 2. Hosæ Oracula Hebr. et Lat. perpetua annotatione illustrata, Lips. 1792, 8vo. Kuinoel had previously published in 1789 a translation of Hosea into German. 3. Messianische Weissagungen des Alten Testaments übersetzt und erläutert, Leip. 1792, 8vo. 4. Observationes ad Novum Testamentum ex libris Apocryphis Veteris Testamenti, Lips. 1794, 8vo. 5. Pericopæ Evangelicæ, Lips. 1796-97, 2 vols. 8vo. 6. Die Psalmen metrisch übersetzt mit Anmerkungen, Leip. 1799, 8vo. 7. Spicilegium observationum in Epistolam Jacobi, Lips. 1807. 8. Commentarius in Epistolam ad Hebræos, Lips. 1831, 8vo. Kuinoel's Commentaries are still valuable for the stores of philological learning which they contain, but are wanting in spiritual insight.—S. N.

KUSSEMETH (כִּסְמֶת) occurs in three places of Scripture. In the A. V. it is translated rye in Exod. ix. 32; Is. xxviii. 25; and fitches in Ezek. iv. 9; but its true meaning still remains uncertain. It was one of the cultivated grains both of Egypt and of Syria, and one of those employed as an article of diet. It was also sown along with wheat, or, at least, its crop was in the same state of forwardness; for we learn from Exod. ix. 32, that in the seventh plague the hail-storm smote the barley which was in the ear, and the flax which was balled; but that the wheat and the kussemeth were not smitten, for they were not grown up. Respecting the wheat and the barley, we know that they are often sown and come to maturity in different months. Thus Forskal says, 'Hordeum cum mense Februario maturatur, triticum ad finem Martii persistit' (Flora Egypt., p. 43). The events above referred to probably took place in February (vid. Pict. Bible). That kussemeth was cultivated in Palestine we learn from Is. xxviii. 25, where it is mentioned along with ketzah (nigella) and cumin, wheat and barley; and sown, according to some translators, 'on the extreme border of the fields,' as a kind of fence for other kinds of corn. This is quite an Oriental practice, and may be seen in the case of flax and other grains in India, at the present day. The rye is a grain of cold climates, and is not cultivated even in the south of Europe. Korte declares (Travels, p. 168) that no rye grows in Egypt; and Shaw states (p. 351) that rye is little known in Barbary and Egypt (Rosenmüller, p. 76). That the kussemeth was employed for making bread by the Hebrews we know from Ezek. iv. 9, where the prophet is directed to 'take wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentiles, and millet, and kussemeth, and put them in a vessel, and make bread thereof.'

Though it is very unlikely that kussemeth can mean rye, it is not easy to say what cultivated grain it denotes. The principal kinds of grain, it is to be observed, are mentioned in the same passages with the kussemeth. Celsius has, as usual, 308. Triticum spelta.

with great learning and labour, collected together the different translations which have been given of this difficult word. In the Arabic translation of Exod. ix. 32, it is rendered julban: 'cicercula, non circula, ut perperam legitur in versione Latina.' By other Arabian writers it is considered to mean peas, and also beans. Many translate it vicia, or vetches, as in the A. V. of Exod. ix. 32; for according to Maimonides (ad Tr. Shabb., xx. 3), carschinin is a kind of legume, which in the Arabic is called kirsana, but in the sacred language kussemeth. Both julban and kirsana mean species of pulse, but it is not easy to ascertain the specific kinds. The majority, however, instead of a legume, consider kussemeth to indicate one of the cereal grains, as the rye (secale), or the oat (avena), neither of which is it likely to have been. These have probably been selected because commentators usually adduce such grains as they themselves are acquainted with, or have heard of as commonly cultivated. Celsius, however, informs us that in the Syriac and Chaldean versions kussemeth is translated kunta; far in the Latin Vulgate; far aduncum, Guisio, Tract. Peah, viii. 5, and Tract. Chila'im, i. 1; šea in the Septuagint, Is. xxviii. Aquila, Symmachus, and others, render it spelta. So Ben Melech, on Exod. ix., and Ezek. iv., says 'kyssemeth, vulgo spelta,' and the Septuagint has δλupa. Upon which Celsius remarks: 'all these—that is, kunta, far, ador, šea, spelta, and δλupa—are one and the same thing.' This he proves satisfactorily by quotations from the ancient authors (l. c. ii. 100). Dr. Harris states that the word kussemeth seems to be derived from casam, 'to have long hairs;' and that hence a bearded grain must be intended;

which confirms the probability of Spelt being the true meaning.

Dioscorides has stated (ii. 111), that there are two kinds of Zeā, one simple, and the other called dicoccos. Sprengel concludes that this is, without doubt, the Triticum Spelta of botanists; that the olyra was a variety which Host has called Triticum Zea; and also that the simple kind is the Triticum monococcon. That these grains were cultivated in Egypt and Syria, and that they were esteemed as food in those countries, may also be satisfactorily proved. Thus Herodotus states that the Egyptians employ olyra, which others call zea, as an article of diet. Pliny (Hist. Nat. xviii. 8) mentions it as found both in Egypt and in Syria: 'Ægypto autem ac Syriæ, Cilicique et Asiæ, ac Græciæ peculiaries, zea, olyra, tiphe.' So in more modern times: 'In Ægypto zeam abunde nasci refert Dapperus descriptione Asiæ, p. 130. Et Monachos circa Jordanem, pane δλupτην vesci, scribit Johannes Phocas de Locis Syr. et Palæstinae, p. 34' (Cels. l. c. 100). That it was highly esteemed by the ancients is evident from Dioscorides describing it as more nourishing than barley, and grateful in taste. Pliny also (xviii. 11) says: 'Ex zea pulcrius, quam ex tritico fit granum;' and Salmasio: 'quod lautior panis ex zea quam ex tritico fieret.' The goodness of this grain is also implied from the name of semen having been especially applied to it (C. Bauhin, Pinox, p. 22).

Triticum Spelta, or Spelt, is in many respects so closely allied to the common wheats as to have been thought by some old authors to have been the original stock of the cultivated kinds; but for this there is no foundation, as the kind cultivated for ages in Europe does not differ from specimens collected in a wild state. These were found by a French botanist, Michaux, in Persia, on a mountain four days' journey to the north of Hamadan. It is cultivated in many parts of Germany, in Switzerland, in the south of France, and in Italy. It is commonly sown in spring, and collected in July and August. Though some circumstances seem to point to this species as the kussemeth of Scripture, the subject is still susceptible of further investigation, and can only be finally determined by first ascertaining the modern agriculture of eastern countries, and comparing it with the ancient accounts of the agriculture of Syria and Egypt.—J. F. R.

KÜSTER, LUDOLPH, one of the ablest Greek scholars of his day, born at Blomberg in Westphalia, Feb. 1670, and educated by his elder brother at the Joachim College at Berlin. His ability as a student attracted the notice of Spanheim, who became his patron, and by whose influence he obtained the reversion of a professorship in the college. While waiting for a vacancy he visited many of the chief seats of learning in Europe, consulting libraries, examining and collating MSS., and cultivating the society of scholars. His long-expected chair proved anything but a position of comfort, so after holding it about a year he gave up the post in disgust, and retired to Amsterdam. Having removed to Paris, where he joined the Romish Church, he was brought to the notice of Louis XIV. by the Abbé Bignon, and was rewarded with a handsome pension and admission into the Academy of Inscriptions. He was planning new and important works when he was carried off by an abscess in the liver, October 12, 1716, before he had completed his forty-seventh year. Besides his edition of Suidas, which though able was too hasty, and left much for future editors, and his contributions to the Thesaurus of Grævius and Gronovius under the homonym of Neocorus (the Greek translation of Küster = Sacristan), he was the author of many classical treatises, especially that on the Middle Verb. His claim to a place in a Biblical cyclopædia rests on his edition of Mill's Greek Testament, published at Rotterdam 1710. The title-page describes his part in the work, 'Collectionem Millianam recensuit, meliori ordine disposuit, novisque accessionibus locupletavit.' His additions consist of the various readings of twelve MSS., of which the most important is the Codex Boernerianus, afterwards admirably edited by Matthæi. The edition also contains a preface by Küster, and a letter of Le Clerc's, discussing a number of various readings, of some historical interest. According to Tregelles, it is usually considered inferior in accuracy to Mill's original edition.—E. V.

KYPKE, GEORG DAVID, a learned German Orientalist, was born at Neukirk, in Pomerania, Oct. 23, 1724. He studied at Königsberg and Halle, and at the latter university took a degree in philosophy in 1744. In 1746 he was appointed professor extraordinary of Oriental languages at Königsberg, and in 1755 ordinary professor of the same. He died May 28, 1779. He was the author of several works intended to aid in the study of the Hebrew and Chaldee languages, and published at different times numerous programmata on various passages of the O. T. In addition to these he was the author of the following useful work: Observationes Sacrae in Novi Fœderis libros ex auctoribus græcis et antiquitatibus, Vratislav 1755, 2 vols. 8vo.—S. N.

LAANAH (לֶאֱנָה), translated wormwood, occurs in several passages of Scripture, in most of which it is employed in a figurative sense. Thus, in Deut. xxix. 18, 'Lest there be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood,' is applied to such Israelites as should worship foreign gods. Prov. v. 4, 'But her end is bitter as wormwood.' Jer. ix. 15, 'Behold I will feed them, even this people, with wormwood, and give them gall to drink.' So in Jer. xxiii. 13, and in Lam. iii. 15 and 19, 'Remember mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and gall,' where it is applied to public and private calamities, and in Amos v. 7, it is said of unrighteous judges, 'Ye who turn judgment to wormwood:' so in vi. 12, but here the word laanah is translated hemlock. That laanah was a plant of an extreme degree of bitterness, is evident from the various passages in which it occurs; and it has hence, as Celsius observes, been adopted to indicate both the sins and the punishments of men. Some translators, as the Septuagint, substitute the proper terms which they conceive the plant to denote, as ἀνθήκη, ὀδύνη, πικρία, and χολή. So the Arab translator uses words signifying dolores, adversa, calamitates, amaritudo. The Hebrew word laanah is supposed by lexicographers to have been originally derived from the same root as the Arabic لعن laan, 'he was accursed;' from which comes the Arabic لعنة laana, signifying 'execration' or 'malediction;' and as the Hebrews accounted bitter plants as pernicious and poisonous, so they typified what was disagreeable or calamitous by a bitter plant. Thus, as Celsius remarks, Talmudical writers, in speaking of the blessings and maledictions of Moses, say, 'Illæ mel, hæ absinthium erant.' The Chaldee, and other Oriental translations, as the Syriac and Arabic, in Prov. v. 4; Lam. iii. 19, with the Rabbins, translate laanah by words signifying wormwood. This is adopted in the Vulgate, as well as in the English translation. In Revelations viii. 11, we have the Greek word ἀψυθος employed; 'And the name of the star is called wormwood, and the third part of the waters became wormwood (ἀψυθος), and many men died of the waters, because they were bitter.' Some other plants have been adduced, as the colocynt and the oleander, but without anything to support them; while different kinds of artemisia, and of wormwood, are proverbial for their bitterness, and often used in a figurative sense by ancient authors:—

'Parce, precor, lacerare tuum, nec amara paternis
Admiscere velis, ceu melli absinthia, verbis.'

Paulin. Ep. ad Ausonium.

Celsius has no doubt that a species of artemisia or wormwood is intended: 'Hanc plantam amaram in Judæa et Arabia copiose nascentem, et interpretum auctoritate egregie suffultam, ipsam esse Ebræorum לֶאֱנָה, pro indubitato habemus.' That species of artemisia are common in Syria and Palestine is well known, as all travellers mention their abundance in particular situations; but as many of them resemble each other very closely in properties, it is more difficult to determine what particular species is meant. It is probable, indeed, that the name is used in a generic rather than a specific sense. The species found in Syria have already been mentioned under ABSINTHIUM. The species most celebrated in Arabian works on Materia Medica is that called شيج sheeh, which is conspicuous for its bitterness, and for being fatal to worms; hence it has been commonly employed as an anthelmintic even to our own times. This seems to be the same species which was found by Rauwolf in Palestine, and which he says the Arabs call sheeha. It is his 'Absinthium Santonicum, sheeha Arabum, unde semen lumbricorum colligitur;' the Absinthium Santonicum Judaicum of Caspar Bauhin, in his Pinax, now Artemisia Judaica; though it is probable two or three species yield the Semini Santonium, or wormwood of commerce, which, instead of seed, consists of the tops of the plants, and in which the peduncles, calyx flowers, and young seeds are intermixed. Artemisia Maritima and Judaica are two of the plants which yield it.—J. F. R.

LABAN (לָבָן, 'white'; LXX. Ἀδδαν), an Aramæan pastoral chief, son of Bethuel, brother of Rebecca, and grand-nephew of Abraham. In Gen.

xxix. 5 he is called 'the son of Nahoi,' by a common extension in meaning of the word בן . He is first mentioned in Gen. xxiv. 29, where Rebecca introduces him to Eliezer, Abraham's steward. Although it appears that Bethuel his father was alive (xxiv. 50),* Laban takes by far the most prominent part in the reception of Eliezer, and the arrangements respecting his sister's marriage. This fact has led to numerous conjectures, and especially to a suspicion on the part of R. Sol. Jarchi, that Laban was unfilial in his behaviour, which we only mention as a specimen of the harsh judgments which have been passed on Laban's character. The fact is quite in accordance with the Oriental custom which makes a grown-up brother the chief guardian of his sister's happiness and honour (Gen. xxiv. 13; Judg. xxi. 22; 2 Sam. xiii.; Niebuhr, Beschr. von Arab., p. 31). A charge of cupidity has been brought against Laban, because, 'when he saw the ear-ring and the bracelets upon his sister's hands'—'he said, come, thou blessed of the Lord,' It would not, indeed, be surprising, if the splendour of these presents added somewhat to the emphasis of Laban's greeting; but to any one who will read the context of this passage (Gen. xxiv. 29, 30), it will be obvious that an invidious importance has been attached to these words. The impulse of Laban's hospitality preceded (ver. 29) all knowledge of his guest's wealth, and throughout the narrative he appears as an affectionate and God-fearing man (vers. 32, 55-60).

After the unfortunate breach which Jacob's fraud caused between himself and his brother Esau, the mind of Rebecca naturally recurred to her old home as a refuge for her favourite son, and, by the wish of both his parents, Jacob set forth to 'take a wife of the daughters of Laban' (xxviii. 2). We may observe in passing, that this would hardly have been the case, if Laban had been the base person he is generally represented to have been. His reception of his destitute nephew was characterised by that generous warmth and impulsiveness which has been most unjustly attributed to hypocrisy and self-interest. After a month had elapsed, Laban himself proposed that the active services rendered to him by Jacob should receive their just wages, and Jacob offered to serve seven years for Rachel, Laban's youngest daughter. In a country where it is the universal custom that the husband should pay a dowry to the parents of his wife (Exod. xxii. 16, 17; Gen. xxiv. 12; Hos. iii. 1, 2; 1 Sam. xviii. 25; Rosenmüller, Morgenl., i. 132), it would probably have not been consonant to Jacob's feelings that he should marry as a penniless stranger, dependent on his father-in-law's beneficence. The implied dissatisfaction of Laban's daughters (xxxi. 15) does not therefore seem to have had any just grounds, nor must Laban be severely condemned for an arrangement which finds its daily and unblamed parallel in modern life, when, after years of service, some inferior is admitted into partnership and connection by marriage with the principals of the business. No defence, however, can be offered for the mean treachery which induced Laban to practice the fraud—rendered so easy by the marriage-ceremonies of the East—of palming off the dim-eyed Leah, in the place of her beautiful sister. It is no excuse for him to say, that he was herein the divine instrument to punish Jacob for his own similar and still more disgraceful deceit; and although the popular feeling and prevailing custom* to which he appealed undoubtedly existed, and was in all probability sufficiently notorious to be known to Jacob, yet Laban ought to have insisted before-hand on its observance, and not to have carried his point by a trick discreditable even to a heathen nomad. All that can be said in extenuation of this is, that a week after he gave Rachel also to Jacob, and that he probably viewed polygamy with favour rather than otherwise. That Jacob did not wait till the end of the fourteen years before marrying Rachel, is clear, both from the narrative itself (xxix. 28), and from the fact that Jacob, even when he first fled to Laban, was no less than seventy-eight years old (cf. xxxi. 41; xxxvii. 2; xlvii. 9). The exaction of seven years' further service was, on any plea, wholly unwarrantable, and forms the darkest stain on Laban's character.

When fourteen years were ended, Jacob proposed to return, feeling that the treatment which he had received was neither generous nor just. For a moment Laban's better feelings won the day, and in requesting Jacob to stay with him he left him to name his own compensation (xxx. 28, 31). Jacob made a proposal that sounded equitable,† and then, by a threefold artifice, in accordance with all which was most contemptible in his character, took means to render it most unfair and prejudicial to the interests and reasonable expectations of his master. For six years this systematic fraud was continued, and the cunning seems to have been all on Jacob's side. We do not therefore agree with Ewald (Gesch. d. Volkes Isr., i. 401, seq.) in seeing throughout this melancholy passage a contest of opposing frauds; for it was most natural that Laban should, from time to time, change his retainer's wages, when he saw that Jacob was prospering beyond his just measure, by means which (being apparently unsuspecting) he could not discover. The exposure seems to have come from Laban's sons, who

* A provision in the Gentoo laws renders it criminal for a man to give his younger daughter in marriage before the elder.

† The artifices, obscurely described in Gen. xxx. 37-42, are clearly explained (on slightly different hypotheses) by Rosenmüller and Kalisch. They consisted, 1. In 'piling certain wands' to influence the animals by the sight of unusual objects; 2. In mixing the parti-coloured cattle thus obtained with Laban's cattle; 3. In securing to himself all the strongest births. Shakespeare, in putting a defence of Jacob into Antonio's mouth—

'This was a venture, Sir, that Jacob served for;
A thing not in his power to bring to pass,
But swayed and fashioned by the hand of Heaven.'—Merch. of Venice, i. 3.

only alludes to the least objectionable of these dishonest acts, namely, the use of the wands.

* Josephus is therefore mistaken in saying, Βαθούλος . . . ἀλλ' ὁ μὲν ἦδη τέθνηκε, Antiq. i. 16. 2. There is no shadow of reason for conjecturing that 'Bethuel' is an interpolation in xxiv. 50; still less that it is the name of a younger brother of Laban. The 'undesigned coincidence' which Blunt finds in the 'consistent insignificance' of Bethuel, is one of the many instances of over-refinement in his ingenious and interesting book.

first woke their father's envy by denouncing Jacob's dishonesty, and pointing out its consequences (Gen. xxxi. 1-2); and Jacob, feeling that he could no longer face Laban's just displeasure, took advantage of the sheep-shearing festival (xxxviii. 12; 1 Sam. xxv. 7; 2 Sam. xiii. 23), (to which the breach between them had probably prevented him from being invited), to fly towards Canaan with his family and all his possessions. On occasion of this flight, Rachel, whose character appears to have been superstitious (cf. xxx. 14), stole the 'gods' (Teraphim, τοὺς τύρους τῶν θεῶν, Joseph. Antiq. i. 19. 8) of her father. The mere possession of Teraphim, which the Jews at no time consistently condemned (cf. Judg. xvii., xviii., passim; 1 Sam. xix. 13; Hos. iii. 4), does not prove Laban to have been an idolater; but that he must have been so appears with some probability from xxxi. 53 ('the gods of Nahor') and from the expression נִיחָשְׁתִּי, nichash-

thi, in xxx. 27; A. V., 'I have learnt by experience,' but properly, 'I have divined' or 'learnt by an augury' (cf. xlv. 15; 1 Kings xx. 33), showing that he was addicted to pagan superstitions. Learning the flight of Jacob, which naturally roused his indignation, Laban started in pursuit (A. V., 'on the third day,' but Joseph. l. c., μεθ' ἡμέραν μίαν), and overtaking him on the seventh day, appears to have intended either to punish or to bring him back by force. From this course he was diverted by a dream, and contented himself with a demand for his stolen property, and an impetuous yet high-toned rebuke of Jacob's clandestine departure. In the scene of stormy reconviction which followed upon his failure to find the stolen household-gods, the forbearance and generosity are mostly on the side of Laban, who, conscious that he had not treated his nephew well, and that he had set the first fatal example of deceit, reminds him of the close ties between them, and proposes a sacred reconciliation, testified by the calm and pillar, which Jacob, in Hebrew, called Gilead, and Laban, in Chaldee, called Jagar-sahadutha. After this Laban kissed and blessed his daughters and their children, and departed. He is not again mentioned or alluded to. He was not free from the cunning and cupidity which too frequently disgrace the character of the Oriental nomad; but his character has been drawn in colours wholly unwarranted by the Scriptural history; and if we compare his conduct with that of his nephew and son-in-law, it has nothing to lose by the contrast and everything to gain.—F. LABAN (לָבָן; Λαβῶν), a place mentioned Deut. i. 1, as one of the stations of the Israelites after crossing the Red Sea. It has been suggested that it is the same as Libnah, which was three days' journey north of Hazeroth (Num. xxxiii. 20); but this, Knobel (in loc.) remarks, can hardly be, because no mention is made of any discourses delivered at Libnah by Moses during the passage from Sinai to Kadesh (Num. x. 13), and after reaching Kadesh the Israelites did not return to Libnah. Knobel thinks it more probable that it is identical with the Ἀβάρα of Ptolemy (v. 17. 5), and the Haurra of the Tab. Peut. ix. e., a name which, from the Arab. حار, har, he was white, has the same meaning as the Heb. לָבָן; comp. Steph. Byzant. s. v. Ἀβάρα.—W. L. A.

LABOUR (עֲבֹדָה, מְלָאכָה), or the exercise of the limbs, both for obtaining subsistence and for the benefit of health, was ordained by God as soon as man was created. We are told that even before his fall Adam was to work in Paradise (Gen. ii. 5, 15). After the fall, however, pain and exhaustion were, as a consequence of sin, to be connected with the labour which from the beginning was designed to be a pleasant pastime and healthy exercise (ibid., iii. 19). It is, therefore, the prostration of strength, wherewith is also connected the temporary incapacity of sharing in the enjoyments of life, and not labour itself, which constitutes the curse pronounced on the fallen man. Hence we find that, in primitive times, manual labour was neither regarded as degrading nor confined to a certain class of society, but was more or less prosecuted by all. It was enjoined on all Israelites as a sacred duty in the fourth commandment (Exod. xx. 9; Deut. v. 13); and the Bible entertains so high a respect for the diligent and skilful labourer, that we are told in Prov. xxii. 29, 'Seest thou a man skilled in his work, he shall stand before kings' (comp. also ibid., x. 4; xii. 24, 27). Among the beautiful features which grace an excellent house-wife, it is prominently set forth that 'she worketh willingly with her own hands' (Prov. xxxi. 13). With such an honourable regard for labour, it is not to be wondered at that when Nebuchadnezzar carried the Jews away into captivity, he found among them a thousand craftsmen and smiths (2 Kings xxiv. 14-16; Jer. xxix. 2). The ancient Rabbins, too, regarded manual labour as most honourable, and urged it upon every one as a duty; as may be seen from the following sayings in the Talmud:—'He who does not teach his son a craft is, as it were, bringing him up to robbery' (Cholin, 105). 'Labour is greatly to be prized; for it elevates the labourer, and maintains him' (Chagiga, 5; Nedarim 49, b; Baba Bathra 110, a). To inculcate the dignity of all honest labour, however low the work might seem, the Talmud relates the following story: 'A man named Simon, whose business it was to clean the pits and reservoirs, said once to the celebrated R. Jochanan b. Zakkai (flor. 30 B.C.) [EDUCATION], I am as great as you are, and accomplish as much as you. How so? the Rabbi asked modestly. Behold, you make public affairs your business, and my labours too are devoted to the public benefit; I clean the pits, the wells, and the cisterns, in order that you may be able to recommend the inquirer such and such a pit for baptisms, and such and such a well for drinking. Truly you are right, said the Rabbi, for it is better to be attentive than to have to pronounce fools guilty of a sacrifice, for they know not to do evil' (Midrash Rabbi on Ecclesiastes iv. 17, p. 95). Hence the greatest Jewish Rabbins learned a craft, and laboured with their own hands for maintenance [EDUCATION]. The great Apostle of the Gentiles honoured and sanctified labour by engaging in it with his own hands; and he could boast that he worked hard day and night for maintenance, even when a preacher of the gospel, rather than be dependent upon any one (2 Cor. xii. 13, 14; 1 Thess. ii. 9). He could therefore teach others, by example, how to labour with their hands, and to use the wages of labour for holy purposes (Acts xx. 33-35; 1 Thess. iv. 11, 12). For the different kinds of labour in which the Hebrews were engaged, see articles nate; Sept. Λαχίς; Alex. Λαχίς; Lachis, an ancient royal city of the Canaanites, whose king, at the request of Adonizedec, king of Jerusalem, joined the alliance against Joshua and the Israelites (Josh. x. 3). The allied forces having been conquered at Bethhoron, and the five kings slain at Makkedah (ver. 16, etc.), Joshua proceeded with the conquest of the land. Makkedah was first taken, then Libnah, and then Lachish (ver. 31, 32) though it received aid from Horam, king of Gezer (ver. 33). Afterwards the Israelites marched on Eglon, which was only a very short distance from the former, as they were able to capture it the same day (ver. 35). Lachish was situated in the Shephelah, or plain of Philistia bordering on the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 33), and was allotted, along with Eglon and others, to the tribe of Judah (ver. 39). The situation of Lachish on the south-western frontier, within the borders of the warlike Philistines, exposed to the first assaults of the powerful Egyptians, and on the line of march between that country and Syria, made it a strategic post of great importance. It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 9), and was then, and afterwards, considered one of the principal strongholds of Judah. It would seem also, from an incidental remark of Micah (i. 13), that it was a station for chariots, which might be employed with great effect in the open level plain, but could not be used among the rugged mountains round Jerusalem. When the conspiracy was organized in Jerusalem against the unfortunate king Amaziah, he fled to Lachish, probably in the hope of escaping to Egypt; but he was pursued and slain (2 Kings xiv. 19; 2 Chron. xxv. 27).

Lachish was chiefly celebrated from its connection with the campaigns of Sennacherib. Ahaz, king of Judah, being hard pressed by the Syrians, applied for aid to Assyria, and became tributary to that great kingdom (2 Kings xvi. 7; B.C. 740). Hezekiah, his successor, threw off the foreign yoke (xviii. 7); consequently in the fourteenth year of his reign, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, marched against Judah, captured many of its strongholds, and besieged Lachish. Hezekiah was afraid, and appeased the conqueror by a large present (ver. 14-16); he also made vigorous preparations for the defence of Jerusalem, and entered into an alliance with Egypt (2 Chron. xxxii.; Is. xxxvi., seq.) It would seem that, after the submission of Hezekiah, Sennacherib captured Lachish, and marched in force against the Egyptians (Joseph. Antiq. x. i. 1; cf. Is. xx. 1-4; see also Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 477). A second time Sennacherib attacked Lachish; but whether on his return from his Egyptian campaign, or after he had paid a visit to Nineveh, cannot now be determined. While pressing the siege in person, he detached three of his officers with a large force to Jerusalem, to demand its surrender (2 Kings xviii. 17; 2 Chron. xxxii. 9, seq.) The terms they proposed were so humiliating, and the letter they bore was so blasphemous, that the Lord promised to deliver his people by a miracle from the proud conqueror. Before the return of the officers the siege of Lachish was raised (2 Kings xix. 8), and Sennacherib marched on Libnah.

There he suddenly heard that Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, was advancing against him (ver. 9); but before a battle was fought the terrible calamity predicted by Isaiah came upon him: 'The angel of the Lord smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred fourscore and five thousand' (Is. xxxvii. 36). Sennacherib immediately fled, and the Egyptians represented the miraculous destruction as the work of their own deities, and commemorated the event in their own way (Herod. ii. 141; Rawlinson's Herod., i. 480). It is a remarkable fact that on the tablets and sculptures discovered by Layard in the palace of Sennacherib at Nineveh, there is a full delineation and description of the siege of Lachish. The city is represented as having double walls, with battlements, towers, and outworks. Round it mounds are thrown up, and the whole force of Assyria—archers, spearmen, slingers, with a reserve of cavalry and chariots—is drawn up in order of battle. A part of the city has fallen, and the conquerors are employed impaling prisoners and dividing the spoil; while the chiefs of the conquered city are brought before the victorious monarch. Above the king's head is the following inscription in cuneiform characters: 'Sennacherib, the mighty king, king of the country of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment before the city of Lachish—I give permission for its slaughter' (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 148-152). This is one of the most interesting and important confirmations of Scripture history resulting from modern research.

Lachish again rose from its ashes, and was among the chief of Judah's fortresses when Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, invaded Palestine (Jer. xxxiv. 1-7). It existed still, and was re-occupied by the Israelites after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 30). Eusebius describes Lachish as, in his day, a village 'seven miles distant from Eleutheropolis southward as you go to Darom' (ἑπτὰ μίλια ἀπὸ τῆς ἐλθερουπόλεως τὸ Δαρωμ; Onomast., s.v. Lachis); and Darom was a small province south of Gaza, near the coast. Eleven miles from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Gaza, are the ruins of Um Lâkis, consisting of heaps of stones and mounds of rubbish, with here and there a few broken fragments of marble and granite columns, strewn over a low hill in the midst of a great undulating plain. At the southern base of the hill is an ancient well, round whose mouth are numbers of sarcophagi and other relics of the wealth and taste of former ages. The name at once suggests the royal city of Lachish (לָכִישׁ and لַכִּישׁ); the word and the situation corresponds exactly with the incidental notices in the Bible. It is in the plain of Philistia, on the southern border towards Egypt, and only three miles distant from Ajlân, the ancient Eglon (Handbook for S. and P., p. 260). Dr. Robinson objects to this identification chiefly because Lachish was a place of great strength, and there are no traces of fortifications now; and because Eusebius and Jerome place Lachish seven miles from Eleutheropolis, whereas Um Lâkis is eleven. But to this it may be answered that for two thousand years and more Um Lâkis has been a ruin, and it has long been the practice in Palestine to carry away the stones from ruined sites for the construction of new buildings. There can be no doubt about the identity of Ashdod; and though it stood the longest siege on record, it has not a trace of fortifications now (see, however, Robinson B. R., ii. 46; Raumer, 166; Van de Velde, ii. 188). And farther, the distances given in the Onomasticon cannot always be relied upon. There can scarcely be a doubt that in the desolate ruin of Um Lakis we have all that remains of the Canaanitish city and Jewish stronghold.—J. L. P.

LACHMANN, KARL KONR. FR. WILH., was born at Brunswick 4th March 1798. His early education he received in his native city. His academical career began at Leipsic, but was principally pursued at Göttingen. During the disturbances of 1814, he for a season forsook study for warfare, but soon returned to his former pursuits without having had an opportunity of signalising his prowess on the field. In 1816 he was appointed to a professorship at Königsberg, where he remained till 1825, when he removed to Berlin. In this city the rest of his life was spent. He died 13th March 1851. The studies to which Lachmann chiefly devoted himself belong to the department of philology; but in this his range was wide. Besides editions of classical authors, he edited some of the remains of early Teutonic literature. In 1831 he issued an edition of the Greek N. T. in a small form, intended to present the text authorised by the most ancient codices. This was followed, in 1842, by the first volume of his larger critical edition of the original text, the result of the united labours of himself and the younger Buttmann. In this he aimed at presenting, as far as possible, the text as it was in the authorised copies of the 4th century, his design being, not to compare various readings with the received text, but to supply a text derived from ancient authorities directly and exclusively. Relinquishing the possibility of ascertaining what was the exact text of the original as it appeared in the autographs of the authors, he set himself to determine the oldest attainable text by means of extant codices. For this purpose he made use of only a very few MSS., viz., A, B, C, P, Q, T, Z for the Gospels; D, G, H for the Epistles, the Ante-Hieronymian Latin versions, and the readings of Origen, Irenæus, Cyprian, Hilary of Poitiers, Lucifer, and, for the Apocalypse, Primarius. Under the Greek text the editor cites his authorities, and at the bottom of the page he gives the Vulgate version edited from two codices of the 6th century, the Fuldensis and the Amiantinus, preserved in the Laurentian library at Florence. The second volume appeared in 1850. Lachmann expounded the principles on which his edition was based in the Studien und Kritiken for 1830, p. 817-845. On its first appearance, his work, and the principles on which it was based, were subjected to much hostility; but his great services to the cause of N. T. criticism are now universally admitted. That he narrowed unreasonably the sphere of legitimate authority for the sacred text, that he was sometimes capricious in his selection of authorities, and that while he did not always follow his authorities, he at other times followed them even in their manifest errors and blunders, may be admitted. But, after every deduction from the merits of his work is made which justice demands, there will still remain to Lachmann the high praise of having been the first to apply to the editing of the Greek N. T. those sound principles of textual criticism which can alone secure a correct and trustworthy text. In this he followed, to a considerable extent, the counsel of the illustrious Bentley, uttered more than a century before (whence some, who sought to discredit his efforts, unworthily mocked him as 'Simia Bentleii'); but he owed nothing to Bentley beyond the suggestion of the principles he has followed; and he possessed, and has ably used, materials which in Bentley's time were not to be had (Hertz, K. Lachmann, Eine Biographie, Berl. 1851; Tregelles, Printed Text of the Greek N. T., p. 97, ff.)—W. L. A.

LADDER OF TYRE. Josephus, in describing the plain of Ptolemais, states that it is encompassed by mountains—Carmel on the south, Galilee on the east, and that on the north, the highest of them all, is called by the people of the country The Ladder of the Tyrians (κλίμαξ Τυρίων, Bell. Jud., ii. 10. 2), and is 100 stadia from the city. In 1 Maccab. xi. 59, we also read that 'Simon was made governor of the country from the Ladder of Tyre (ἀπὸ τῆς κλίμακος Τύρου) to the borders of Egypt.' The rendering of the Vulgate is here manifestly erroneous (à terminis Tyr, 'from the borders of Tyre'). Such as have visited the plain of Ptolemais can have no difficulty in identifying the 'Ladder of Tyre.' The rich plain is bounded on the north by a rugged mountain-ridge which shoots out from Lebanon and dips perpendicularly into the sea, forming a bold promontory about 300 feet in height (Russegger, 3, 143, 262; Ritter, Pal. und Syr., iii. 727, 814, seq.) The waves beat against the base of the cliff, leaving no passage below. In ancient times a road was carried, by a series of zigzags and staircases, over the summit, to connect the plain of Ptolemais with Tyre,—hence the origin of the name Scala Tyrionum, 'Ladder of Tyre.' It was the southern pass into Phœnicia proper, and formed the boundary between that country and Palestine (Kenrick, Phœnicia, p. 20; Reland, p. 544). The road still remains, and is the only one along the coast. A short distance from it is a little village called Nakûrah, and the pass is now called Râs en-Nakûrah, 'the excavated promontory' (from نَقْر, 'excavavit saxum'), doubtless from the road which has been 'hewn in the rock' (Handbook, p. 389; see also Pococke, i. 79; Robinson, B. R., iii. 89; Stanley, 260, 262). Some writers suppose that the promontory called Râs el-Abiad (the Promontorium Album of Pliny, v. 17), 'White Cape,' is the true Ladder of Tyre (Van de Velde, Memoir, 346; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 231); but this is at variance with the statement of Josephus, that the Ladder of Tyre is the northern boundary of the plain of Ptolemais. Râs el-Abiad is eight miles north of the plain, and is not visible from any part of it; and besides Râs en-Nakûrah is just about 100 stadia from Ptolemais, as stated by Josephus. The writer, on visiting the spot, and clambering over the difficult pass, was particularly struck with the appropriateness of the name 'Ladder.'—J. L. P.

LAHAI-ROI, the well בְּאֵר לָחַי (φλέαρ οὐ ἐνὸς ἁνδρὸς ἐλθόν, and τὸ φλέαρ τῆς ὁδοῦ αὐτοῦ; puleum nomine viventis et videntis, and puleum viventis et videntis me). The incident which gave this well its name is one of those graphic episodes in the history of the early patriarchs which serve at once to throw a clear light on their lives and characters, and to illustrate the genius of their language, and the peculiarities of their modes of thought and expression. Hagar fled from her imperious mistress, and took refuge in the desert. She sat down, as all travellers are wont to do, by a well. The LORD appeared to her there, and foretold the birth and future history of her son. She knew that she had seen Jehovah, and yet she still lived; though it was then the general belief that no man could see God and live. With joy and fear struggling in her heart she called the Lord, who spoke to her, 'The God of seeing' (אל ראי), for she said, 'Do I even still see (i. e., do I live, ראי אחרי) after seeing' (ראי אחרי); i. e., 'after seeing' God; or 'after my vision' of God. And then, as an expression of profound gratitude, she named the well Ber-Lahai-roi, that is, 'The well of seeing (God) and living,' or 'the well where God was seen by one who still lives.' The Hebrew will not bear the interpretation given to it by Clarke, 'A well to the Living One who seeth me'; and by such a rendering, besides, we miss the spirit and point of the passage. Equally untenable is the conjecture of Gesenius in his Thesaurus (see Kalisch, Clarke, and Murphy, ad loc.) The well was situated 'between Kadesh and Bered,' 'in the way to Shur.' The exact site is not known, but it was probably south of Kadesh, in or near the great valley of Arabah, and not far distant from the borders of Edom. It afterwards became a favourite camping-ground of Isaac (Gen. xxiv. 62; xxv. 11)—J. L. P.

LAHMAM (לחמם; Maxēs; Alex. Λαμς; Leheman), a town of Judah situated in the Shephelah, and apparently not far distant from Egion (Josh. xv. 40). It is only once mentioned in the Bible, and was probably a small village. The name does not occur in any other writer, and the site is unknown. The close similarity of final מ and D has given rise to a various reading in this name, some MSS. having לחמם and others לחמם. De Rossi says, 'Veteres omnes interpretes legunt per D, uno Vulgato excepto, qui habet Leheman. Sed in Cod. meo 650 legitur Leemas' (Var. Lect. Vd. Test., ad loc.) Lahmas may be the true reading.—J. L. P.

LAHMI (לחמי; Sept. τὸν Λαχμὶ; Alex. τ. Αεμελ), the brother of Goliath of Gath, slain by Elhanan (1 Chron. xx. 5). [ELHANAN.]

LAISH (לַיִשׁ; 'strong,' or 'a lion,' as in Is.

xxx. 6; Λαϊσ, also in Alex. Λαῖς or Λαῖ; Lais). 1. An ancient Phœnician city, occupied by a colony of Sidonians, situated in the rich valley between Hermon and Lebanon, and at one of the great fountains of the Jordan. The earliest name given to it is Leshem (לֶשֶׁם; Λαῖς; Alex. Λεσέμ), which is probably a different form or inflection of Laish (Josh. xix. 47). The occupation of this place by the Sidonians is easily accounted for. Sidon was a commercial city. Situated on the coast, with only a narrow strip of plain beside it, and the bare and rocky side of Lebanon impending over it, a large and constant supply of food had to be brought from a distance. The plain around Laish is one of the richest in Syria, and the enterprising Phœnicians took possession of it, built a town, and placed in it a large colony of labourers, expecting to draw from it an unfailing supply of corn and fruit. Josephus calls this plain 'the great plain of the city of Sidon' (Antiq. v. 3. 1). A road was made across the mountains to it at an immense cost, and still forms one of the main roads from the sea-coast to the interior. Strong castles were built to protect the road and the colony. Kulat esh-Shukif, one of the strongest fortresses in Syria, stands on a commanding hill over the place where the ancient road crosses the river Leontes; and it is manifestly of Phœnician origin. So also the great castles of Banias, four miles east of Laish, and Hunin, about six miles west of it, were founded by the Phœnicians, as is evident from the character of their architecture (Handbk., pp. 447, 444; Robinson, B.R., iii. 50, 52, 403, 371). It is most interesting to discover, after the lapse of more than three thousand years, distinct traces of the wealth and enterprise of the Phœnicians around the site and fertile plain of Laish. For an account of the capture of the city by the Danites, its subsequent history and present state, see the article DAN. Laish became chiefly celebrated, under its new name 'DAN,' as the northern border city of Palestine; and one of the two seats of Jeroboam's idolatrous worship (Deut. xxxiv. 1; 1 Kings xii. 29).

2. (Λαϊσά; Laisa.) A place mentioned in Is. x. 30. Isaiah, in describing the advance of the Assyrian host upon Jerusalem, enumerates Laish with a number of other towns on the north of the city. It is not quite certain whether the writer is here relating a real event, or detailing a prophetic vision, or giving a solemn warning under a striking allegory; but however this may be, the description is singularly graphic, and the line of march is pointed out with remarkable minuteness and precision. Aiath, Migron, and Michmash are passed; the deep ravine which separates the latter from Geba is then crossed; Ramah sees and is afraid, 'Gibeah of Saul is fled.' The writer now, with great dramatic effect, changes his mode of description. To terror and flight he appends an exclamation of alarm; representing one place as crying, another as listening, and a third as responding—'Lift up thy voice daughter of Gallim! Hearken Laishah! Alas poor Anathoth!' The words הַקִּישִׁי לַיִשָּׁה are rendered in the A. V., and by Grotius,

'Cause it (thy voice) to be heard unto Laish'—that is, apparently, to the northern border city of Palestine; but the Hebrew word will scarcely bear this interpretation, and the beauty of the passage is marred by it. Laishah was doubtless a small town on the line of march near Anathoth (see Lowth, Umbreit, Alexander, Gesenius, ad loc.) The name appears to have disappeared entirely, and the site is unknown. There is a Laisa (Ἐλεασά) mentioned in 1 Maccab. ix. 5, where Judas encamped; but we cannot tell whether it was identical with that of Isaiah, nor where it was situated.—J. L. P.

LAKES. [PALESTINE.]

LAKUM (לָקוּם; Δωδύμ; Alex. Λακούμ, and ἔως δρυος; Lecum), a town of Naphtali, near the Jordan, but its exact position is not defined (Josh. xix. 33). The name may perhaps indicate that it was a fortress so placed as to defend some important road or pass, if we derive it from the Arabic root لَم, 'to stop up a way.' One reading of the Cod. Alex. might be understood to favour this view; it renders the Hebrew עַל־לָקוֹם by εως ακρου. Perhaps some place near or at the important pass of Jacob's Bridge may be referred to.—J. L. P.

LAMB. This term is employed in the A. V. to express various Hebrew words.

1. שֶׁה. Used to denote the young either of sheep or of goats. Thus, in Deut. xiv. 4, Ye shall eat the ox, the sheep שֶׁה, and the goat שֶׁה (ἀμνὸν ἐκ προβάτων, καὶ χίμαρον ἐξ αἰγῶν, LXX.) In 1 Sam. xv. 3 it is used collectively, 'slay ox and sheep,' A. V. The marginal reading of the A. V. is frequently kid, Gen. xxii. 7; Exod. xii. 3; xiii. 13; 1 Sam. xvii. 34. In Is. vii. 25 it is rendered in the A. V. 'lesser cattle.'

2. טֶלֶה, a lamb under a year old, occurs only in Is. lxxv. 25; and 1 Sam. vii. 9, 'a sucking lamb,' טֶלֶה חָלֵב; ἀρνὴ γαλαθηγόνον.

3. כֶּבֶשֶׂת, also כֶּבֶשֶׂה, a lamb, male or female, from one to three years old. Lambs of this age were generally used for sacrifice. In the case of a sin offering, a female without blemish (Lev. iv. 32); for cleansing a leper, two he-lambs and one ewe-lamb (Lev. xiv. 10); at the morning and evening sacrifice (Exod. xxix. 38), and at all the great feasts (Num. xxviii. 11; xxix. 2, 13-37; Lev. xxiii. 19). On extraordinary occasions they were sacrificed in large numbers, as at the dedication of Solomon's Temple (1 Chron. xxix. 21), 'a thousand lambs;' at Hezekiah's purification of the Temple (2 Chron. xxix. 32), 'two hundred lambs;' at Josiah's passover (2 Chron. xxxv. 7), 'lambs and kids, thirty thousand.'

4. כֶּבֶשׂ. Often connected in the plural with אֵילִים, rams (Deut. xxxii. 14; Is. xxxiv. 6; 2 Kings iii. 4; Ezek. xxxix. 18), and probably means 'wethers.'

5. אֶמֶר. The Chaldee term used in Ezra vi. 9, 17; vii. 17. In the Targums אֶמֶר is used for the Hebrew כֶּבֶשׂ.—J. E. R.

LAMECH (לֶמֶךְ; Sept. Λαμέχ). 1. The son of Methusael, fifth in descent from Cain (Gen. iv. 18-24). He is recorded as having married two wives, Adah and Zillah, and in this we have probably a note of the origin of polygamy. In his family the arts flourished; for, though one of his sons followed the nomadic pastoral life, two others, Jubal and Tubalcain, are mentioned, the one as the inventor of two musical instruments, the Kinnor and the Ugab [MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS], the other as the introducer of the metallurgic arts. Jewish tradition increases the number of his sons to seventy-seven (Joseph. Antiq. 1. 2. 2); and makes his daughter Naamah 'the mistress of lamentations and songs' (מִרְתַּת קִינִין, Targ. Jon. in loc.), after whom all the world wondered, yea, even the sons of God, and from whom evil spirits were born (Midrash Ruth and Zohar). In Lamech, also, we have to recognise the Father of Poetry; for his chant, which the sacred writer has preserved, is the oldest piece of rhythmical composition in the world. It may be rendered thus:

And Lamech said to his wives:—

Adah and Zillah hear my voice,

Wives of Lamech give ear to my speech

A man for my wounding I slay

And a youth for my bruise.

For sevenfold shall Cain be avenged,

But Lamech seventy times seven.

We regard this as the chant of a fierce and lawless spirit exulting in the possession of arms, the preparation of which from iron had been discovered in his family, and boasting of the terrible vengeance which he would take on all who should injure him. It seems to be generally held by interpreters that the possessive affix 'my,' in ver. 24, is to be taken objectively, so that 'my wounding' is equivalent to 'the wounding of me,' and 'my bruise,' to 'the bruising of me.' There is a difference of opinion as to whether the verb הִרְנִיתִי, rendered slay, should be taken as a preterite or as a future. If it be taken as the former, the meaning will be that Lamech had already avenged himself on the person who had wounded him; so the LXX., the Vulg. and the Syr. versions, which are closely followed by the English of the A. V. If it be taken as the latter, the language is that of boastful threatening as to what Lamech would do if any should dare even to lay a stroke on him. This latter is preferred by the great mass of recent commentators, as well as by Calvin, Piscator, and Le Clerc, amongst the older, and Ibn Ezra among the Jewish interpreters. Calvin says, 'Mihi vera et simplex videtur esse eorum sententia, qui verbum præteriti temporis in futurum resolvunt, et indefinite accipiunt: ac si jactaret sibi satis esse roboris et violentiæ ad fortissimum quenque hostem occidendum.' On this ground Calvin translates the word by 'occidero,' I will slay. It seems more in accordance, however, with the idiom of our language, to render it in the definite present, as expressive of what was the fixed resolution and purposed habit of the speaker. That the Heb. preterite (so-called) may be legitimately so rendered, the following remarks of Ewald will sufficiently show:—'The perfect is used . . . (3.) Of actions which in reality are neither past nor present, but which the intention or the imagination of the speaker contemplates as being already as good as done, therefore as perfectly unconditional and certain, when, in modern languages, at least, the more energetic definite present would be used instead of the future.'—Heb. Gr., sec. 262, Nicholson's Transl., p. 136.

As this passage appears in the A. V. it is so rendered as to convey the idea that Lamech's language is that of penitence or of remorseful fear. But this seems entirely alien from the spirit of the passage. The language is not that of a man who has been betrayed, through sudden passion, into an act of murderous violence which he deplors, and the vengeance due to which he dreads: rather is it that of one who neither fears God nor regards man, and who, confident in his strength and his arms, boasts, that if any shall dare to touch him, he will take upon him a summary vengeance seventy times greater than that by which the life of Cain was protected. Whether this was uttered in the prospect of some danger which his irregular habits had brought on him, and of which his wives were afraid, as Vatablus, Munster, Rivet, and some others, think;* or whether, as good old Ainsworth suggests, 'that for violating the law of marriage by taking two wives, God vexed him with a disquiet life between them; that they lived in discontent and emulation one with another, and both of them with their husband, so in his wrath he uttered these words unto them to repress their strife' (Annot. in loc.); or whether these are merely a 'Thrasionic jactation' (to use an expression of Rivet's) called forth by his savage delight at finding himself possessed of deadly weapons, as Herder suggests (Geist d. Heb. Poes., part I. p. 344), and as Rosenmüller, Knobel, and others, approve, may be left to the judgment of each reader.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF, in the Hebrew Canon אֵיכָה, 'O how . . .' (a plaintive exclamation)†; in the Talmud and later authorities קִינֹת, † elegies, dirges; LXX. Θρήνοι Threnoi; Vulg. Threni, id est Lamentationes Jeremiae Prophete; Jerome, Lamentationes quae Cynoth hebraice inscribuntur; Syr. ܐܝܟܐ ܕܝܪܡܝܐ, etc.:

one of the Hagiographa (כתובים) in the Masoretic Code (the third of the five Megilloth, between Ruth and Ecclesiastes), but in the LXX., Vulg., and our Bibles—which follow their example—placed after the Book of Jeremiah. It is a collection of five elegies sung on the ruins of Zion; and the fall of Judea, the destruction of the Sanctuary, the exile of the people, and all the terrors of sword, fire, and famine in the city of Jerusalem are the principal themes upon which they turn in ever new variations.

The first chapter opens, in the most striking manner, with the picture of Jerusalem, the widowed queen herself, bereft of her inhabitants and of her crown, sitting alone in the vast stillness of night, § and weeping, bitterly weeping: without comfort, without friends—for these have turned foes. Her children are far away, in exile, ever hunted, ever overtaken. And she remembers all her former glory now in the depths of her woe (1-7). *—Yet, it was her own sin that brought her down so 'wondrously.' . . . 'Behold, O God, my woe,' she bursts out suddenly (9):—The enemy is in the very Sanctuary, famine stares in her face, she humbles herself before the chance passers by, appeals to them for pity, asks them whether they saw in the wide wide world a grief like unto hers, which the Lord has wrought in the fulness of His day of ire. Fire above, a snare below, a yoke on her neck. . . . 'Over these things do I weep.

. . . my children are destroyed . . . and no comforter' (10-16). She wrings her hands in vain—foes all around (17). But 'the Lord is just, she has rebelled,† she does not complain of His judgment; only let 'all the peoples hear her pitiful wail.' But nay!—even her beloved friends 'mock her' (18, 19). And in the bitterness of her upheaved heart, and in the darkness of her woe, she turns to Him who has caused all this—'sword without, death within.' She does not ask for mercy, but she cries out for vengeance. . . . 'For many are my groans, and my heart is faint' (20-22). Commiseration for her own state—the saddest phase of suffering—confession of her own guilt, and the appeal to God's justice in avenging her on her foes on the score of their sins:—these form the loosely-connected but leading thoughts of the first chapter.

Chap. ii. again intones the אֵיכָה, asking in sad wonderment how the Lord could have thus laid low the splendour of Zion? . . . forgetful of 'His own footstool on the day of His wrath' (1). The strongholds are fallen, His very tabernacle is sunken to the ground; king and priest in exile—no law, no prophet; old men and young maidens sit on the ground in silence, ashes on their heads, and the babes pour out their young souls on their mothers' breasts (8-12). To what—the writer suddenly breaks the weird description—shall I compare thee, O daughter of Jerusalem, to what liken thee, how comfort thee? . . . 'For deep as the sea is thy wound; who shall heal thee? (13). And the cause—false prophets' false burdens, to which thou foolishly hast lent thine ear (14). Oh, see how the passers-by clap their hands, shake their heads, mock and scoff! . . . But Up, thou widowed city of sorrows! Up and cry unto Him whose hand has wrought all this shame and all this misery . . . cry unto Him in the night, and rest not and cease not, and cry out thy whole heart before Him, lift up thy hands and show Him the corpses of the suckling babes slain by hunger at the top of every street! (19). Let him behold—oh horror!—tender mothers feasting on the offspring that has lain under their own hearts. Show Him His own Sanctuary . . . and amid its ashes and broken stones lie slain His priest and His prophet, and the streets run red with the blood of boy and grayhead (20). In truth He has called together, as to a solemn assembly, every terror and every horror. He has slaughtered and not spared. No remnant, no fugitive, not one of the precious children saved—no comfort, no hope . . . the enemy has consumed them all—all.—

It would perhaps be more difficult to indicate a

* Vatablus paraphrases the passage thus:—'Si a quoquam etiam fortissimo viro, vel adolescente qui viribus valet, vulnus acciperem, illum interficerem; valeo enim viribus. Non est, igitur, quod mihi aut liberis vestris timeatis, O vos uxores meae; and adds, 'Videbat enim uxores suas tristes.'

† 'Three prophets have used the word אֵיכָה with reference to Israel: Moses, Isaiah, and Jeremiah. To what are they to be likened? To three bridesmen שְׁרֵיבֵינֵי = Μυητῆρες) who have seen the afterwards widowed wife in three different stages. The first has seen her in her opulence and her pride, and he said, 'Oh, how shall I bear alone your overbearing and your strife?' (Deut. i. 2). The second has seen her in her dissipation and dissoluteness, and he said, 'Oh, how has she become a harlot!' (Is. i. 21). And the third has seen her in her utter desolation, and he said, 'Oh, how does she sit solitary!' (Lam. i. 1). Introduction to Echa Rabathi.

'running thought' in this than in any other elegy. The most heartrending, most desperate pictures of terror and woe are conjured up one after the other, without any perceptible logical sequence; and the ideas, as they come and go and return almost uncontrolled, have something of the ghastly, mechanical rocking to and fro of the body, which at times accompanies the wild wail or the tearless sorrow of women. The only new features of this section consist in the direct charge against the false prophets, and in the utterly crushed state of mind, which does not ask for vengeance any longer—but for mercy.

Chap. iii. brings us face to face with the writer himself. In sentences broken, abrupt, like sharp pangs, or as a man would speak in the midst of a shipwreck or a battlefield, he tells us his own tale of woe; his fluctuations between despair and hope; his cries and his prayers mixed up in wild confusion. 'I am the man who has seen the misery,' he intones his song. His flesh and his bone have been made old in his sufferings (4); he has been set in dark places (6); laden with chains (7); and his prayer was 'shut out' (8); Then he said in the fulness of his affliction, and of his wormwood, and of his gall: Lost is the hope and the strength in the Lord (18, 19). . . . Yet once more he rouses himself, 'Thus do I answer unto mine heart, and therefore do I hope again. The loving-kindness of God has not ceased. His mercies are not over altogether—they are new every morning.' . . . Let me bear it in silence; the evil comes from Him who also sends the good. He sent punishments—just punishments; for we have sinned. Let us investigate our ways, and let us 'lift up our hands unto God in the heavens' (18-41). . . . But verily, if we were sinning men—Thou hast not been a forgiving God; for Thou hast slain and hast not pitied (42, 43). Through Thee our eyes run down unceasingly, like unto rivers (48).—And in the midst of the sights around him his own sufferings rush again upon his mind with increased power. How the dungeon closed upon him, water flowed over his head:—Buried alive. But he called upon the Lord from out his darkness, and He said, 'Fear not.' He has fought his fight, and freed him from the cruel hands of his adversaries and his enemies! (60). And the milder mood into which his mind was softening down, vanishes suddenly at the vivid recollection of what they did to him, and his whole soul presses itself into one glowing, passionate curse upon their heads. . . . 'Pursue them with ire, and destroy them from under the heavens of God!' . . .

Chap. iv. recommences with a sad survey, as it were, of the scene all around—the place of desolation and ruin, where the precious holy stones, together with the more precious children, lie strewed about like vile pottery (1, 2). The ghastly sights before described: the babes dying for want of food and drink; those fed on dainties once, feeding on the refuse of the street (3-9). ('Better for them that fell through the sword than those that fell through famine'); babes stretch out their little hands for bread, and there is none to give it them; women, 'pitiful women,' boiling their own children—the only food left! The foundations of Zion are burnt. Who of all kings and peoples had ever even hoped to enter triumphantly into the gates of Jerusalem? Through the sins, the overwhelming sins, of her prophets and priests has all this come to pass (13). And all is over now. The king led away in fetters, the last ray of national existence gone; and you rejoice, daughter of Edom! (21). But remember this: 'the sin of Zion is expiated.' Her cup was full to the brim, and she has emptied it to the dregs. . . . Edom, thy turn next! (22). . . .

A new and most remarkable feature is presented in this elegy. The king, 'the anointed of God,' under whose shadow 'we had hoped to live among the peoples,' is mentioned here most emphatically. This seems to express the last stage of transactions with the Babylonians. The proposal to submit to the sovereignty, but to retain their own national ruler, subject and tributary to the conqueror, like other small satraps of his wide realm, had very likely been made at the last moment, as the last possible means to avert further hostilities. That it was answered by the king's being taken prisoner and carried away, the writer does not seem to regret so much on the king's account—of whom he says as little as possible throughout—as on that of the now utterly trodden-out nationality. Yet there is one weird comfort. Judæa has lost everything, 'she has emptied her cup;' not even any more is exile to be dreaded—for there is none left to be exiled. Her sins were visited most terribly and most fully upon her; her enemies' turn must come now. If she has sinned, her enemy has sinned worse. . . . Daughter of Uz, rejoice and be glad, the cup is going round, 'and thou shalt drink and be drunken, and thou shalt be sick.'

Chap. v. (Oratio Jeremia prophete, Vulg.) differs from the rest considerably in tone and style. A certain collected calm, to which the horror in the midst of the catastrophe has given way, pervades it. There are no more outbursts of mad despair, no more cries for vengeance, no more heartrending wails for mercy; but only a mournful enumeration of all that the nation has to undergo as the hated slave of the conqueror, interspersed with a few brief notices of the scenes that accompanied the downfall of the 'crown of our head' (10-15). All the splendour of the days of yore is now gone from Zion. There are no old men in the gates, no young men with their songs:—'Woe unto us ($\text{לָנוּ} \text{נָא} \text{וָאֵל} = \text{of woe!}$), we have sinned.' On the Mount of Zion, which is desolate, jackals walk about (15-18);* and from

* We cannot refrain from adding one of the most striking talmudical passages in reference to this verse. 'One day the doctors (R. Gamliel, R. Eliezer ben Asaryah, R. Joshua, and R. Akiba) went up to Jerusalem. When they arrived at the Mount of Zophim they tore their garments. When they arrived at the Mount of the Temple, they saw a jackal come out from the Holy of Holies, and they all began to weep—except R. Akiba, who smiled. They asked him why he smiled? He replied by asking them why they wept? Why, they told him, upon the place of which it is said, 'the stranger which approacheth it shall die' (Num. iii. 38), we see fulfilled the passage (Lam. v. 18), 'On the Mount of Zion which is desolate, jackals walk about:—and we shall not weep?' And he replied, 'This is why I smile: it is written (Is. xviii. 2), 'I take just witnesses, Uriah the priest, and Zechariah.' What connection is there between Uriah of the first out the midst of that vast stillness of ruin the poet's heart yearns towards God. The epilogue—half hope, half plaint—is addressed to Him who is everlasting, beyond all earthly changes (19). He may yet renew the days of yore (20). 'Unless'—and with this shrill discord, in accordance, however, with the tenor of the entire cycle, the book concludes—'unless thou hast utterly rejected us, and art wroth against us in the extreme.'*

The contents of the five elegies before us are briefly this:—The desolation of the city and its mournful silence in the first; the destruction of the city and the Temple in the second; the individual miseries of the writer in the third; once more the whole calamity compressed into one loud cry in the fourth; and the sighs and the hopes of the now rejected people in the fifth. These are the sounds and images impressed upon our minds; and through the whole goes one deep, wailing melody, which in the different chapters appears as in different, although not exactly definable, symphonic movements, over all that is lost—and all is lost.

There can hardly be any doubt as to the time to which these threnodies refer. A brief glance at the corresponding portions in the books of Kings and Chronicles demonstrates to evidence that they speak, one and all, of the whole period from the beginning of the last siege by Nebuchadnezzar to its terrible end. This has also, from the LXX. and the Midrash downwards, been the almost unanimous opinion of investigators (Carpzov, Eichhorn, Jahn, Bertholdt, Börmelius, Horrer, Riegler, Pareau, etc., etc.) It would seem to be equally clear that these poems belong, broadly speaking, to no particular phase of the great epoch of terrors, but that, written probably within a very brief space of time (more especially does this appear to be the case with the first four), they portray indiscriminately some woeful scene that presented itself 'at the head of every street,' or give way to a wild passionate outcry of terror, misery, despair, hope, prayer, revenge, as these in vehement succession swept over the poet's soul.

Yet it has been suggested (and the text has been strained to the utmost to prove it) that the successive elegies are the pictures of successive events portrayed in song; that, in fact, the Lamentations are a descriptive threnody—a drama in which, scene after scene, the onward march of dread fate is described, intermixed with plaints, reflections, prayers, consolations, such as the chorus would and Zechariah of the second Temple? But it is also written (Zech. viii. 4), 'Again will old men and old women sit in the streets of Jerusalem.' As long as the prophecy about the first Temple was not accomplished, I feared lest that of the second might likewise not come to pass; now I have seen the first part fulfilled unto the last letter, I doubt no longer that the second also will be accomplished in its day. And his companions said unto him, 'Akiba, thou hast comforted us! Akiba, thou hast comforted us! May God comfort us! Amen' (Maccoth xxiv. a).

* In the Hebrew Bible (MSS. and printed), the last verse but one is found repeated at the end, in order that the book might not close with the dire sentence of condemnation. The same pious dread of closing with ominous words has caused the repetition of the penultimate verse in Isaiah, Malachi, and Ecclesiastes.

utter in grave and measured rhythms, accompanied by the sighs and tears to which the spectators would be moved by the irredeemably doomed heroes and actors. Thus, for instance, it has been maintained that the first chapter speaks of Jehoiachin's capture and exile (Horrer, Jahn, Riegler, etc.), upon which there is this to be observed, that a mere glance at 1 Kings xxiv. shews that such scenes as are described in this first elegy (famine, slaughter of youths, etc.) do not in the least agree with the time and circumstances of Jehoiachin, while they do exactly correspond with the following chapter of Kings, in which the reign under Zedekiah, with all its accompanying horrors, to the downfall of the city and empire, are related with the severe calmness of the historian, or rather the dry minuteness of the annalist. Neither can we, for our own part, see that 'gradual change in the state of the city' which De Wette sees in the consecutive chapters; nor can we trace the gradual progress in the mind of the people—that is, in the first two chapters, heaviest, for ever inconsolable, grief; in the third, the turning-point (the classical peripety); in the fourth and fifth, the mind that gradually collects itself, and finally finds comfort in fervent prayer—which is Ewald's ingenious suggestion, to which Keil assents, as far as 'a general inner progress of the poems' goes. To our, and, we take it, to every unbiased view, every one of the elegies is complete, as far as it goes, in itself, each treating the same, or almost the same, scenes and thoughts in ever new modes. In this respect they might to a certain degree be likened to the 'In Memoriam' and the second movement of the 'Eroica'—the highest things to which we can at all compare them in the varied realms of song. The general state of the nation, as well as of the poet, seem not much different from the first to the last, or, at all events, the fourth poem. It would certainly appear, moreover, as if, so far from forming a consistent and progressive whole, consciously leading onward to harmony and supreme peace, they had not even been composed in the order in which they are before us now. Thus, e.g., the fourth chapter is certainly more akin to the second than to the third. Accident, more than a settled plan, must have placed them in their present order. But the history of this collection and redaction is one so obscure that we will not even venture on a new speculation on it.

And here it is necessary to notice a peculiar statement of Jerome, which, though a 'crassus error' (Calvin), palpable at first sight, has yet found its stout defenders until very recently. We speak of his notion (ad Zach. xii. 11) that this Book of Lamentations on the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, was the lament which Jeremiah is said, in 2 Chron. xxxv., to have lamented on the death of Josiah, and which was sung by all the singing men and singing women in their קִינֹת or lamentations, and which are written קִינֹת, among the Elegies, i. e., among the collection of national threnodies extant at the time of Chronicles. Josephus relates, in his account of Josiah's death (Antiq. x. 5. 1), in a similar manner, that Jeremiah composed ἐπικήδειον μέλος, 'a dirge' on the king's death, ὃ καὶ μέχρι νῦν διαμένει, 'which is still extant.' What, indeed, is more natural than that Jeremiah, the 'Prophet of Wailings,' should have composed many mourning songs in the dark times in which his lot was cast, and that he should, more especially as a kind of laureate, have composed a dirge on the death of his king? Nothing, indeed, but over-hastiness (though we are loth to charge the writer with it) could have caused Jerome so to misunderstand either Josephus' μεγὰρ οὖν, and to overstep, by an ill-advised addition of his own, the boundaries of the traditional illustration embodied in the Targum, ad loc. ('and as the lament over Josiah*'), to such a degree as to identify a single dirge on the death of a king—who, be it well remembered, was buried in the sepulchres of his fathers with all regal honours—with our five elegies wailing over the terrors to which the conquered city is a prey, the fire and famine that rage in the streets, the sanctuary that is razed to the ground, the whole nation that is nearly destroyed, and the king who is in exile.

How men like Ussher, Dathe, Michaelis, De Wette, could even for one moment have defended so obvious a mistake, we are utterly unable to comprehend. The wish to find all documents mentioned in Scripture in our canon ought not to have been father to such a monstrosity. True, it is given up now by the foremost of its former defenders; and only a few minor writers still hold that although our book does not exactly seem to befit the occasion of Josiah's death, yet it was written at that time as a prophecy on the future fate of Jerusalem—'quod minime probabile est,' we can only add with Calvin (Prel. ad Lam.)

We may be brief on the question of authorship, which, in fact, has been touched upon already in some degree in the foregoing. It is by common consent assigned to Jeremiah the prophet. The Talmud, embodying the earliest traditions, has: 'Jeremiah wrote his Book, the Book of Kings, and the Lamentations' (Baba Bathra 15, a).† Follow-

† Thenius, an otherwise estimable writer, has, in his Introduction to Lamentations, inaugurated a new and improved system of quoting from the Talmud, viz., 'Talmud Babylon.' בְּפִרְקֵי תַלְמוּד.

Tract. אֵין חֻלְקִין נִמְנָה בְּבֵא בְּתָרָא Fol. י"ב. Considering that the veriest tyro in talmudical literature is aware that the current editions of the Talmud, wherever and whenever printed, are invariably printed with exactly the same number of pages in every tome, and exactly the same words on every side of every page, the inventor of the new system has only succeeded in reducing himself ad absurdum. To quote in any other way than by the mere indication of the page (as may be learned from the very commentaries on both margins), betrays about the same knowledge of so-called rabbinical literature as Henricus Seynensis did with his 'Rabbinus Talmud.' Yet this is not all. Thenius goes so far as to charge Wette, Hävernick, and Keil, with having, in their quotation of the same passage, suppressed (i.e., not expressly stated) the fact of the Babyl. Talm. having been first redacted at the end of the fifth century. We protest against the notion that every writer is bound to enlarge upon the literary history of every book he is quoting from; especially if this book be the Talmud, the date of which may be learned in every common manual. Whether De Wette, Hävernick, and Keil, know how to read the Talmud or not, we do not know, and it does not concern us here. But they are perfectly authorised to use an authenticated and very common talmudical dictum bearing on their subject; everybody being agreed that the Talmud, whatever the date of its final redaction, embodies some of the earliest and most genuine traditions. Thenius evidently confounds writing with redacting. He does not surely hold that certain books of the Canon were first written at the time when they were first redacted! The terms 'ר' and 'ע' moreover, which occur in the other passage (wrongly quoted by him as 'a. a. O.' since it is not to be found 'ר', b, but 'ב', a), have a very different meaning from the one upon which he bases his final conclusions. See TALMUD.

Besides this outer evidence, the inner evidence for Jeremiah's authorship is so striking that, for aught we know, it may have given rise to those very traditions. The elegies are written in his time by one who has lived through all the misery which they describe. The personal references to Jeremiah's own fate, such as we know it from his book of prophecies and kings, are not wanting.† What is more, his poetical and prophetic individuality

cern us here. But they are perfectly authorised to use an authenticated and very common talmudical dictum bearing on their subject; everybody being agreed that the Talmud, whatever the date of its final redaction, embodies some of the earliest and most genuine traditions. Thenius evidently confounds writing with redacting. He does not surely hold that certain books of the Canon were first written at the time when they were first redacted! The terms 'ר' and 'ע' moreover, which occur in the other passage (wrongly quoted by him as 'a. a. O.' since it is not to be found 'ר', b, but 'ב', a), have a very different meaning from the one upon which he bases his final conclusions. See TALMUD.

* This agreement and disagreement between

LXX. and Vulg. is easily explained by their having both had one and the same current oral Haggadic tradition before their minds' eye, and having rendered it according to their individual recollections. † Cf. Lam. ii. 11, and iii., with Jer. xv. 15, seq.; xvii. 13, seq.; xx. 7; Lam. iii. 14 with Jer. xx. 7; iii. 64-66 with Jer. xvii. 18; v. with iv. 17-20. As in the prophecies, so here the iniquities of the people are given as the cause of the exile and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, cf. i. 5, 8, 14, 22; iii. 39, 42; iv. 6, 22, v. 16 with Jer. xiii. 22-26; xiv. 7; xvi. 10, ff.; xvii. 1, ff., their sinful trust in false prophets and iniquitous priests, their relying on the safety of Jerusalem, and on the aid of powerless and treacherous allies, etc. etc.

pervades the whole so unmistakably, that it seems hardly necessary to refer to the numerous parallel passages, adduced by Eichhorn, Bertholdt, Keil, De Wette, Jahn, Bleek, and others. If contents, spirit, manner, individuality, are any guarantee at all, then Jeremiah is the author, and sole author of the book before us. He even seems to refer to his other book (cf. ii. 14; Jer. xiv. 13). But were any further proof needed, we would certainly find it in the very diction and phraseology common to both works, and peculiar to them alone.* Indeed, not one investigator in ancient or modern times has doubted the fact upon which tradition speaks with such rare unanimity. Except Hardt, who, for reasons of his own, ascribed the five different elegies to Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, and king Jehonja respectively, and, in our own time, Conz and Thenius. The latter holds that only Lam. ii. and iv. belong to Jeremiah (the former written in Palestine, the latter in Egypt), the three others, however, to have been written by Jeremiah's contemporaries and disciples. His reasons for this assumption are, that Jeremiah could not have treated the same subject five times; that 2 and 4 are different from 1, 3, 5, which are less worthy of Jeremiah's pen; that the three latter do not quite fit Jeremiah's own circumstances; and, finally, because there is a difference in the alphabetical structure (see below) of 1, and of 2-4. These objections to Jeremiah's exclusive authorship seem about as tenable as Hardt's Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, and consorts. The first two points are not worth consideration; the third is answered by the simple proposition that they are poems, and not a historical narrative which we have before us, and that therefore a certain license must be given to the poet in the use of broad similes in his generalising, and in his putting himself sometimes in the place of the whole people as its spokesman and chief mourner. And if, finally, the structure differs in 1 from 2 and 4, then it may as well be asked why 3, which is not supposed to be written by Jeremiah, is like 2 and 4, which are allowed to be written by him? If somebody has imitated the structure in 3, why has it not been also imitated in 1 and 5? A further refutation of this attempt to take away two-fifths of Jeremiah's authorship—supported by no investigator as we said—has been given by Ewald, and we have indeed only mentioned it for the sake of completeness.—It has likewise been urged that the book is found placed among the Kethubim and not among the prophets, and that it bears no name; that consequently there seems to have been a doubt in the minds of the redactors of the Canon as to the authorship. But the fact is that this Book of Lamentations, which nowhere pretends to be a book of prophecy, which nowhere predicts events which will happen, but describes those which have happened—in words, it is true, well worthy of the

'inspired' writer,*—and nowhere speaks in the name, or reports a message of, God, belongs by rights to the Hagiographa. That, further, the redactors of the Canon did not think fit to inscribe the book with Jeremiah's name, proves less than nothing. There is not the remotest doubt about the unanimous belief before, during, and after their time, in Jeremiah's authorship (cf., e.g., quite apart from the express statements, the ingenious Haggadic parallels between Isaiah's verses of comfort and Jeremiah's verses of woe, alphabetically arrayed in Echa Rabbathi and elsewhere); and it might as well be called in question whether they believed in Moses' authorship of the Pentateuch, since they did not state this as their opinion expressly at the beginning of the book.

Whether Jeremiah himself or Baruch (as Bunsen, after Rashi, assumes) wrote out the different chapters, and whether Jeremiah, or his disciples (Ewald), finished it in Palestine or Egypt, are questions on which we cannot enlarge here, nor will it be of very much consequence for Biblical criticism, if, as probably will be the case, they remain unsettled for ever.

Respecting the outward form of these elegies, as far as style is concerned, we can only endorse the enthusiastic encomiums of the Lowths, Eichhorns, Herders. There seems in the whole realm of human mourning put into words, from the most tragic lament of classical Hellas to Ossian's wail and the Nibelungen-Klage, hardly anything to be compared in depth of heartrending pathos, and in grandeur and nobleness of language, to these sacred elegies—though certainly our translations, however faithful, do not quite convey this idea. Neither the symphonic character of the whole, nor the varying metres of the single parts, nor even that wonderful tenderness imparted to the whole by the constant recurrence of the feminine suffixes and terminations of verbs and adjectives, the הַ, יָ, יָ, etc., which, with a melancholy charm of their own, constantly remind us that it is a woman, the daughter of Zion herself, whose plaintive song resounds through the stilly night, can be imagined by the reader of any European version whatsoever. The more genuine and sublime, however, the poetry, the more surprising it would seem at first sight that the four first elegies should be arranged 'alphabetically'—that is, that i., ii., iv. should consist of twenty-two verses, each beginning with the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet in alphabetical order, while iii. has sixty-six verses, commencing with each letter of the alphabet repeated three times.† It is a grave error, however, for this reason alone, to call the time in which they were composed barbarous, or, at all events, a time of poetical decline and vitiated taste. What more barbarous, it would appear, than rhyme, 'the swaddling-clothes of unborn thought' (Bettina von Arnim), to find which does certainly give the poet at times more trouble than the beginning of a new sentence—not exactly logi-

* Jeremiah did not write this book 'in prophecy,' but under the influence of the 'Holy Ghost,' is the poignant remark of the early commentators—misunderstood by the later ones.

† The fifth, though likewise in twenty-two verses, each beginning with a different alphabetical letter, does not tie itself to the alphabetical arrangement cally linked to its predecessor—with a certain letter. 'Coldness, languor of feeling, low and mechanical phraseology,'—all these charges have been brought against the like Biblical alphabetical composition, but have not been substantiated. It was simply a fashion of the time, into which even the most genuine outburst of grief, when clad in poetical garb, fell naturally. Artificial forms, like the Sonnet, the Terze Rime, Madrigals, Ghazels, Makamat, do not imply want of real poetry in Dante, Shakspeare, Hariri, Rückert, Gothe; not to mention Æschylus, Euripides, Aristophanes, and their sometimes unfathomable metres. And are the 24th and 35th Psalms less grand because they are in acrostics? The Samaritan, Syriac, and Hebrew Liturgies of the Middle Ages contain some of the rarest poetical gems in this same form, and we cannot but emphatically protest against an a priori reason which is so flagrantly contrary to facts.—The peculiarity noticeable in the second, third, and fourth chapters, that the D precedes the V, we can no more explain than any of the former investigators. But we shall not trouble the reader with a new hypothesis. Suffice it to add that nothing in the least degree satisfactory has been brought forward in explanation of this apparent irregularity.—In i. iii. (except ii. 19) every verse seems to form a sort of Tricolon, indicated by distinctive accents (Imperatores or Reges) Soph Pasuk, Ethnachta, Sakeph Katon; the subdivisions of which, however, are of very unequal number and length; while iv. and v. appear to fall more naturally into Disticha. Another division has been suggested somewhat according to the following scheme:—

How does the city sit solitary, once full of people!
— is she become as a widow—
— is the great among nations become tributary—

How does the Princess among provinces sit solitary!

But on these points we must not further enlarge; any more than we can do full justice to the manifold extraordinary theories of strophe and anti-strophe, of Sapphic metre and trimeter, brought forward by investigators from Jerome to Saalschütz. That they were expressly composed by Jeremiah for Choruses, we do not know, and do not believe. 'En de telles calamités,' says a French writer, 'le cœur humain se resserre ou se fond; il devient insensible ou s'abandonne au désespoir. L'intention du prophète est de prémunir ses compatriotes contre l'un et l'autre de ces excès. Il veut qu'ils pleurent avec lui, mais comme lui.' And there is no reason why they should not have been sung by, without being 'expressly written for,' those who sat by the rivers of Babylon, as they are still chanted in the Synagogues, both on the eve and the morning of the 9th of Ab.* The prophet probably sent them to his exiled brethren, as he may have sent them part of his prophetical book; and from Babylon they were brought back when the House of God was reared again on the sacred ground. The position of the Lamentations in the Canon appears to have been uncertain at first, since it was sometimes put together with Jeremiah's prophecies (see above), sometimes treated as a special work. In a talmudical enumeration of the Hagiographa (Bab. Bathra 14. b), we find it between the Song of Songs and Daniel.

With respect to the early versions of the book, it is noticeable, that the translation in the LXX. of the Book of Jeremiah is done by a different hand from that which translated the Lamentations, and that the Vulgate follows, in its version, rather the Hebrew text than the LXX. The Targum to Lamentations is of a late and very uncertain date; and though of little value for exegetical purposes, and containing more legendary by-work than most of the Targums, is yet highly useful, as containing both the early traditions and the floating theological notions.* Of the principal writers on Lamentations we mention Calvin, Grotius, Clericus, Horrer, Leusden, Lowth, Herder, Eichhorn, Meier, Pareau, Otto, Rosenmüller, Maurer, Kalkar, Thenius. The most valuable translations (into German) are by Dathe, Wolsohn, De Wette, Meier, Thenius.†—E. D.

LAMP (לָמְפָא, whence, perhaps, Gr. λαμπάς, the μ being introduced in place of the Hebrew D, Lat. lampas, and our lamp). Lamps are very often mentioned in Scripture; but there is nothing to give any notion of their form. Almost the only fact we can gather is, that vegetable oils were burnt in them, and especially, if not exclusively, olive-oil. This, of the finest quality, was the oil used in the seven lamps of the Tabernacle (Exod. xxvii. 20). It is somewhat remarkable, that while the golden candlestick, or rather candelabrum, is so minutely described, not a word is said of the shape, or even the material, of the lamps (Exod. xxv. 37). This was, perhaps, because they were to be of the common forms, already familiarly known to the Hebrews, and the same probably which were used in Egypt, which they had just quitted. They were in this instance doubtless of gold, although metal is scarcely the best substance for a lamp. The golden candlestick may also suggest, that lamps in ordinary use were placed on stands, and where more than one was required, on stands with two or more branches. The modern Orientals, who are satisfied with very little light in their rooms, use stands of brass or wood, on which to raise the lamps to a sufficient height above the floor on which they sit. Such stands are shaped not unlike a tall candlestick, spreading out at the top. Sometimes the lamps are placed on brackets against the wall, made for the purpose, and often

* The Neginah (accent and note at the same time) has on that occasion a different tune from that generally used in the Pericopes, somewhat resembling that in which it is sung sometimes in the Roman 'Tenebræ,' in Passion-week (Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's Reisebriefe, vol. i.).—Chanted in a very low tone of voice, it produces a strikingly mournful impression.

* The Midrash to Lamentations (Midrash Echa) is a very remarkable book. Besides its very high poetical value, it contains a great deal of historical and philological material, which still awaits the spade of the competent excavator. Only a few scraps have as yet been turned to use.

† We have not considered it necessary to prove from parallels, as has been done by some writers on the subject, that these Lamentations are not the only instances of elegiac poetry either in ancient times or in the East.

upon stools. Doubtless the same contrivances were employed by the Hebrews.

309. Egyptian Lamps.

From the fact that lamps were carried in the pitchers of Gideon's soldiers, from which, at the end of the march, they were taken out, and borne in the hand (Judg. vii. 16, 20), we may with certainty infer that they were not, like many of the classical lamps, entirely open at top, but so shaped that the oil could not easily be spilled. This was remarkably the case in the Egyptian specimens, and is not rare in the classical. Gideon's lamps must also have had handles; but that the Hebrew lamps were always furnished with handles we are not bound to infer: in Egypt we find lamps both with and without handles.

Although the lamp-oils of the Hebrews were exclusively vegetable, it is probable that animal fat was used, as it is at present by the Western Asiatics, by being placed in a kind of lamp, and burnt by means of a wick inserted in it. This we have often witnessed in districts where oil-yielding plants are not common.

Cotton wicks are now used throughout Asia; but the Hebrews, like the Egyptians, probably employed the outer and coarser fibre of flax (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xix. 1); and perhaps linen yarn, if the Rabbins are correct in alleging that the linen dresses of the priests were unravelled when old, to furnish wicks for the sacred lamps. [CANDLE-STICK.]

It seems that the Hebrews, like the modern Orientals, were accustomed to burn lamps over-night in their chambers; and this practice may appear to give point to the expression of 'outer-darkness,' which repeatedly occurs in the New Testament (Matt. viii. 12; xxii. 13); the force is greater, however, when the contrast implied in the term outer is viewed with reference to the effect produced by sudden expulsion into the darkness of night from a chamber highly illuminated for an entertainment. This custom of burning lamps at night, with the effect produced by their going out or being extinguished, supplies various figures to the sacred writers (2 Sam. xxi. 17; Prov. xiii. 9; xx. 20). And, on the other hand, the keeping up of a lamp's light is used as a symbol of enduring and unbroken succession (1 Kings xi. 36; xv. 4; Ps. cxxxii. 17).

It appears from Matt. xxv. 1, that the Jews used lamps and torches in their marriage-ceremonies, or rather when the bridegroom came to conduct home the bride by night. This is still the custom in those parts of the East where, on account of the heat of the day, the bridal procession takes place in the night-time. The connection of lamps and torches with marriage-ceremonies often appears also in the classical poets (Homer, Iliad, xviii. 492; Eurip. Phæniss. 346; Medea, 1027; Virg. Eclog. viii. 29); and indeed Hymen, the god of marriage, was figured as bearing a torch. The same connection, it may be observed, is still preserved in Western Asia, even where it is no longer usual to bring home the bride by night. During two, or three, or more nights preceding the wedding, the street or quarter in which the bridegroom lives is illuminated with chandeliers and lanterns, or with lanterns and small lamps suspended from cords drawn across from the bridegroom's and several other houses on each side to the houses opposite; and several small silk flags, each of two colours, generally red and green, are attached to other cords (Lane's Mod. Egypt., i. 201). A modern lantern much used on these occasions, with lamps hung about it and suspended from it, is represented in the following cut (No. 311). The lamps used separately on such occasions are represented in the following cut (No. 312). Figs. 1, 3, and 5, show very distinctly the shape of these lamps, with the conical receptacle of wood which serves to protect the flame from the wind. Lamps of this kind are sometimes hung over doors. The shape in fig. 3 is also that of a much-used in-door lamp. It is a small vessel of glass, having a small tube at the bottom, in which is stuck a wick formed of cotton twisted round a piece of straw: some water is poured in first, and then the oil. Lamps very nearly of this shape appear on the Egyptian monuments, and they seem also to be of glass (Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, iii. 101; v. 376). If the Egyptians had lamps of glass, there is no reason why the Jews also might not have had them, especially as this material is more proper for lamps intended to be hung up, and therefore to cast their light down from above. The Jews certainly used lamps in other festivals besides those of marriage. The Roman satirist (Persius, Sat. v. 179) expressly describes them as making illuminations at their festivals by lamps hung up and arranged in an orderly manner; and the Scriptural intimations, so far as they go, agree with this description. If this custom had not been so general in the ancient and modern East, it might have been supposed that the Jews adopted it from the Egyptians, who, according to Herodotus (ii. 62), had a 'Feast of Lamps,' which was celebrated at Sais, and, indeed, throughout the country at a certain season of the year. The description which the historian gives of the lamps employed on this occasion strictly applies to those in modern use already described, and the concurrence of both these sources of illustration strengthens the probable analogy of Jewish usage. He speaks of them as 'small vases filled with salt and olive-oil, in which the wick floated, and burnt during the whole night.' It does not, indeed, appear of what materials these vases were made;

312.

but we may reasonably suppose them to have been of glass.

The later Jews had even something like this feast among themselves. A 'Feast of Lamps' was held every year on the twenty-fifth of the month Chisleu. It was founded by Judas Maccabæus in celebration of the restoration of the temple-worship (Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 7), and has ever since been observed by the lighting up of lamps or candles on that day in all the countries of their dispersion (Maimon. Mosh. Hashanah, fol. 8). Other Orientals have at this day a similar feast, of which the 'Feast of Lanterns' among the Chinese is, perhaps, the best known (Davis's Chinese, p. 138).—J. K.

LAMPE, FRIEDRICH ADOLPH, a distinguished divine of the Reformed Church in the 18th century. He was born Feb. 19, 1683, at Detmold, the capital of the small principality of Lippe-Detmold. He studied first at Bremen, then at Franeker, and afterwards, for a short time, at Utrecht. At Franeker the leading professors were followers of J. Cocceius, and Lampe's theological tendencies are those of the Cocceian school. After labouring as pastor at Weeze (near Cleves), Duisburg, and Bremen, successively, he was invited in 1720 to a chair of theology at Utrecht. In 1726 he was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history in the same university. In the following year he returned to Bremen, being invited to the joint offices of professor of theology and pastor of the church. He died Dec. 8, 1729. His exegetical works are—1. Exercitationum Sacrorum Duodecim, quibus Psalmus XLV. perpetuo commentario explanatur, immixtis variis ad sensum Sacra Scriptura Hieroglyphicis et Antiquitates Sacras spectantibus, Brem. 1715, 4to. 2. A dissertation on Sacred Chronology and on Jewish and Christian Chronologists, published in 1723 as a preface to Hottinger's Pentateuch dissertationum biblico-chronologicarum. 3. Commentarius analytico-exegeticus Evangelii secundum Johannem, Amst. 1724-25, 3 vols. 4to. 4. A posthumous work published by D. Gerdes, entitled, F. A. Lampe meditationum exegeticarum opera anecdota, Groningæ 1741, 4to; Basil 1742, 4to. This work contains a commentary on the Songs of Degrees, a commentary on Ecclesiastes, and annotations on the Apocalypse. 5. A series of dissertations in further elucidation (chiefly) of the Gospel of John, contained in the work, also posthumous, entitled, F. A. Lampe, dissertationum philologico-theologicarum Syntagma, Amstel. 1737, 2 vols. 4to. The titles of these dissertations are—De titulo evangelii Johannis; De Scala Jacobi; De sinu Patris; De generatione ex aqua et Spiritu; De locis N. T. quæ de Αβρυ ὑποστατικῶς agere videntur; De loco Ps. xxxiii. 6; De locis V. T. quæ de Αβρυ ὑποστ. agere dubitantur; De descensu Christi in inferiores partes terræ.—S. N.

LAMY or LAMI (BERNARD), a learned Roman Catholic divine, born at Mans in 1640, commenced his education at the college of his native place, and completed it under the Fathers of the Oratory in Paris. He speedily gained a considerable reputation, and became successively Professor of Belles-lettres at Vendôme and Juilly, and of philosophy at Saumur and Angers. In the latter city Lamy's zealous advocacy of the Cartesian philosophy raised most violent opposition from the Thomists, who were then in the ascendancy, and who procured an

'arrêt du conseil,' condemnatory of his teaching (August 6, 1675), and prohibiting him from exercising any ecclesiastical or educational function in France. Abandoned by the superiors of the Oratory, who weakly yielded to the storm, Lamy retreated first to St. Martin in Dauphigny, and then to Grenoble, where he found an enlightened protector in the bishop, Cardinal de Camus, by whose influence, at the end of eight months, his sentence was partially revoked, and he was permitted to preach theology in that city. In 1686 he was recalled to Paris, where he passed a tranquil life, until the controversy with M. de Harlay, Archbishop of Paris, caused by the publication of his Harmony, forced him to retire to Rouen, where he spent the remainder of his life in study and devotion. He died January 29, 1715. Lamy lived an ascetic life, and was as remarkable for his piety as for his extensive learning, nor did the controversies in which he engaged impair the gentleness and humility of his character. His range of knowledge was very wide, as his printed works, embracing rhetoric, geometry, arithmetic, mechanics, perspective, etc., testify, and his contributions to theology, in spite of defective arrangement and some ill-founded theories, long sustained a well-deserved reputation. The following are the principal:—(1.) Apparatus ad Biblia sacra, Grenoble 1687, originally no more than tables of the chief facts of Scripture, with rules for its study, compiled for his pupils at Grenoble; published in a much enlarged form at Lyons in 1696, under the title Apparatus Biblicus. This, which in its day was perhaps the best 'introduction' to the Bible extant, was more than once translated, into French (by Bellegarde, and by Boyer, at the request of the Bishop of Chalons, Lyons 1699) and English (London 1728). (2.) Demonstration de la vérité et de la sainteté de la morale Chrétienne, Paris 1688, ed. 2, 1706-1711, an answer to the sceptical objectors of the day. (3.) Harmonia quatuor Evangelistarum, Paris 1689, a work which gave rise to much controversy, and many objections, to which he replied in (4.) Commentarius in Harmoniam, to which was annexed, Apparatus Chronol. et Geograph., Paris 1699, a work more generally esteemed than the Harmony itself. The theories which provoked the most vehement opposition, and finally drove Lamy from Paris, were (a) that our Lord did not celebrate the Jewish Passover with his disciples (now generally accepted by the soundest scholars); (b) that John the Baptist was imprisoned twice; by the Sanhedrim and by Herod; and (c) that the three Marys mentioned in the Gospels are identical. Lamy's last work, De Tabernaculo fœderis, de Sanct. civitat. Jêrus. et de templo ejus, Paris 1720, to which he had devoted more than thirty years of assiduous labour and research, and for which he had had illustrations prepared by the most skilful artists, did not appear till after his death, under the editorship of Père Desmolins.—E. LANGUAGE. [TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.]

LANIADO, ABRAHAM B. ISAAC, an Italian Rabbi and commentator, flourished 1580-1620. He wrote—(1.) A work on the mysteries of the Mosaic Law, entitled סֵפֶר אֲבְרָהָם, The Shidd of Abraham, which consists of seventeen treatises and discourses on circumcision, marriage, almsgiving, confession of sins, repentance, and mourning for the dead. It was printed in Venice 1603, and is very highly esteemed by the Jews. (2.) A commentary on the Song of Songs, entitled שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים, Songs of Silver, which was edited by Moses Laniado, with the Hebrew text, the Commentary of Rashi, the Chaldee Paraphrase, with a Spanish translation by the editor, printed in Hebrew characters, Venice 1619. He also wrote (3.) A commentary on the Pentateuch, and (4.) A commentary on Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, which have not as yet been published.—C. D. G.

LANIADO, SAMUEL B. ABRAHAM, flourished about 1580. He wrote—(1.) A commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled כֵּל חַמּוּדָה, Delightful Vessel, which was first published in Venice 1594-1595. He explains the Pentateuch according to the Sabbatic Lessons [HAPHTARA] in the Midrashic manner. (2.) A commentary on Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, entitled כֵּל יָקָר, Precious Vessel, which was first published in Venice 1603, and excerpts of it are printed in Frankfürter's Rabbinic Bible [FRANKFURTER]. It consists chiefly of extracts from the expositions of Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Ralbag, etc. (3.) A commentary on Isaiah, called כֵּל טָהוֹר, A Vessel of Pure Gold, Venice 1657. It is a very lengthy commentary, and, like the former, is chiefly made up from the expositions of Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Ralbag, etc. Comp. LANTERN (φάρος). This word occurs only in John xviii. 3, where the party of men which went out of Jerusalem to apprehend Jesus in the garden of Gethsemane is described as being provided 'with lanterns and torches.' In the article LAMP it has been shown that the Jewish lantern, or, if we may so call it, lamp-frame, was similar to that now in use among the Orientals. Another of the same kind is represented in the annexed engraving (No. 313, fig. 1).

As the streets of eastern towns are not lighted at night, and never were so, lanterns are used to an extent not known among us. Such, doubtless, was also formerly the case; and it is therefore remarkable that the only trace of a lantern which the Egyptian monuments offer, is that contained in the present engraving (No. 314). In this case it seems to be borne by the night-watch, or civic guard, and is shaped like those in common use among ourselves. A similar lantern is at this day used in Persia, and perhaps does not materially differ from those mentioned in Scripture. More common at present in Western Asia is a large folding lantern of waxed cloth strained over rings of wire, with a top and bottom of tinned copper (No. 313, figs. 2, 3). It is usually about two feet long by nine inches in diameter, and is carried by servants before their masters, who often pay visits to their friends at or after supper-time. In many Eastern towns the municipal law forbids any one to be in the streets after nightfall without a lantern. —J. K.

LAODICEA (Λαοδικεα). There were several places of this name, four of which it may be well to distinguish, in order to prevent them from being confounded with one another. The first was in the western part of Phrygia, on the borders of Lydia; the second, in the eastern part of the same country, denominated Laodicea Combusta; the third, on the coast of Syria, called Laodicea ad Mare, and serving as the port of Aleppo; and the fourth, in the same country, called Laodicea ad Libanum, from its proximity to that mountain. The third of these, that on the coast of Syria, was destroyed by the great earthquake of Aleppo in August 1822, and at the time of that event was supposed by many to be the Laodicea of Scripture, although in fact not less than four hundred miles from it. But the first named, lying on the confines of Phrygia and Lydia, about forty miles east of Ephesus, is the only Laodicea mentioned in Scripture, and is that one of the 'seven churches in Asia,' to which St. John was commissioned to deliver the awful warning contained in Rev. iii.

14-19. The fulfilment of this warning is to be sought, as we take it, in the history of the Christian church which existed in that city, and not in the stone and mortar of the city itself; for it is not the city, but 'the church of the Laodiceans,' which is denounced. It is true that the city is utterly ruined; but this is the case with innumerable other towns in Asia Minor. It is the precise reference to the seven churches as such, without any other reference to the cities than as giving them a name, which imparts a marked distinction to the Apocalyptic prophecies. But this has been little heeded by writers on the subject, who somewhat unaccountably seek, in the actual and material condition of these cities, the accomplishment of spiritual warnings and denunciations. At the present day, would an authorised denunciation of 'the church in London,' as in danger of being cast forth for its lukewarmness, be understood to imply that London itself was destined to become a heap of ruins, with its bridges broken down, and its palaces and temples overthrown?

Laodicea was the capital of Greater Phrygia, and a very considerable city at the time it was named in Scripture (Strabo, p. 578); but the frequency of earthquakes, to which this district has always been liable, demolished, some ages after, great part of the city, destroyed many of the inhabitants, and eventually obliged the remainder to abandon the spot altogether. Smith, in his Journey to the Seven Churches (1671), was the first to describe the site of Laodicea. He was followed by Chandler and Pococke; and the locality has, within the present century, been visited by Mr. Hartley, Mr. Arundell, and Col. Leake.

Laodicea is now a deserted place, called by the Turks Eski-hissar (Old Castle), a Turkish word equivalent to Paleo-kastro, which the Greeks so frequently apply to ancient sites. From its ruins, Laodicea seems to have been situated upon six or seven hills, taking up a large extent of ground. To the north and north-east runs the river Lycus, about a mile and a half distant; but nearer it is watered by two small streams, the Asopus and Caprus, the one to the west, and the other to the south-east, both passing into the Lycus, which last flows into the Mæander (Smith, p. 85).

Laodicea preserves great remains of its importance as the residence of the Roman governors of Asia under the emperors; namely, a stadium, in uncommon preservation, three theatres, one of which is 450 feet in diameter, and the ruins of several other buildings (Antiq. of Ionia, pt. ii., p. 32; Chandler's Asia Minor, c. 67). Col. Leake says: 'There are few ancient sites more likely than Laodicea to preserve many curious remains of antiquity beneath the surface of the soil; its opulence, and the earthquakes to which it was subject, rendering it probable that valuable works of art were often there buried beneath the ruins of the public and private edifices (Cicero, Epist. ad Amic., ii. 17; iii. 5; v. 20; Tacit. Annal. xiv. 27). And a similar remark, though in a lesser degree, perhaps, will apply to the other cities of the vale of the Mæander, as well as to some of those situated to the north of Mount Tmolus; for Strabo (pp. 579, 628, 630) informs us that Philadelphia, Sardis, and Magnesia of Sipylus, were, not less than Laodicea and the cities of the Mæander as far as Apameia at the sources of that river, subject to the same dreadful calamity' (Geography of Asia Minor, p. 253).

LAPIDE, CORNELIUS A, is the Latin designation usually given to CORNEILLE DE LA PIERRE, which is itself the translation of his native name, VAN DER STEEN. This eminent commentator was born in the year 1567, at Bocheff or Bucold, in the diocese of Liege, in Belgium. In 1592 he entered the Society of the Jesuits, and gave himself up to the study of Holy Scripture. For twenty years he was Divinity Professor at Louvain, after which he pursued the same avocation with extreme assiduity at Rome, where he died greatly respected for his unaffected piety and profound learning, March 12, 1637. His commentaries, which were published at first in separate portions at Antwerp and Paris, 1616-1639, have been since issued in more than one collective edition; at Venice, 1740, in eleven folio volumes; at Lyons, 1838, in the same number of quarto volumes; and very recently, 1861, at Paris, in twenty-one imperial-octavos. This last edition is enriched with copious and well-selected notes from Rosenmüller, Maurer, Michaelis, Munk, Rénan, Franck, Patritius, Kuinoel, Allioli, and others, by the help of whom the learned editors (the Abbés Crampon and Péronne) have to a great extent supplemented the defects and corrected the inaccuracies of the original work. The author's devotion to his church has strongly coloured his comment; this fact, added to the prolixity wherewith he investigates what he considers the various senses of the sacred text (the mystical, analogical, and allegorical being no less conspicuous than the literal, historical, and grammatical) has raised a prejudice against a Lapidé's great work in some quarters (see Herzog, Real-Encykl., iii. 153). It must, however, in justice be admitted that, after all deductions on this score, this commentary justifies the popularity which it has always commanded in the Church of Rome. The convenient method and perspicuity with which the author has carefully arranged his abundant materials, and the promptitude with which he has invariably decided what he thinks to be the true meaning of the text, go far to obviate the evils of his prolixity and multiplicity of senses. Nowhere else can the student find collected so rich a treasury of patristic and scholastic exegesis, and the general value of this honest and pious commentator is proved by the frequency with which he is quoted by authors beyond his own communion, of unimpeachable impartiality, such as De Wette and Meyer. Corn. a Lapidé did not live to complete his annotations on Job and the Psalms. In the older editions Pineda (on Job) and Le Blanc (on the Psalms) used to supplement these wanting portions. In the reissue of the work from the press of M. Louis Vivès, the editors have done wisely in substituting the compact commentaries of the learned Jesuit Corder, on Job, and Cardinal Bellarmine, on the Psalms. These works, in three extra volumes, complete the entire circle of the Canonical and Apocryphal Scriptures—presenting the student with the marrow of ancient exegesis, embellished moreover with the best criticism of modern writers of the greatest merit. Some portions of Cornelius a Lapidé (especially on the Pentateuch, the Historical Books, and the Hagiographa) have been included in the Abbé Migne's Scriptura Sacra Cursus Completus. In the 24th and 25th volumes of this Cursus is reprinted the valuable Epitome Comment. Estii et Cornelii à Lapidé in omnes D. Pauli Epistolas, which Gorcomius (Johannes a Gorcum) carefully prepared at the beginning of the 17th century. This abridgment of what has often been deemed the best part of a Lapidé's work, is a useful work.—P. H.

LAPIDOTH (לִּפְדוֹת; LXX. Λαφιδούθ), mentioned in Judg. iv. 4, and supposed to be the name of Deborah's husband. The expression, however, is ambiguous, since לִּפְדוֹת may as well mean 'a woman of Lapidoth' (cf. Tennyson, 'Like that great dame of Lapidoth'), but no place of such a name is known to have existed. Others again, since Lapidoth is the plural of לָפִיד, 'a lamp' (although in the Bible only the form לָפִידִים occurs), do not consider it as a proper name at all, but render it 'a woman of splendours,' i. e., noble and divinely inspired; or 'woman of lamps,' since the Rabbis say that she had the charge of the Tabernacle lamps. Setting aside these idle conjectures, it remains nearly certain, that Lapidoth is the name of the unknown husband of the great prophetess. The feminine form of the word is no difficulty; cf. מִקְלֹת, 1 Chron. xxvii. 4; כִּרְמוֹת, Ezra viii. 33 (Bertheau, Buch d. Richter, p. 76).—F. W. F.

LAPWING. [DUKHIPHATH.]

LARDNER, NATHANIEL, D.D., a learned nonconformist author and preacher, was born in 1684, at Hawkhurst, in Kent. He studied first in London, next in Utrecht, where his studies were pursued under the direction of the celebrated professors Graevius and Burman, and also in Leyden. He commenced preaching at Stoke-Newington in 1709, but failing, from his cold manner and feeble utterance, to gain acceptance, he entered the family of Lady Treby as chaplain and tutor. Still cherishing a strong desire to be useful as a preacher, he was appointed in 1724 to deliver the Tuesday Evening lecture at the Old Jewry. To this appointment we owe his great work on the Credibility of the Gospel History, in five quarto volumes, the preparation of which extended from 1727 to 1743. The work is unequalled for the extent and accuracy of its investigations into the credibility of the gospel history. No greater work has ever been produced on the same subject. Recent researches supplement it, but it is not likely that they will ever supersede it. Lardner's doctrinal sentiments inclined to Unitarianism. In 1729 he published his Vindication of Three of our Blessed Lord's Miracles in answer to Woolston, and in 1759 his celebrated Letter on the Logos. His collected works, with a Memoir by Dr. Kippis, were published in 1788 in 11 vols. 8vo, and republished in 6 vols. 4to in 1815. After preaching for several years to a congregation in Crutched Friars, Dr. Lardner died at Hawkhurst on the 24th of July 1768.—W. J. C.

LASEA (Lasala; Λ, Λασσάλα; Α, Ἀλάσσα; Β, Λασάλα; Thalassa). When the Apostle Paul, on his eventful voyage to Rome, 'was passing under Crete, over against Salmone,' the historian tells us that, 'hardly passing it (the vessel) came into a place which is called the Fair Havens, nigh whereunto was the city Lasæ' (Acts xxvii. 8). The Peutinger Table marks a town called Lisia in Crete, and Pliny (iv. 12) mentions Lasos (or Alos, as it is in some copies) as one of the cities of that island. These may probably be identical with Lasea (Conybeare and Howson, vol. ii., p. 330, 1st ed.) Until very recently the site of this town was altogether unknown. It was discovered in 1856, and the site carefully examined by the Rev. G. Brown. It lies about the middle of the southern coast of Crete, some five miles east of Fair Havens, and close to Cape Leonda. Mr. Brown describes the ruins as follows:—'Inside the cape, to the eastward, the beach is lined with masses of masonry. These were formed of small stones cemented together with mortar so firmly that even where the sea had undermined them huge fragments lay on the sand. This sea-wall extended a quarter of a mile along the beach from one rocky face to another, and was evidently intended for the defence of the city. Above we found the ruins of two temples. The steps which led up to the one remain, though in a shattered state. Many shafts, and a few capitals of Grecian pillars, all of marble, lie scattered about, and a gully worn by a torrent lays bare the substructions down to the rock. To the east a conical rocky hill is girdled by a wall; and on a platform between this hill and the sea, the pillars of another edifice lie level with the ground. Some peasants came down to see us from the hills above, and I asked them the name of the place. They said at once 'Lasea' (Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, app. iv., p. 262, 2d ed.) This interesting and important discovery throws much light on this part of the apostle's voyage, and affords additional proof of the minute accuracy of Luke's topographical notices (see Alford, Greek Test., Prolegomena to Acts, Excursus I, 3d ed.)—J. L. P.

LASHA (לָשָׁה; Λασα; Lesa, and Lasa), a place mentioned in Gen. x. 19 as marking the utmost border of the ancient Canaanites. Their border was 'from Sidon unto Gaza; towards (בְּמִצְרָיִם) Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, unto Lasha.' Lasha thus appears to have been situated east, or north-east, of the cities of the Plain, and consequently beyond the Dead Sea. The name is only casually mentioned in the Onomasticon of Eusebius; but upon the passage in Genesis, Jerome says, 'hoc tantum annotandum videtur, quod Lise (sic) ipsa sit, quæ nunc Callirhoe dicitur, ubi aquæ calidæ prorumpentes in mare Mortuum defluunt' (Quæst. in Gen., Opp., iii. 321; ed. Migne). This conjecture is highly probable. The position of Callirhoe agrees in all respects with the Mosaic narrative; and the name would seem to favour the view.

لَسَع appears to be equivalent to the Arabic لَسَع, 'a fissure,' 'perhaps used of chasms in the earth, and fountains' (Gesenius, Thes., s. v.) Callirhoe is situated in a narrow wild ravine which falls into the Dead Sea, near its north-eastern angle. The scenery is very romantic. The cliffs rise up in jagged frowning masses, variously coloured—red, grey, and black—while the whole bottom of the ravine is densely filled with foliage. Canes, aspens, tamarisks, and palms are intermixed with the bright and beautiful oleander. A copious stream of hot water, fed by numerous hot springs, dashes along a rocky torrent-bed, throwing up clouds of white steam, and tinging every stone and cliff-side in its track with the bright yellow of the sulphur with which it is largely impregnated. Around the springs, which are about three miles from the lake, are some ruins, strewn all over with broken pottery. Here stood the baths once so famous for their medicinal properties, where Herod the Great went, by the advice of his physicians, during his last illness (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 6. 5; cf. Pliny, v. 16). The water at the fountain has a temperature of about 96° Fahr.; the stream is about twelve feet wide and one foot deep, with a very rapid current; and the chasm is not more than thirty yards across (Irby and Mangles, p. 467, 1st ed.; Lynch, Official Report, May 4; Handbk., pp. 201, 300; Reland, Pal., 302; Ritter, Pal. und Syr., ii. 572). A short distance south of this ravine (which is now called Wady Zurka Main) are other warm springs, and beside them a ruined town called Sara (Ritter, l.c.; Seetzen, Reise, ii. 336). Dean Stanley suggests that Callirhoe may be identical with the En-eglaim of Ezek. xlvii. 10 (S. and P., p. 289). This, however, is mere conjecture. We have no data by which to fix the site of En-eglaim.—J. L. P.

LASHARON (לָשָׁרוֹן; wanting in the Sept.; Saron). This obscure name has given rise to considerable discussion among critics. It is only found in Josh. xii. 18, where, in the list of the old Canaanitish kings conquered by the Israelites, we read, 'The king of Lasharon one.' Verses 18-22 are wanting in the Vatican Codex of the Septuagint; and this name, with a few others, is also left out in the Alexandrine. They are now found in all Hebrew MSS. Jerome renders the clause, Rex Saron unus, from which it appears that he considered the ל to be a preposition prefixed (with the art. ה, represented by the dagesh in ש) to the proper name לָשָׁרוֹן; and in this view he is followed by a number of scholars, as Clericus, Michaelis, etc. (Critica Sacra, ad loc.) In the same manner it is said מֶלֶךְ לִישָׁרָאֵל means 'king of Israel.' This, however, is contrary to the usage of the context, where every other town is connected with מֶלֶךְ, 'king,' in the ordinary construct state, without any such prefix. We conclude, therefore, that Lasharon is the real name. The Targum reads מלכא דלשרון, and the Arabic version also لشرון (see Keil, Comment. on Joshua; Rosenmüller, ad loc.) The highest authorities are in favour of the ordinary reading, notwithstanding the argument of Gesenius (see, however, Thesaurus, p. 642; and compare Bochart, Opp. ii. 307). The site of Lasharon is unknown. Masius supposes it to be the place mentioned in Acts ix. 35, where the reading of some MSS. is Ἀσάδωνα, instead of Σάδωνα; but there is no evidence to support such a view.—J. L. P.

LASTHENES (Λασθένης), the minister of Demetrius II. Nicator. He appears to have been a Cretan, and was general of the Cretan forces who assisted Demetrius with a number of mercenaries to regain his kingdom from Alexander Balas in B.C. 148 or 147 (cf. 1 Maccab. x. 67; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 4. 3). His arbitrary government, added to his persuading Demetrius to disband the regular troops and only employ Cretans, is supposed to have alienated the subjects from the king, and caused great dissatisfaction to the soldiers. This conduct led to the downfall of Demetrius, for it enabled Tryphon (Diodotus) to set up Antiochus, the young son of Alexander Balas (Diod. Reliq., lib. xxxiii. 4, ed. Didot, vol. ii. p. 522).

What became of Lasthenes is not known, and he must not be identified with the Chulian instructor of the sons of Demetrius I. Soter (Just. xv. 2; cf. Livy, Epit. 52). There is a later Lasthenes, also a Cretan, who took a prominent part against the Romans in B.C. 70-68 (Smith's Dict. of Biog., s. v. Lasthenes, No. 3).

Lasthenes is described as 'cousin' (συγγενής, 1 Maccab. xi. 31; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 4. 9) and 'father' (1 Maccab. xi. 32; Joseph. Antiq., l.c.). Both are honourable titles, and the latter is more especially equivalent to 'friend,' or 'supreme counsellor' (Gesen. Thes., s. v. בֵּן; cf. Grimm on 1 Maccab. x. 89, and 1 Maccab. xi. 32).—F. W. M.

LATCHET (לָשֶׁת; σφουρητήρ, luds). The thong used to fasten the shoes or sandals of the ancients; in modern terms, a shoe-tie or boot-lace. The earliest mention of it is in Gen. xiv. 23, where it is employed to express a thing of the least possible value, 'I will not take from a thread (חוט) even to a shoe latchet' (לָשֶׁת קֶעַל). It occurs also in Is. v. 47. In the N. T. it is found in a remarkable declaration of John the Baptist, in which he expresses his inferiority to the Messiah (Mark i. 7; Luke iii. 16; John i. 27). In Matt. iii. 11 the same sentiment is expressed rather differently, 'whose shoes I am not worthy to bear;' in both cases the allusion is to slaves, who were employed to loosen and carry their master's shoes, the habits of Orientals requiring this article of dress to be taken off before entering an apartment (Thomson, The Land and the Book, pt. i. ch. 9). This saying of the Baptist, as reported by Matthew, is repeated by Paul in his address to the Jews at Antioch, in Pisidia (Acts xiii. 25). Chrysostom, on John i. 27, remarks, τὸ γὰρ ὑποδήμα λύσαι τῆς ἐσχάτης διακονίας ἐστίν.—J. E. R.

LATINISMS. This word, which properly signifies idioms or phraseology peculiar to the Latin tongue, is extended by Biblical critics so as to include also the Latin words occurring in the Greek Testament. It is but reasonable to expect the existence of Latinisms in the language of every country subdued by the Romans. The introduction of their civil and military officers, of settlers, and merchants, would naturally be followed by an infusion of Roman terms, etc., into the language of their new subjects. There would be many new things made known to some of them, for which they could find no corresponding word in their own tongues. The circumstance that the proceedings in courts of law were, in every part of the Roman empire, conducted in the Latin language, would necessarily cause the introduction of many Roman words into the department of law, as might be amply illustrated from the present state of the juridical language in every country once subject to the Romans, and, among others, our own. Valerius Maximus (ii. 2. 2), indeed, records the tenacity of the ancient Romans for their language in their intercourse with the Greeks, and their strenuous endeavours to propagate it through all their dominions. The Latinisms in the N. T. are of three kinds, consisting (1) of Latin words in Greek letters; (2) of Latin senses of Greek words; and (3) of those forms of speech which are more properly called Latinisms. The following may suffice as examples of each of these: First, Latin words in Greek characters: ἀσάπριον, 'farthing,' from the Latin assarinus (Matt. x. 29). This word is used likewise by Plutarch, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Athenæus, as may be seen in Wetstein, in loc. Ἐφῆρας, sensus (Matt. xvii. 25): κεντυρίων, centurio (Mark xv. 39), etc.: λεγεών, legio, 'legion' (Matt. xxvi. 53). Polybius (B.C. 150) has also adopted the Roman military terms (vi. 17, ff.) σπεκουλάτωρ, speculator, 'a spy,' from speculo, 'to look about;' or, as Wahl and Schleusner think, from spiculum, the weapon carried by the speculator. The word describes the emperor's life-guards, who, among other duties, punished the condemned; hence 'an executioner' (Mark vi. 27), margin, 'one of his guard;' (comp. Tacitus, Hist. i. 25; Joseph. De Bell. Jud. i. 33. 7; Seneca, De Ira, i. 16). μάκελλον, from macellum, 'a market-place for flesh' (1 Cor. x. 25). As Corinth was now a Roman colony, it is only consistent to find that the inhabitants had adopted this name for their public market, and that Paul, writing to them, should employ it. μίλιον (Matt. v. 41). This word is also used by Polybius (xxvii. 11. 8) and Strabo (v. p. 332). Secondly, Latin senses of Greek words: as καρπός (Rom. xv. 28), 'fruit,' where it seems to be used in the sense of emolumentum, 'gain upon money lent,' etc.: ἔπαινος, 'praise,' in the juridical sense of elogium, a testimonial either of honour or reproach (1 Cor. iv. 5). Thirdly, those forms of speech which are properly called Latinisms: as βουλούμενος τῷ ὅχλῳ τὸ ἱκανὸν ποιῆσαι, 'willing to content the people' (Mark xv. 15), which corresponds to the phrase satisfacere alicui: λαβεῖν τὸ ἱκανὸν παρὰ, 'to take security of,' satis accipere ab (Acts xvii. 9): δοῖς ἐργασίας, 'give diligence,' da operam (Luke xii. 58); the phrase remittere ad alium iudicem is retained in Luke xxiii. 15: ὁ δὲ βέβη, 'see thou to that,' tu videris (Matt. xxvii. 4) (Arigler, Hermeneut. Biblica, Vienna 1813, p. 99; Michaelis' Introduction to the N. T., by Marsh, Cambridge 1793, vol. i. part i. p. 163, sqq.). The importance of the Latinisms in the Greek Testament consists in this, that, as we have partly shown (and the proof might be much extended), they are to be found in the best Greek writers of the same era. Their occurrence, therefore, in the N. T. adds one thread more to that complication of probabilities with which the Christian history is attended. Had the Greek Testament been free from them, the objection, though recondite, would have been strong. At the same time the subject is intricate, and admits of much discussion. Dr. Marsh disputes some of the instances adduced by Michaelis (ut supra, p. 431, sqq.). Desingier even contends that there are no Latinisms in the N. T. (De Latinismis, Leipsig 1726; and see his Vindiciae Dissertationis de Latinismis). Even Arigler allows that some instances adduced by him may have a purely Greek origin. Truth, as usual, lies in the middle, and there are, no doubt, many irrefragable instances of Latinisms, which will amply require the attention of the student (see Georgii Hierocli. de Latinismis Novi Test., Witteberg 1733; Kypke, Observ. Sacr., ii. 219, Wratis 1755; Pritii Introductio in Lect. Nov. Test., p. 207, sqq., Lips. 1722. Winer refers also to Wernsdorff, De Christo Latine loquente, p. 19; Jahn's Archiv. ii. iv.; Olearius, De Stylo Nov. Test., p. 368, sqq.; Jnchofer, Sacra Latinitatis Historia, Prag. 1742; see Bibl. Real-Wörterbuch, art. Römer, Römisches, etc.)—J. F. D.

LATIN VERSIONS. Under this head we shall give some account of—1. The versions of the sacred Scriptures in the Latin tongue anterior to that of Jerome; 2. The version of Jerome commonly called the Vulgate; and 3. Those which have been executed in later times.

I. ANTE-HIERONYMIAN VERSIONS.—The early and extensive diffusion of Christianity among the Latin-speaking people, renders it probable that means would be used to supply the Christians who used that language with versions of the Scriptures in their own tongue, especially those resident in countries where the Greek language was less generally known. That from an early period such means were used cannot be doubted; but the information which has reached us is so scanty, that we are not in circumstances to arrive at certainty on many points of interest connected with the subject. It is even matter of debate whether there were several translations or one translation variously corrupted or emended.

The first writer by whom reference is supposed to be made to a Latin version is Tertullian, in the words: 'Sciamus plane non sic esse in græco authentico, quomodo in usum exiit per duarum syllabarum aut callidam aut simplicem eversionem,' etc. (De Monogamia, c. 11). It is possible that Tertullian has in view here a version in use among the African Christians; but it is by no means certain that such is his meaning, for he may refer merely to the manner in which the passage in question had come to be usually cited, without intending to intimate that it was so written in any formal version. The probability that such is really his meaning is greatly heightened, when we compare his language here with similar expressions in other parts of his writings. Thus, speaking of the Logos, he says, 'Hanc Græci Ἀβύρον dicunt, quo vocabulo etiam sermonem appellamus. Ideoque in usu est nostrorum per simplicitatem interpretationis, Sermonem, dicere, in primordio apud Deum esse' (Adv. Prax., c. 5); where he seems to have in view simply the colloquial usage of his Christian compatriots (comp. also Adv. Marc., c. 4 and c. 9). The testimony of Augustine is more precise. He says (De Doct. Christ., ii. 11): 'Qui Scripturas in Hebræa lingua in Græcam verterunt numerari possunt, latini autem interpretes nullo modo. Ut enim cuiquam primis fidei temporibus in manus venit codex græcus et aliquid tantulum facultatis sibi utriusque linguæ Latine videbatur, ausus est interpretari.' A few sentences before he speaks of the 'Latinorum interpretum infinita varietas;' and he proceeds to give instances how one of these versions elucidates another, and to speak of the defects attaching to all of them. This testimony not only clearly establishes the fact of the existence of Latin versions in the beginning of the 4th century, but goes to prove that these were numerous; for that Augustine has in view a number of interpreters, and not merely a variety of recensions, is evident from his statement in this same connection, 'in ipsis interpretationibus itala cæteris præferatur, nam est verborum tenacior cum perspicuitate sententiæ;' and from his speaking elsewhere (Cont. Faustum, ii. 2) of 'codices aliarum regionum.' On the other hand, the testimony of Hilary is in favour of only one Latin version: 'Latina translatio non virtutem dicti ignorat magnam intulit obscuritatem, non discernens ambigui sermonis proprietatem (in Ps. clviii.) On the same side is the declaration of Jerome: 'Si latinis exemplaribus fides est adhibenda respondebunt Quibus? tot sunt enim exemplaria pene quot codices.' That by 'exemplaria' here Jerome refers to what would now be called editions or recensions, is evident from the nature of his statement, for it cannot be supposed that he intends to say that almost every codex presented a distinct translation; and is rendered still more so by what follows: 'Si autem veritas est querenda de pluribus, cur non ad græcam originem revertentes ea quæ vel a vitiosis interpretibus male reddita, vel a præsumptoribus imperitis emendata perversius, vel a libris dormitantibus addita sunt aut mutata corrigamus?' (Præf. in Evangg. Ad. Damas.) Elsewhere (Præf. in Josuam) he says also: 'Apud Latinos tot exemplaria quot codices et unusquisque pro suo arbitrio vel addidit vel subtraxit quod ei visum est;' where there can be no doubt as to his meaning. Jerome frequently uses the expression communis or vulgata editio, but by this he intends the LXX., or the old Latin translation of the LXX. In reference to the Latin N. T. he uses the expressions, latinus interpretes, latini codices, or simply in latino.

The statement of Augustine, that of the interpretations the Itala was preferred, has been supposed to indicate decidedly the existence of several national Latin versions known to him. For this title can only indicate a translation prepared in Italy, or used by the Italian churches,* and presupposes the existence of other versions, which might be known as the Africana, the Hispanica, etc. On the other hand, however, if there was a version known by this name, it seems strange that it should never be mentioned again by Augustine or by any one else; and further, it is remarkable, that to designate an Italian version, he should use the word Itala and not Italica. This has led to the suspicion that this word is an error, and different conjectural emendations have been proposed. Bentley suggested that for itala . . . nam there should be read illa . . . que, a singularly infelicitous emendation, as Hug has shewn (Introd., E. T., p. 267). As Augustine elsewhere speaks of 'codicibus ecclesiasticis interpretationis usitate' (De consensu Evangg., ii. 66), it has been suggested by Potter that for Itala should be read usitata, the received reading having probably arisen from the omission, in the first instance, of the recurrent syllable us between interpretationibus and usitata (thus INTERPRETATIONIBUSITATA), and then the change of the unmeaning itala into itala. Of this emendation many have approved, and if it be adopted, the testimony of Augustine, in this passage, as for a plurality of Latin versions, will be greatly enfeebled, for, by the versio usitata, he would doubtless intend the version in common use as opposed to the unauthorised interpretations of private individuals. As tending to confirm this view of his meaning, it has been observed, that it is extremely improbable that if there was an acknowledged versio Africana, the Christians in Africa would be found preferring to that a version made for the use of the Italians. A new suggestion, relating to this passage, has been offered by Reuss (Gesch. d. Schr. d. N. T., p. 436), 'Is it not possible,' he asks, 'that Augustine may refer, in this passage (written about the year 397), to a work of Jerome, viz., his version of Origen's Hexapla, which Augustine, in one of his letters (Ep. xxviii., tom. ii. p. 61) to Jerome prefers to his making a new translation from the original? 'At any rate,' he adds, 'it is remarkable that Isidore of Spain (Etymol., vi. 5) characterises the translation of Jerome (the last) as verborum tenaciorem et perspicuitate sententia clarior. May one venture to suggest, that he has taken this phrase from Augustine, regarding him as using it of Jerome?' To this, however, it may be replied, that whilst it is not improbable that Isidore took the passage from Augustine, he may have done so without regarding Augustine's words as referring to any work of Jerome. That they do so refer seems to us very improbable.

An effort has been made to obtain a decision for this question from a collation of the extant remains of the ancient Latin texts, but without success. Eichhorn (Einleit. ins. N. T., iv. 337, ff.) has compared several passages found in the writings of the early Latin fathers with certain extant codices of the early Latin text; and from the resemblance which these bear to each other, he argues that they have all been taken from one common translation. In this conclusion many scholars have concurred both before and since the time of Eichhorn (Wetstein, Hody, Semler, Lachmann, Tregelles, Tischendorf), but others have, on the other side, pointed to serious differences of rendering, which, in their judgment, indicate the existence of distinct translations (Michaelis, Hug, De Wette, Bleek, etc.)

As the evidence stands, it seems impossible either to hold by the existence of only one accredited Latin version before the time of Jerome, the corruption of which, from various causes, is sufficient to account for all the discrepancies to be found in the extant remains; or to maintain with certainty that there were several independent versions, the work of persons in different parts of the Latin church. There is, however, a third supposition which may be advanced: There may at an early period, and probably in Africa, have been made a translation of the Bible from the Greek into Latin, and this may have formed the groundwork of other translations, intended to be amended versions of the original. In this case a certain fundamental similarity would mark all these translations along with considerable variety; but this variety would be traceable not to undesigned corruption, but to purposed attempts, more or less skilfully directed, to produce a more adequate version. This supposition meets all the facts of the case, and so far has high probability in its favour. Proceeding upon it, we may further suppose that these different revised or amended translations might have their origin in different parts of the western world; and in this case the meaning of Augustine's statement in the passage (Cont. Faustum, ii. 2) where he speaks of 'codices aliarum regionum,' becomes manifest. In this case, also, if the reading Itala be retained (and most critics incline to retain it) in the famous passage above cited, it will indicate the revision prepared in Italy and used by the Italian churches; of which, it is natural to suppose, that it would be both more exact and more polished than the others; and with which Augustine would become familiar during his residence in Rome and Milan.

Of this ancient Latin version in its various amended forms, all of which it has become customary to include under the general designation Itala, we have remains partly in the citations of the Latin fathers, partly in the Græco-Latin codi-

* The supposition of Wiseman and Lachmann, that the Itala of Augustine was a corrected codex of the one Latin version, written in Italy, cannot be reconciled with Augustine's words in their connection.

ces, and partly in special MSS. A copious collection from the first of these sources (which yet admits of being augmented) has been supplied by Sabatier, Bibliorum SS. Latina Vers. antiqua seu Vetus Itala, etc., quæcunque reperiri potuerunt, Remis 1743, 3 vols. fol., ed. 2, 1749. For the Apocalypse we depend entirely on this source, namely the quotations made by Primasius. The Græco-Latin codices are the Cantabrigian or Codex Beza, the Laudian, the Claromontane, and the Boernerian [MANUSCRIPTS]. Of the known special codices containing portions of the N. T., the following have been printed or collated:—

1. Cod. Vercellensis, written apparently by Eusebius the martyr, in the 4th century; it embraces the four gospels, though with frequent lacuna. It is mentioned by Montfaucon in his Diarium Italicum, p. 445; and it has been edited by Bianchini in Evangeliarum quadruplex latina vers. antiq. seu Vd. Italica, etc., Rom. 1749, 4 vols. fol.; previously and still more carefully by J. A. Irici, SS. Evangeliorum Cod. S. Eusebii manu exaratus, ex autographo ad unguem exhibitus, etc., Mediol. 1748, 2 parts, 4to. In this codex the gospels are arranged in the order Matthew, John, Luke [Lucanus], Mark. As a specimen of the style of this codex, and the imperfect state in which some parts of it are, we give the following passage (John iv. 48-52) from the edition of Irici:—

2. Cod. Veronensis, a MS. of the 4th or 5th century, in the library at Verona, containing the gospels, but with many lacuna; printed by Bianchini.

3. Cod. Brixionus, of about the 6th century, at Brixen in the Tyrol, containing the gospels, with the exception of some parts of Mark; printed by Bianchini.

4. Cod. Corbeijensis, a very ancient MS., from which Martianay edited Matthew's gospel, the Ep. of James, etc., Par. 1695. The gospel appears also in Bianchini's work, and in the appendix to Calmet's commentary on the Apocalypse. There is another MS. of the old Latin text at Corbey, from which various readings have been collected on Matthew, Mark, and Luke by Bianchini, and on the four gospels (partially) by Sabatier.

5. Cod. Colbertinus, of the 11th century, in the Parisian library; edited entire by Sabatier.

6. Cod. Palatinus, of the 5th century, in the library at Vienna, containing about the whole of Luke and John and the greater part of Matthew and Mark; edited by Tischendorf, Leip. 1847, 4to.

7. Cod. Bobbiensis, of the 5th century, now at Turin, formerly in the monastery of Bobbio, containing portions of Matthew and Mark; fragments of Acts xxiii., xxvii. 28; and of the Epistle of James, i. 1-5; iii. 13-18; iv. 1, 2; v. 19, 20; 1 Pet. i. 1-12; edited by Fleck, in Anecdota Sacra, Lips. 1837, and more fully by Tischendorf, in the Wiener Jahrbücher 1847.

8. Cod. Claromontanus, of the 4th or 5th century, now in the Vatican library, containing the four gospels, Matthew in an ante-hieronymian version (wanting i. 1-iii. 15; xiv. 33-xviii. 12), the other three according to the Vulgate; collated by Sabatier, edited by Mai, Scriptor. Vett. Nova Collectio a Vatican. codd. edita, iii. p. 257, ff.

9. Fragments of Mark and Luke, contained in a MS. of about the 5th century, belonging to the imperial library at Vienna, have been printed by Alter, in Paulus Repertor. für Bibl. und Morgenländ. Litter., iii. 115-170, and in Paulus Memorabilien, part 7, 58-96.

10. A MS. of the 7th century, now at Breslau, containing the synoptic gospels, with lacuna and part of John's gospel; described by Dr. D. Schulz, De Cod. 4 Evangg. Biblioth. Rhedigeriana, Bresl. 1814.

11. A fragment of Luke (xvii.-xxi.) from a palimpsest of the 6th century, in Ceriani, Monumenta Sac. et Prof. præsertim Bibl. Ambrosiana, Mil. 1861, vol. i., Fasc. i. p. 1-8.

12. Cardinal Mai has given, in his Spicilegium Romanum, tom. ix. p. 61-86, various readings from a very ancient codex of the Speculum Augustini, and he has since edited the Speculum entire in his PP. Nov. Bibl.; comp. Tregelles, p. 239.

13, 14, 15. In the monastery of St. Gall are three codices, the first of the 4th or 5th century, containing fragments of Matthew; the second a Gallic MS. of the 7th century, containing Mark xvi. 14-20; the third, an Irish MS. of the 7th or 8th century, containing John xi. 14-44.

16. Cod. Monacensis, of the 6th century, containing the four gospels, with lacuna; transcribed by Tischendorf.

17. A fragment containing Matt. xiii. 13-25, on purple vellum, of the 5th century, in the library at Dublin, printed in the Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy, iii. 374, by Dr. Todd.

18. Cod. Guelferbytanus, of the 6th century, containing some fragments of Rom. xi. 15, published by Knittel in 1762 [KNITTEL], and more correctly by Tischendorf, Anecd. Sac. et Prof., p. 153.

19. Fragments of the Pauline epistles discovered by Schmeller at Munich, and transcribed by Tischendorf, who has described them in the Deutsche Zeitschrift für Christl. Wissenschaft, for 1857, No. 8.

Besides these, there are several MSS. known to exist chiefly in the British libraries. Some of these are noticed in Bentley's Critica Sacra, edited by Ellis, 1862, and in Westwood's Palæographia Sacra Pictoria. See also Betham's Antiquarian Researches, Petrie On the Ecclesiastical Antiq. of Ireland, O'Connor Rerum Hibern. Scriptores.

These codices palæographers and critics profess to be able to allot to different recensions or revisions. Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, and 17, they pronounce to be African; 3, 6, 12, 16, Italic; and 14, 15, Irish; though Tischendorf expresses doubt as to the African character of No. 9, and the Italic of No. 6.

Of the O. T., only a few fragments have been discovered in special codices. These have been printed by Sabatier (Lib. cit.), by Vercellone (Variae Lectiones Vulg. Lat. Bibliorum, 2 vols., Rom. 1860-62), by Münster (Miscell. Hafn. 1821), and by Ranke (Fragmenta Hos. Am. Mich. 1856, 1858). The MSS. of the Vulgate preserve the old Latin version of those books of the Apocrypha which were not retranslated by Jerome, and the Psalter. Our principal source of information, however, is in the citations made by the Latin fathers from the version in their hands.

From these various sources we possess in the old Latin version of the O. T., the Psalter, Esther, and some of the Apocryphal books entire, the rest only in fragments; whilst of the N. T. we possess nearly the whole.

The value of these remains in regard to the criticism of the sacred text is very considerable. They afford important aid in determining the condition of the Greek text in the early centuries. This, which Bentley was the first to perceive, or at least to announce, has been fully recognised by Lachmann, Tregelles, and Tischendorf, though they have not all followed it out with equal description (see Tischendorf's strictures, Prolegg. in ed. Sept. N. T., p. ciii., ff.; ccxlii.)

The general character of the Itala is close literal adherence to the original, so as often to transgress the genius of the Latin language; its phraseology being marked by solecisms and improprieties which may be due to its having been originally produced either in a region remote from the centre of classical culture, or among the more illiterate of the community. Thus Συρηπ is rendered by salutaris, διαφύσειν by superponere (e.g., 'quanto ergo superponit homo ab ove,' Matt. xii. 12), πρωεληγίς by prosperare, κοσμοκράτορες by munditantes, etc.; and we have such constructions as stellam quam viderant in orientem (Matt. ii. 9); ut ego veniens adorem ei (Matt. ii. 8); qui autem audientes (ii. 9); pressuris quibus sustinetis (2 Thess. i. 4); habitavit in Capharnaum maritimam (Matt. iv. 13); terra Naphthalim viam maris (iv. 15); verbum audit et continuo cum gaudio accipit eum (xiii. 20); dominantur eorum, principantur eorum (xx. 25), etc. It must be borne in mind, however, that the current text was exposed to innumerable corruptions, and that we can hardly, from the specimens that have come down to us, form any very accurate judgment of the state in which it was at first. One can hardly suppose that by any Latin-speaking people, the following version, which is that presented by the Colbertina MS., of Col. ii. 18, 19, could have been accepted as idiomatic, or even intelligible:—Nemo vos convincat volens in humilitate et religione angelorum, quæ vidit ambulans, sine causa inflatus sensu carnis suæ, et non tenens caput Christum, ex quo omne corpus connexum et conductione subministratum et provectum crescit in incrementum Dei. If this be (to borrow the remark of Eichhorn, from whose Einleitung ins N. T., iv. 354 ff., we have taken these specimens) 'verborum tenax,' where is the 'perspicuitas sententiæ' of which Augustine speaks?

II. HIERONYMIAN OR VULGATE VERSION.—I. Labours of Jerome.—To such an extent had ignorance, carelessness, and unskilful emendation corrupted the copies of the Itala in use, that it became generally and strongly felt that something must be done to rescue the Latin churches from the evils to which this exposed them, and to secure to them a settled correct version of the Holy Scriptures. To this feeling, effect was given at the right time by the duty being laid by the Romish Bishop Damasus upon Jerome, the man of all others then living most competent to discharge it; the man most skilled in the original tongues of Scripture, one whose zeal in the cause of Biblical learning gave the best omen of success, and who possessed abundant leisure to give himself wholly to the work. To the request of Damasus, Jerome, after some hesitation, acceded. He first addressed himself, about the year 382, to the revision of the existing version of the gospels, which he sought to bring into accordance with the Greek original—Novum Testamentum græcæ fidei reddidi, says he (Catal. Scriptt. Eccl., 135); a work which he describes as at once pious and perilous, for he foresaw that people accustomed from their infancy to a particular translation would regard him as nothing better than a sacrilegious falsifier, should he alter, add to, or correct the old version (Præf. in Evangg. ad Damasum). Resolved, therefore, to proceed with great caution, he selected Greek codices which did not differ much from the Latin usage, and he so restrained his pen that only where he found the translation misrepresenting the sense did he venture to correct it. He next took up the Psalter, at first following the common text of the LXX., but afterwards that in Origen's Hexapla, with his critical marks (Prol. ii., in Ps.; Ep. ad Suniam et Fretellam de emend. Ps.; Apol. adv. Rufin. ii. 24). Both recensions are extant, the former known as the Psalterium Romanum, the latter as the Psal. Gallicanum; and both have been repeatedly printed. An edition of the two was issued at Paris as early as 1509 by the forerunner of the Reformation in France, Jacques Le Fevre d'Estaples, under the title Psalterium Quincuplex Gallic. Roman. Hebr. Vetus conciliatum; of which a second edition appeared in 1518, and a third at Caen in 1515, in one vol. folio. Pursuing this course, Jerome set himself to revise all the books of the O. T., and emend them according to the Hexaplar text, but it is not ascertained to what extent this design was executed. That he fulfilled it in reference to Job, the writings of Solomon, and Chronicles, is attested by himself (Apol. Cont. Rufin. ii. 24); but it would appear that of the result of his labours in this department he was by some means defrauded (Ep. xciv. ad Augustin.)

These efforts led on to his undertaking what was for his time a gigantic work, the translation of the entire O. T. from the Hebrew. Commencing with the books of Kings, he issued in succession, and in the following order, the Prophets, the writings of Solomon, Job, the Psalms, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles, the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and Esther. He also translated from the Chaldee the Apocryphal books of Judith and Tobit, the latter in one day with the aid of a Jew, the former by his own unaided effort after he had acquired a competent knowledge of the language. To the books of Esther, Jeremiah, Daniel, he retained the Apocryphal additions, though he did not himself approve them. In these labours he was occupied about twenty years, from A. D. 385 to 405. In executing this translation Jerome sometimes adhered closely to the LXX. and other Greek versions, when he perceived that they were in accordance with the Hebrew; at other times he translated directly from the Hebrew, using the aid of his Jewish masters (Hody, p. 350, ff.) Jerome introduced into his version the practice of distinguishing by 'cola' and 'commata,' a practice previously not in use among the Latins (Præf. in Esai.; in Paralip., etc.)

In one of his writings (Proem. ad Lib. iii. Comment. in Galat.) he laments the effect of his Hebrew studies in spoiling his Latin style. This would seem to indicate a greater devotedness to these studies, and a greater familiarity with their object than can probably be justly admitted. At the same time there can be no doubt that Jerome was a diligent student of Hebrew, and used the best means within his reach to acquire proficiency in that language (cf. Ep. ad Rusticum, c. 6; Epitaph. Paule; Præf. in Daniel.; Ep. ad Damasum; Proem. in Job., etc.; Hody, p. 359, ff.) His linguistic attainments have been ridiculously exalted by some, but we may safely allow him the praise which he himself claims (Adv. Rufin.), of being 'Hebræus, Græcus, Latinus, trilinguis,' and which Augustine freely concedes to him, designating him 'homo doctissimus et omnium trium linguarum peritus' (De Civit. Dei, l. xviii, c. 43).

2. Reception of Jerome's Version.—Though commenced and carried on under the sanction and encouragement of some of the most eminent authorities in the church, the work of Jerome was far from being cordially accepted by the Christian community. Jerome himself is constantly complaining, in his prefaces as well as in other parts of his writings, of the obloquy to which his undertaking was exposed, and of the injurious treatment to which he was himself subjected. He was violently attacked by Rufinus, presbyter of Aquileia, who, amongst other charges, asserts that he was misled by one of his Hebrew teachers, whose name, Barhanina, he corrupts into Barabbas ('Plautino sale,' says Jerome in his reply), and compares Jerome to the Jews, who preferred Barabbas to Jesus. To this attack Jerome replied in his Apologia contra Rufinum. At first, also, Augustine looked unfavourably on the new version; but afterwards he acknowledged its merits, and himself used it in his citations of Scripture (Epp. ad Hieron., 28, 71, 82, 89; De Civ. Dei, xviii. 48; Ep. ad Audacem; De Doct. Christ., iv. 7; Quæst. in Deut., 20, 24; in Jos., 7, 15, 19, 24, 25; in Jud., 16, 37, 47, 56). By others it was from the first cordially welcomed, and even during Jerome's lifetime it was in some churches publicly read. After his death the prejudices which had impeded its reputation gradually subsided, and in the time of Gregory the Great, about the end of the 6th century, it was in use, along with the old version, in the church of Rome, and was gradually rising above the latter in public esteem (Moral. in Job., Præf.) Somewhat later, Isidore of Seville attests that it was in general use in all the churches, because it was more true to the meaning and clearer in expression than the other (De off. ecclæs., i. 12); and from the middle of the 7th century it may be regarded as the authorised version of the Western Church, though it was at no time indicated as such by any authoritative declaration. The Psalter, however, in the older version, as corrected by Jerome (Psalterium Gallicanum), continued to be used, it being more difficult to introduce a new book for psalmody than one for reading. Some of the apocryphal books, as already mentioned, were also retained from the old version, and the N. T. remained as it was left by Jerome after simply revising the old translation. From its general reception this somewhat composite work came to be known as the editio Vulgata, i.e. (to use the words of Jerome in reference to the LXX.), editio toto orbe Vulgata, the received and common text of Scripture, a title answering to the κοινὴ ἔκδοσις of the Greek Scriptures. This, which was at first used of the LXX., or the translation of the O. T. made from the LXX., was readily transferred thence to that of Jerome when it became current in the churches.

3. History of Jerome's version till the invention of printing.—The circumstances under which this version came into use could hardly fail to expose it to serious corruption, beyond that to which all unprinted documents are exposed from the ignorance or presumption of copyists. The use along with it of the old version supplied a constant temptation to alter the one from the other, and from this cause the version of Jerome became in course of time largely corrupted, especially in the parts of Scripture used for liturgical purposes. Roger Bacon asserts that it was corrupted also by the interpolation of passages taken from the offices of the church—Ab officio ecclesiæ multa accipiunt et ponunt in textu (Hody, p. 428). Parallel passages further offered an inducement to alteration, and in this way many changes were made on the later version. It is even alleged that it was altered to make it agree better with Josephus (Hody, l. c.) Sometimes also it was deemed proper to introduce what seemed necessary to preserve the orthodoxy of the translation; thus, after the words 'videbo Deum' (Job xix. 26) some one inserted 'salvatorem meum,' because 'videtur facere ad fidem, et quia cantatur in ecclesia' (Hugo, Correctorium; comp. Doederlein, Litterarisches Museum, St. i. 35).

From these various causes the text had become so corrupt that even in the time of Charlemagne it was felt to be necessary to make an attempt to revise it, so as to secure greater accuracy. This task was committed by that enlightened and magnanimous prince to Alcuin, who, somewhere about the year 802, undertook it, and by comparing, it is said, the existing text with the originals, and probably also collating different MSS., sought to produce a correct edition of the Latin Bible (Hody, p. 409). Alcuin says that he corrected all the books of the O. and N. T. 'examussim,' but under his idea of 'correcting' was included the rectifying of the version itself where it seemed to him not adequately to represent the original; and the result of this was that under his hands the Vulgate was still further perverted from its original condition. We may doubt also how far his collation of MSS. was conducted on critical grounds, nor do we know how far it extended. Certain it is that the text of the Vulgate remained still so unsettled, that in the 11th century it became necessary to subject it to another revision. This was undertaken by Lanfranc with the aid of other learned men; but though a writer of the time says, 'multa ad unguem emendavit' (Rob. de Monte, ap. Hody, p. 416), his work was not much known out of England, and accordingly in the next century another revision was undertaken by Cardinal Nicolaus.

Others engaged in the same work, and after the 12th century there began to be formed the so-called Epanorthetæ or Correctoria Biblica. Of these the earliest was that of the Abbot Stephanus, about the year 1150. Then followed that which the doctors of the Sorbonne issued for the use of their students, in which reference is made to an ancient MS. cited as Parisius, and sometimes Correctio Parisiensis, from which corrected readings are taken (Simon, Hist. Crit., c. 9, p. 115); a copy of this Correctorium, consisting of four volumes folio, was in the library of the Abbey of Cîteaux till the time of the Revolution. The attempt of the Archbishop of Sens to introduce this Correctorium into general use called forth an interdict of it from the Dominicans (A. D. 1256), who issued Correctoria of their own. Of these, that of Hugo a Sto. Caro is the one best known; a copy of it exists in the library at Nürnberg; and in the Pauline Library at Leipzig there is another Dominican Correctorium, specimens from which are given by Carpzov (Crit. Sac., p. 686). Other religious bodies, the Carthusians and the Franciscans, had also their special Correctoria (Hug, p. 278); a copy of one of the latter is in the library of the University of Freiburg, of which Hug (l. c.) gives an account. These Correctoria were prepared by noting on the margin of some MS. readings in which other MSS. differed from it, and appending short notes in which the readings were criticised. In determining which to prefer, the authors were guided rather by exegetical and dogmatical reasons than by those of a critical kind; and as they sometimes introduced the translations which they found in the Latin fathers, and also made new translations from the original, their labours often tended rather to deform than to correct the text of the Vulgate.

The corruptions to which the text of the Vulgate has been exposed have caused it to be regarded with considerable suspicion; and some have even gone the length of asserting that we no longer possess the translation of Jerome (see Pfeiffer, Crit. Sac., Opp. p. 790; and Carpzov, Crit. Sac., p. 680). The reasons adduced by these writers are not without weight; but the general opinion of scholars is, that they have failed to establish their position to the extent they have desired.

4. History of the printed text.—Among the earliest uses to which the discovery of printing was put, was the multiplying of copies of the Latin Bible; the first edition which has the place and year of publication noted is that of Mentz, 1462; for earlier editions, see Le Long, ii. 2, 58, ff., ed. Masch. As the MSS., however, from which these were executed were in a corrupt state, it is not to be wondered at that the earliest printed editions were sadly incorrect. The diffusion of copies, indeed, only made the corrupt state of the text more apparent and more generally known. Hence attempts began to be made at a critical revision of the text, and editions having critical apparatus appended were issued. Of this class are the editions of Gumelli, Paris 1504; of Castellan, Venet. 1511; of the Complutensian Polyglott, 1517; of Colinaeus, Paris 1525; of Rob. Stephen, Paris 1527, and especially the fourth edition, 1540, and following editions; of Benedictus (Benoist), Paris 1541; and of Isid. Clarius, Venet. 1542 (Le Long, l. c.) As the emendations in these editions, however, were often arbitrarily made, and in some cases were really new translations, the condition of the text was still such as to give occasion for serious complaint.

During the fourth session of the Council of Trent, a commission under the presidency of Archbishop Filhol was appointed to report on the state of the text of the Vulgate. Their report was given in on the 17th of March 1546, and was to the effect that the text was so corrupt, that only the Pope could restore it to its original integrity. Hot debates ensued, in the course of which it was proposed that a new translation should be made from the original Hebrew and Greek, and pronounced to be alone authentic. Others contended that all that was required was an amended Vulgate; but much discussion arose as to the merits of Jerome's translation, and doubts were cast by some on the claims of the existing Vulgate to be regarded as Jerome's work at all. The result was a resolution, adopted on the 8th of April, declaring that the 'vetus et Vulgata editio' was alone to be held authentic, 'in publicis lectionibus, disputationibus, prædicationibus et expositionibus'; and discharging all persons from presuming on any pretext to reject it. Some doubt has arisen as to whether this decree was intended to preclude in all cases an appeal to the original Scriptures as the final authority. Such seems unquestionably to be its obvious meaning; for if not even in controversy may any one presume to set aside the translation, there can in no case be a legitimate appeal to the original from the translation. But Hug says that 'the meaning is plainly this: As in civil affairs an authentic instrument is valid evidence, so in public religious matters the Vulgate is a document from which valid argument may be drawn, without prejudice, however, to other documents' (Introd., p. 279). If this was all the Council meant, it is a pity they said so much more than this, and bound their church by an edict which undoubtedly has operated to the discouragement of all true Biblical exegesis within her pale.

Whilst thus asserting the supremacy of the Vulgate, the Tridentine divines did not attempt to decide which of the differing editions was the one to be preferred; they only enacted that henceforth the Vulgate should be imprinted in the most emended form possible (Sep. 4; Decr. 2). They appointed, however, a commission to effect a correct edition of the Vulgate; but this was suddenly suspended by order of the Pope Paul III. An attempt was also made by Hentenius, under the auspices of the theologians of Louvain, to produce a correct text by printing a revised edition of the fourth Stephanic impression, Louvain 1547. The proceedings in this matter of the Council excited derision at Rome, and provoked displeasure among scholarly men in the Romish Church, of whom such men as Maffei and Farnesi openly signified their dissatisfaction. The Court of Rome, however, seized the occasion for exerting its authority, and assumed the prerogative of issuing the authentic Scriptures. This work, begun under the auspices of Pius IV. and V., was hastily completed by Sixtus V. who fitted up a press in the Vatican for the purpose of printing it, and himself corrected the press. It appeared under the title Biblia Sacra Vulgata editionis tribus tomis distincta, Romæ ex Typogr. Apostol. Vat., 1590, fol.; a second title page announces that this edition is 'ad Concilii Tridentini præscriptum emendata, et a Sixto V., P. M., recognita et approbata.' The manifold deficiencies of this edition were apparent even before it was issued, and an attempt was made to remedy or conceal them by erasing, pasting corrections over the errors, or correcting by the pen; nevertheless the work was sent forth with the highest pretensions, all other editions were interdicted, and the alteration of the minutest particle was prohibited. Pope Gregory XIV., however, saw it necessary to send forth a more worthy edition of the Vulgate text, and the work which he began was completed by Clement VIII. This, which appeared in 1592, though professing to be 'Sixti V. jussu recognita et Clementis auctoritate edita,' differed very much from the Sixtine edition, copies of which the popes endeavoured to buy up and destroy, so that it is now one of the rarest of books. In 1593 Clement sent forth another edition, which contained many alterations. The errors of the Clementine recension, and the discrepancies between it and that of Sixtus, though both issued under the supreme papal sanction, have been fully exposed by James in his Bellum Papale, sine concordia discors Sixti quinti et Clementis octavi circa Hieronymianam editionem, Lond. 1600; and Prosper Marchand, in Schelhorn's Amanitates Litterariae, iv. p. 433, ff.; see also Hody, p. 505; and Amama, Censura vulg. vers. quinque libb. Mos., Francq. 1620. In 1593 an edition in 4to of the Clementine text was issued from the Vatican press, and another in 1598, sm. 4to. Both the folio and quarto editions contain the preface of Bellarmin, in which he describes the design of the editors, and the rules by which they were guided. The quarto editions have marginal references, explanations of the Hebrew names, and an index rerum; both are very incorrectly printed, and the text they present differs considerably from that of the edition of 1592. A reprint of this edition in 4to and 8vo was issued from the Plantine press, Antwerp 1599; which, however, in many places differs from its original. Almost all subsequent editions have slavishly followed that of Clement, copying even its manifest errors (see a list in Le Long—Masch ii. 3, p. 249, ff.) Recent editions are those of L.

van Ess, 3 vols., Tüb. 1822; Kistemaker, 3 vols., Münster 1823; an edition published by authority of Leo XII. at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 8vo, 1826; one in sm. folio, published at Besançon and Paris 1839; and that of Fleck, Lips. 1840. An attempt to produce a correcter text has recently been made by Vercellone in an edition published by him at Rome in 1861. Of great value also are his Varia Lectiones Vulgate Lat. Bib. editionis, tom. i., ii., part i (Pent.—I Regg.), Rom. 1860-62, 4to. The earlier work of Bukentop (Lux de luce, etc., Colon. Agripp. 1710, 4to), in which the doubtful and various readings of the Clementine edition are illustrated from the original texts, and the Sixtine edition is discussed, possesses also much utility. A critical edition of the Vulgate text yet remains a desideratum.

5. Principal codices of the Vulgate.—1. Cod. Amiantinus, of the middle of the 6th century, the oldest and best extant; in the Laurentian library at Florence; it contains the O. T., except Baruch, and the N. T.; the latter has been edited from it by Tischendorf, Lips. 1850, 4to.

2. Biblia Gothica Toldeanae Ecclesiae, of the 8th century, containing all the books except Baruch (Vercellone, Var. Lectt., i. p. 84).

3. Cod. Cavensis, of the 8th century, if not earlier; contains the O. and N. T.; belongs to the monastery of La Cava, near Salerno; examined by Tischendorf.

4. Cod. Paullinus, of the 9th century, wants Baruch; at Rome (Vercellone, l. c.)

5. Cod. Statianus hod. Valliedlanus, of the 9th century; at Rome (Ibid.)

6. Cod. Ottobonianus, of the 8th century, contains the Octateuch; in the Vatican (Ibid.)

7. Biblia Carolina, of the 9th century; wants Baruch, and the two last leaves are by a later hand; in the cantonal library at Zürich.

8. Biblia Bamburgensis, of the 9th century, wants the Apocalypse; it has Jerome's Epistle to Paulinus prefixed in large uncials, the rest of the MS. is minuscular; in this MS. 1 John v. 7 appears thus (Kopp, Bilder u. Schriften der Vorzeit i. 184):

Et ipse qui testis fitatur. qm̄ xp̄i test
ueritatis qm̄ trer sunt qui testimonium dant. sp̄
aqua et sanguis. et trer unum sunt.

9. Cod. Alcuini, of the 9th century, containing the O. and N. T. (except Baruch); supposed to be that offered to Charlemagne at his coronation; formerly in the possession of the recluses at Moutier de Grandval, now in the British Museum (Addit., 10, 546).

10. A MS. on very clean parchment, probably of the 13th century; formerly at Altdorf, now at Erlangen (Niederer, Nachrichten zur Kirchen-Gehlehrten- und Bücher-Geschichte, x. 125).

11. A MS., of the 13th century, described in Eichhorn's Repertorium, xvii. 183, ff.

12. Cod. Fuldensis, of the 6th century, contains the N. T., with the gospels in the form of a harmony; used by Lachmann in his edition of the Latin subjoined to his Greek N. T.; a specimen was published by Ranke, Marb. 1860, 4to.

13. Cod. Forojuliensis; contains the four gospels; edited along with fragments of Mark's gospel from the Prague MS. (previously edited by Dobrowski, Fragmentum Pragense Ev. S. Marci, etc., Prag. 1778, 4to), and other remains of the same gospel from MSS. preserved at Venice, by Bianchini, Append. ad Evangel. quadrupl.

the O. and N. T., Basil. 1551, again 1573, and at Leipz. 1738.

10. The version of Junius and Tremellius appeared at Frankfurt in parts between 1575 and 1579, and in a collected form in 1579, 2 vols. fol. Tremellius took the principal part in this work; his son-in-law Junius rather assisting him than sharing the work with him. Tremellius translated the N. T. from the Syriac, and this, along with Beza's translation, appeared in an edition of Tremellius's Bible, published at London in 1585. The translation of Piscator is only an amended edition of that of Tremellius.

11. Thomas Malvenda, a Spanish Dominican, engaged in a 'nova ex Hebraeo translatio,' which he did not live to finish. What he accomplished was published along with his commentaries, 5 vols., Lugd. 1650, fol.; but the extreme barbarism of his style has caused his labours to pass into oblivion. He died in 1628.

12. Cocceius has given a new translation of most of the Biblical books in his commentaries, Opera Omnia, tom. i.-vi., Amsterdam 1701.

13. Sebastian Schmid executed a translation of the O. and N. T., which appeared after his death in 4to, Argentor. 1696; it has been repeatedly reprinted, and is esteemed for its scholarly exactness, though in some cases its adherence to the original is over close.

14. The version of Jean le Clerc (Clericus) is found along with his commentaries; it appeared in portions from 1693 to 1731.

15. Charles Fr. Houbigant issued a translation of the O. T. and the Apocrypha, along with his edition of the Hebrew text, Par. 1753, 4 vols. fol.

16. A new translation of the O. T. was undertaken by J. A. Dathe; it appeared between 1773 and 1789. At one time much admired, this version has of late ceased perhaps to receive the attention to which it is entitled.

17-19. Versions of the Gospels by Ch. Wilh. Thalemann (Berl. 1781); of the Epistles, by Godf. Sigism. Jaspis (2 vols., Lips. 1793-1797); and of the whole N. T. by H. Godf. Reichard (Lips. 1799), belong to the school of Castellio.

20. H. A. Schott and F. Winzer commenced a translation of the Bible, of which only the first vol. has appeared, containing the Pentateuch, Alton. et Lips. 1816. Schott has also issued a translation of the N. T., appended to his edition of the Greek text, Lips. 1805. This has passed into four editions, of which the last (1839) was superintended by Baumgarten-Crusius.

Translations of the N. T. have also been issued by F. A. Ad. Naebe (Lips. 1831), and Ad. Goeschen (Lips. 1832). (Carpzov, Crit. Sac., p. 707, ff.; Fritzsche, Art. Vulgata, in Herzog's Encyc.; Bible of Every Land, p. 210, etc.)

LATTICE. This word represents in the A. V. three Hebrew words.

1. אֶשְׁכֶּנֶת. This occurs Judg. v. 28, and Prov. vii. 6, in the latter of which places it is rendered casement. In both places it is in parallelism with חֲלֹן, window. In all probability it denotes the latticed opening which in Oriental houses serves the purpose at once of allowing a cooling breeze to enter the house, and permitting the inmates to look out on the outer world without being themselves seen [HOUSE; cut 273]. Gesenius derives it from שָׁנַב, to be cool; and Lee compares the Ar.

أَشْنَب ashnabon, having a cool mouth. Fürst finds in it rather the idea of interlacing or pegging one into another (ineinanderzapfen); and connects it with שָׁלָבִים (1 Kings vii. 28, 29). The LXX. renders by ροζάουρα, which, according to Jerome, is a window widening inwards from a narrow aperture like the barb of an arrow; according to others, a slit in the wall through which the archers might discharge their arrows, such as we still see in old castles and keeps.

2. חֲרָצִים (Song of Sol. ii. 9), latticed or reticulated openings; LXX. μεσοστάδια. The Targ. gives חֲרָצָה as the equivalent word both here and of אֶשְׁכֶּנֶת in Prov. vii. 6.

3. שֶׁכֶּנֶת. This word means primarily a net (Job xviii. 8); thence the net-work used in balustrades, or on the capital of pillars (1 Kings vii. 17, 20, 42; 2 Kings xxv. 17; Jer. lii. 22, 23, etc.); and finally, the lattice-work of a window (2 Kings i. 2).—W. L. A.

LAURENCE, RICHARD, D.C.L., was born at Bath in the year 1760. He matriculated in the University of Oxford, July 14, 1778, as an exhibitor of Corpus Christi College, took the degree of B.A. April 10, 1782, that of M.A. July 9, 1785, and those of B. and D.C.L. June 27, 1794. Upon the appointment, in 1796, of his brother, Dr. French Laurence, to the regius-professorship of civil law, he was made deputy professor, and took up his residence in Oxford. He was the preacher of the Bampton Lectures in 1804, and in consequence of the reputation he thence acquired, he was presented by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the rectory of Mersham, Kent. In 1814 he was appointed to the chair of regius-professor of Hebrew, and to the canonry of Christchurch, Oxford, and in 1822 was elevated to the archiepiscopal see of Cashel. He died suddenly in Dublin, December 28, 1838. His most important contributions to Biblical literature are his translations of certain Apocryphal books of the O. T. from the Ethiopic, and the critical investigations with which they were accompanied. These are, 1. Ascensio Isaiae Vatis, opusculum pseudepigraphum, multis abhinc seculis, ut videtur, deperditum, nunc autem apud Ethiopias compertum et cum versione Latina Anglicanaque publici juris factum, Oxon. 1819, 8vo. 2. Primi Ezrae Libri, qui apud vulgatum appellatur quartus, versio Ethiopica nunc primo in medium prolata et Latine, Angliceque reddita, Oxon. 1820, 8vo. The translation is followed by general remarks upon the different versions of this book, its apocryphal character, the creed of its author, and the probable period of its composition, which he places between the years B.C. 28 and B.C. 25. 3. The Book of Enoch the Prophet, an apocryphal production, supposed to have been lost for ages, but discovered at the close of the last century in Abyssinia, now first published from an Ethiopic MS. in the Bodleian Library, Oxf. 1821, 8vo; 3d. ed. 1838. In addition to these, Dr. Laurence is the author of the following critical or exegetical works—4. Remarks on the Systematical Classification of MSS. adopted by Griesbach in his edition of the Greek Testament, Oxf. 1814, 8vo. 5. A dissertation on the Logos of St. John, Oxf. 1808, 8vo. 6. Critical reflections upon some important misrepresentations contained in the Unitarian version of the N. T., Oxf. 1811, 8vo. 7. The book of Job in the words of the A. V., arranged and printed in conformity with the Massoretic text, Dublin 1828, 8vo. 8. On the existence of the Soul after death; a dissertation opposed to the principles of Priestley, Law, and their respective followers. By R. C. Lond. 1834, 8vo. This work discusses the usage of the terms κοιμᾶσθαι and Sheol, and enters into the critical examination of various Scriptural narratives.—S. N.

LAVER (לָוֶה; לוֹטֶה). 1. A vessel made by divine command (Exod. xxx. 18), of the brazen mirrors of the women that served—marg. 'assembled by troops'—at the door of the tabernacle (xxxviii. 8), and set up between the altar of burnt-offerings and the curtain of the sanctuary (xl. 30). Its shape is unknown, but is thought to have been circular. It contained water wherewith the priests were to wash their hands and their feet whenever they entered the tabernacle, or came near to the altar to minister (xl. 32). It had a 'foot' (רֶגֶל, basus), which seems, from the distinct mention constantly made of it—'and his foot'—to have been something more than a mere stand or support. Probably it formed a lower basin to catch the water which flowed, through taps or otherwise, from the laver. The priests could not have washed in the laver itself, as all the water would have been thereby defiled, and so would have had to be renewed for each ablution. It has been suggested that they held their hands and feet under streams that flowed from the laver, and that the 'foot' caught the water that fell. As no mention is made of a vessel wherewith to wash the parts of the victims offered in sacrifice, it is presumed that the laver served this purpose also.

2. In Solomon's Temple, besides a very large vessel, called from its size the molten sea [SEA, MOLTEN], and used for the ablutions of the priests (then become very numerous), there were ten lavers of brass for washing the sacrifices. These were doubtless very elaborate and ornamental. A minute description is given of the bases on which they stood, and their several parts and ornaments (1 Kings vii. 27-39); but it is so difficult to understand, that hardly two writers on Bible antiquities agree about its interpretation. Each base would seem to have been a hollow chest, four cubits in length, four in width, and three in height (LXX., six cubits high). The four sides cast of brass had

'borders' (panels it is supposed) in ledges or mouldings, on which were bas-reliefs of lions, oxen, and cherubim, and, beneath these, garlands or festoons—'certain additions of light work'

(לֵיחָ, corolla pensiles). The base stood upon the brazen axles of four cast wheels (each one and a half cubit in diameter), after the manner of ordinary chariots—not immediately on the axles themselves, but on four feet which were fastened to the axles—so that the sides adorned with bas-reliefs were raised above the circumference of the wheels, and the wheels stood under the panels (Keil). Upon the ledges 'was a base above.' This seems to have been a hollow basin, standing half a cubit in height, to receive the water that fell from the laver. It, too, was ornamented with carved figures—cherubim, lions, and palm-trees, and 'addition round about.' Above this basin stood the laver on cast shoulder-pieces, rising from the four corners of the base. Each laver contained forty baths, and was four cubits in diameter. The shape is not given, it was probably circular. The wheels under the bases were doubtless intended to facilitate removal from one spot to another; but the appointed place of the lavers was five on the right hand and five on the left of the court of the priests (2 Chron. iv. 6). King Ahaz cut off the borders of the bases, and removed the lavers from off them (2 Kings xvi. 17), and gave them to the king of Assyria; and the bases themselves were ultimately broken in pieces by the Chaldeans, and the brass of them carried to Babylon (2 Kings xxv. 13).—J. LAW (תּוֹרָה; Gr. νόμος) means a rule of conduct enforced by an authority superior to that of the moral beings to whom it is given. The word law is sometimes also employed in order to express not only the moral connection between free agents inferior and superior, but also in order to express the nexus causalis, the connection between cause and effect in inanimate nature. The expression, however, law of nature, is improper and figurative. The term law implies, in its strict sense, spontaneity, or the power of deciding between right and wrong, and of choosing between good and evil, as well on the part of the lawgiver as on the part of those who have to regulate their conduct according to his dictates. It frequently signifies not merely an individual rule of conduct, as תּוֹרַת הָעוֹלָה, the law of burnt offering; תּוֹרַת הַיֹּלָדָה (Lev. xii. 2), the law concerning the conduct of women after childbirth; תּוֹרַת הַמִּצְוָה, the law concerning the conduct of persons afflicted with leprosy (Lev. xiv. 2); תּוֹרַת הַבֵּית, the description of a building to be erected by an architect;—but it signifies also a whole body of legislation; as תּוֹרַת מֹשֶׁה (1 Kings ii. 3; 2 Kings xxiii. 25; Ezra iii. 2), the law given by Moses, which, in reference to its divine origin, is called תּוֹרַת יְהוָה, the law of Jehovah (Ps. xix. 8; xxxvii. 31; Is. v. 24; xxx. 9). In the latter sense it is called, by way of eminence, הַתּוֹרָה, the law (Deut. i. 5; iv. 8, 44; xvii. 18, 19; xxvii. 3, 8). If not the substance of legislation, but rather the external written code in which it is contained is meant, the following terms are employed: סֵפֶר תּוֹרַת מֹשֶׁה (2 Kings xiv. 6; Is. viii. 16; xxiv. 5); סֵפֶר תּוֹרַת אֱלֹהִים or סֵפֶר תּוֹרַת יְהוָה (Josh. xxiv. 26).

In a wider sense, the word νόμος is employed in the N. T. to express any guiding or directing power, originating from the nature of anything existing. The apostolic use of the word has been well expressed by Claudius Guillaud in his work, In Omnes Pauli Epistolas Collatio, p. 21. Law is a certain power restraining from some, and impelling to other things or actions. Whatever has such a power, and exercises any sway over man, may be called law, in a metaphorical sense. Thus the apostle (Rom. vii. 23) calls the right impulses and the sanctified will of the mind, νόμος τοῦ νοῦς, the law of the mind; and the perverse desire to sin which is inherent in our members, νόμος ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν, the law in the members. In the same manner he calls that power of faith which certainly governs the whole man, since the actions of every man are swayed by his convictions, νόμος πίστεως, the law of faith. So, the power and value ascribed to ceremonies, or rather to all outward acts, he designates, νόμος τῶν ἐντολῶν, the law of precepts.

Similar expressions are, νόμος τῆς ἀμαρτίας, the law of sin (Rom. vii. 23); νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος, the law of the Spirit (viii. 2); νόμος δικαιοσύνης, the law of righteousness (ix. 31); νόμος τοῦ ἀνδρός, the authority of the husband over his wife (vii. 2); νόμος θεουθεντίας (James i. 25; ii. 12), the holy impulse created by the sense of spiritual liberty.

If, however, the word νόμος alone is used, it is almost invariably equivalent to ὁ νόμος Μωυσέως: and ὁ ἐν τῷ νόμῳ are the subjects of the Mosaic theocracy, viz., the Jews, who practise the ἀνδγαυίας τοῦ νόμου, the reading of the law (Acts xiii. 15), are Ζηλωταὶ τοῦ νόμου (xxi. 20), τηρεῖν (xv. 5, 24), or φυλάσσειν, ποιεῖν (Rom. ii. 14), πράσσειν (ii. 25), τὸν νόμον (Acts xxi. 24), zealots for the observance and performance of the law, although they debate often περὶ ζητημάτων τοῦ νόμου αὐτῶν, about mere legal quibbles; so that, as mere hearers, they cannot expect the blessings promised to the doers of the law.

The Mosaic law is especially embodied in the last four books of the Pentateuch. In Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, there is perceptible some arrangement of the various precepts, although they are not brought into a system. In Deuteronomy the law or legislation contained in the three preceding books is repeated with slight modifications. The whole legislation has for its manifest object to found a theocratical hierarchy, the manifest aim of which is to make that which is really holy (τὸ ἅγιον) prevail [MOSES, LAW OF].

The Jews divide the whole Mosaic law into 613 precepts, of which 248 are affirmative and 365 negative. The number of the affirmative precepts corresponds to the 248 members of which, according to Rabbinical anatomy, the whole human body consists. The number of the negative precepts corresponds to the 365 days of the solar year; or, according to the Rabbinical work Brandspiegel (which has been published in Jewish-German at Cracow and in other places), the negative precepts agree in number with the 365 veins which, they say, are found in the human body. Hence their logic concludes that if on each day each member of the human body keeps one affirmative precept and abstains from one thing forbidden, the whole law, and not the decalogue alone, is kept. The whole law is sometimes called by Jewish writers, Therlog, which word is formed from the Hebrew letters that are employed to express the number 613; viz., 400 = ת + 200 = ק + 10 = י + 3 = נ. Hence 613 = תרי"ג theriog. Women are subject to the negative precepts or prohibitions only, and not to the affirmative precepts or injunctions. This exception arises partly from their nature, and partly from their being subject to the authority of husbands. According to some Rabbinical statements women are subject to 100 precepts only, of which 64 are negative and 36 affirmative. The number 613 corresponds also to the number of letters in the decalogue. Others are inclined to find that there are 620 precepts according to the numerical value of the word כתר = crown; viz., 400 = ת + 200 = ק + 20 = נ; and others, again, observe that the numerical value of the letters תורה, law, amounts only to 611.

The Jews assert that, besides the written law, תורה שכתוב, νόμος ἑγγραφός, which may be translated into other languages, and which is contained in the Pentateuch, there was communicated to

Moses on Mount Sinai an oral law, תורה שבעל פה, νόμος ἀγραφός, which was subsequently written down, together with many Rabbinical observations, and is contained in the twelve folio volumes which now constitute the Talmud, and which the Jews assert cannot be, or at least ought not to be, translated [TALMUD].

In the O. T. we do not read of a learned profession of the law. Lawyers (νομικοί) are mentioned only after the decline of the Mosaic institutions had considerably advanced. It is, indeed, very remarkable, that in a nation so entirely governed by law, there were no lawyers forming a distinct profession, and that the νομικοί of a later age were not so much remarkable for enforcing the spirit of the law, as rather for ingeniously evading its injunctions, by leading the attention of the people from its spirit to a most minute literal fulfilment of its letter [LAWYER].—C. LAWYER (νομικός). This word, in its general sense, denotes one skilled in the law, as in Tit. iii. 13. When, therefore, one is called a lawyer, this is understood with reference to the laws of the land in which he lived, or to which he belonged.

Hence among the Jews a lawyer was one versed in the laws of Moses, which he taught in the schools and synagogues (Matt. xxviii. 35; Luke x. 25). The same person who is called 'a lawyer' in these texts, is in the parallel passage (Mark xii. 28) called a scribe (γραμματεὺς); whence it has been inferred that the functions of the lawyers and the scribes were identical. The individual may have been both a lawyer and a scribe; but it does not thence follow that all lawyers were scribes. Some suppose, however, that the 'scribes' were the public expounders of the law, while the 'lawyers' were the private expounders and teachers of it. But this is a mere conjecture; and nothing more is really known than that the 'lawyers' were expounders of the law, whether publicly or privately, or both.—J. K.

LAW AND PROPHETS, READING OF. [HAIPIHTHARA.]

LAZARUS (Ἀδάρος; Lazarus), the Greek contracted form of the Hebrew proper name עֲלִיזָר, Eleazar, 'God aids.' It is applied to two persons in the N. T.—Lazarus of Bethany, and Lazarus the beggar.

1. Lazarus of Bethany.—The story of Lazarus is a fragment—one of those wonderful episodes we sometimes meet with in the Bible. It is told by only one evangelist. It is brief, simple, and graphic; and there is a dramatic power in it not surpassed in sacred history. The story is introduced abruptly, and the characters are all grouped before the reader's mind without a word of preface, except a single note to identify Mary. It is evident the narrator takes it for granted that Lazarus was well known to his readers, and that his sisters, Mary and Martha, were distinguished persons. The disciples of our Lord must all have been intimately acquainted with the family of Bethany, and, like their Master, deeply attached to them (John xi. 16); and the churches planted by them had, no doubt, often heard from their lips the account of the miracle. The notoriety of the miracle, and the public attention directed by it to Lazarus and his sisters, may account for the abrupt way in which the story is introduced by John. Possibly, too, in his day—after the other disciples had passed away from the scene of their labours—doubts had begun to be cast on the reality of the miracle, or some legendary details to be added; John consequently relates, in a brief but singularly striking manner, the whole facts and circumstances, thus leaving the authentic narrative on the permanent inspired record. The name of Lazarus is not mentioned except in connection with the miracle. We have no direct information regarding his social status, the sect or party to which he belonged, the events of his previous life, or the way in which he had become acquainted with Jesus; nor are we told what effect the miracle produced upon him, or how the life so wonderfully prolonged was employed. It appears that his history, with the exception of this one event, was unimportant so far as the divine purpose in Revelation was concerned. The facts related are simply these:—He resided at Bethany with his sisters Mary and Martha. While Jesus was in Peræa, during the third year of his public ministry (see Robinson's Harmony of the Gospels), Lazarus was taken with a dangerous disease. His sisters sent a special messenger to inform Jesus, who replied, 'This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby.' He remained in Peræa two days longer, and then told his disciples that Lazarus was dead. It is probable that he died just about the time the messenger reached Jesus; for Bethany of Peræa (A. V. Bethabara; see Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, etc., in loc.) was about two days' journey from Jerusalem; the messenger took two days to go; Jesus remained two days in Peræa after his arrival; he spent two more on the journey to Bethany, and when he reached the village Lazarus had already been in the grave 'four days.' In consequence of the rapid progress of decomposition in that climate, it was, and still is, customary to bury on the day of death. Jesus, after an interesting and affecting interview with the sisters outside the village, is taken to the grave. 'It was a cave (σπηλαιον), and a stone lay upon it.' Jesus said, 'Take away the stone.' Martha remonstrated: 'Lord, by this time he stinketh' (ἤδη δέσσει—spoken evidently not as a mere supposition, but as a fact—Alford, Stier), for it is the fourth day.' This made the miracle all the more wonderful. Jesus said to her, 'Did I not tell thee, that if thou wouldest believe thou shouldst see the glory of God?' Then they removed the stone, and Jesus said, 'Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me'—words uttered for the benefit of those standing around, that they might have visible demonstration of the truth of his Divine mission. Having finished his short prayer, 'He cried with a loud voice (φωνῇ μεγάλῃ—which all could distinctly hear), Lazarus, come forth.' And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes: and his face was bound about with a napkin' (cf. Matt. xxvii. 59; Mark xv. 46; John xix. 40; xx. 6, 7—see article BURIAL). 'Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go.' And so the story of Lazarus ends as abruptly as it began (John xi. 1-46).

A little later in the gospel narrative Lazarus' name is again incidentally mentioned, but still in connection with the great miracle. After the miracle Jesus was compelled to retire to the city of Ephraim (John xi. 54), and thence he went to Galilee and Peræa (cf. Matt. xix. 1; Mark x. 1; Robinson, Harmony of the Gospels). From Peræa he returned (six days before the Passover, i.e., on Saturday, John xii. 1) 'to Bethany, where Lazarus was, whom he had raised from the dead.' A great supper was there prepared in his honour, and 'Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him' (ver. 2). Lazarus was now the engrossing subject of interest to the Jews, and the cause of intense excitement. The minds of the populace were so powerfully influenced by the miracle wrought upon him that the rulers resolved to put him to death as well as Jesus (ver. 11). The result of their schemes, so far as Lazarus is concerned, are not recorded, and we hear no more of him.

This is the whole amount of direct information concerning Lazarus contained in the sacred narrative. There are a few incidental expressions and allusions, however, which when thoughtfully considered cannot fail to invest the story with additional interest, and to shed upon it new light. Lazarus was 'of Bethany (ἀπὸ Βηθανίας), of the village of Mary and Martha' (ἐκ τῆς κώμης, κ.τ.λ.) Some critics say that the ἀπὸ signifies present resi- dence, and ex nativitate. Lazarus was thus a resident in Bethany at the time of the miracle, but a native of the village of Mary, which is supposed to have been in Galilee (Gresswell, Dissertations, ii. 481, seq.; Wahl, Clavis N. T.) This distinction has been rejected by the best modern critics (Alford, Kuinoel, Lücke). Bethany is called 'the village of Mary and Martha,' who thus appear to have been better known than Lazarus. Probably Martha possessed property (Lampius), and was the proprietor of the house in which Jesus had lodged; so we might conclude from the statement of Luke, who says 'she received Jesus, eis τὸν οἶκον αὐτῆς, into her house' (x. 38); and Mary had, perhaps, by her devoted attachment to Jesus, acquired distinction among his followers [MARY]. This view appears to be confirmed by the remark — 'It was Mary who anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick' (John xi. 2). Our Lord had known the family for some time. It is apparently the first introduction which Luke describes (x. 38-42) — 'It came to pass that he entered into a certain village, and a certain woman named Martha (Trench suggests 'perhaps an early widow with whom her sister and Lazarus, a younger brother, resided,' Miracles, p. 391, note, 6th ed.) received him into her house. Mary sat at his feet and heard his word; but Lazarus is not then mentioned at all. From that time Jesus appears to have made the house his home whenever he visited Jerusalem (Mark xi. 11-19; Matt. xxi. 17). The sweet repose he enjoyed there after the exciting and jarring scenes in the city, the delicate attentions and singular attachment of the gentle Mary, and the warm generous hospitality of Martha, as contrasted with the coldness and scorn of the world, and the unnatural enmity of his own kindred, touched the heart of the Saviour, and contributed no doubt to awaken those feelings so simply and yet so beautifully expressed by John, 'Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus' (xi. 5). These explain, too, that passionate burst of grief (ἐνέβριμματο τῷ πνεύματι καὶ ἐδάκρυεν αὐτὸν . . . ἑδράκρυεν, Maldonatus and Stier, in loc.) which compelled even the scoffing Pharisees to exclaim, 'Behold how he loved him!' (John xi. 33, 35). The family of Lazarus seems to have been rich and influential (see Faber Stapul, Evangel. Joan., p. 604). The perfume with which Mary anointed Jesus, which is described as πιστικῆς πολυτιμῆς, 'genuine and exceeding costly' — value for about £10 of our money; the private rock-hewn sepulchre which none but the wealthy could afford to excavate (Is. xxii. 16); and the numbers of Jews who came from Jerusalem to condole with them, were all indications of wealth and influence. The family was doubtless among the dite of Bethany, freely associating, too, even with the chief men of Jerusalem.

Lazarus was present at the feast given to our Lord in the house of Simon the Leper. Some critics affirm that the feast mentioned in John xii. 2-8 is not the same as that of which we read in Matt. xxvi. 6-13, and Mark xiv. 3-9 (Origen, Chrysostom, Lightfoot, Wolf, etc.), but the circumstances related are too numerous and minute to admit of such a view (Alford, Meyer, Lange). John does not name Simon, nor does he tell us where the feast was: — 'There (in Bethany) they made him a supper' (xii. 2). The supper appears to have been given on account of the miracle wrought on Lazarus, and not, as Lange thinks, because Jesus had healed Simon. It is not known who Simon was; but from the fact that 'Martha served,' and from the expression 'they made him a supper' (ἐποίησαν οὖν αὐτῷ), we might infer that Martha was at home, and that Simon was her husband, though separated from her and from society on account of his disease. John does not say who made the supper; yet the context seems to connect the plural verb with the three parties mentioned, Martha, Mary, and Lazarus (see in Alford; Gresswell, Dissert. ii. 554, seq.; Ellicott, Lectures on Life of our Lord, p. 283). Some suppose that Simon was Lazarus' father, and there was a very old tradition to this effect (Nicephorus, Hist. Ec. i. 27; Theophylact, in Matt. xxxi.; Ewald, Gesch. Christus).

No miracle hitherto performed by Jesus was so stupendous in its character, and had so greatly excited the Jewish mind, both for good and evil, as the resurrection of Lazarus. We cannot wonder at what Bayle (Dict., s. v. Spinoza) relates of the leader of modern infidelity, Spinoza: 'On m'a assuré, qu'il disoit à ses amis, que s'il eût pu se persuader la résurrection de Lazare, il auroit brisé en pièces tout son système, il auroit embrassé sans répugnance la foi ordinaire des Chrétiens.' In fact, if this miracle can be proved, it establishes on an indestructible basis the divine power and mission of our Lord. No thoughtful man could resist such evidence. Therefore, as might be anticipated, the enemies of Christianity have exhausted philosophy and fancy alike in their efforts to overthrow its authenticity. The coarse assertions of Woolston are not now worth notice; they were disposed of long since by Lardner (Vindication, in Works, vol. x., ed. 1838). The rationalistic views of Paulus (Kritisch. Kommentar.) and Gabler (Journal für Auserl. Theol. Lit., iii. 235) have been successfully refuted by Strauss (Leben Jesu; see also Kuinoel, in John xi.); and the mythological dreams of the latter have been dissipated by a host of later German writers, and the reality of the story triumphantly established (see especially Neander, Das Leben Jesu Christi; Stier, and Olshausen, ad loc.) The views of Paulus have just been revived in the lively romance of M. E. Renan, entitled Vie de Jesus. He confesses that there is an appearance of circumstantiality in the narrative of this miracle which distinguishes it from others. He says, indeed, that at this distance of time, and with one version of it only, it is impossible absolutely to decide whether all is fiction, or whether there is a basis of truth; yet he proceeds, 'Il est donc vraisemblable que le prodige dont il s'agit ne fut pas un de ces miracles complètement légendaires et dont personne n'est responsable. En d'autres termes, nous pensons qu'il se passa à Béthanie quelque chose qui fut regardé comme une résurrection' (p. 360). Renan's account is, that the friends of Jesus, anxious to give sceptical Jews some convincing proof of his divine mission, took advantage of the sickness of Lazarus, laid him in the family tomb, led Jesus to the sepulchre immediately on his arrival at Bethany; and then, when he expressed a wish to see the corpse of his friend, the stone was removed, and Lazarus rose! All thought it was a miracle, Jesus himself was deceived. The pious fraud of the devoted family was successful. Such is the monstrous opinion advanced with all seriousness by this philosophical French critic.

Nothing could be more unlikely; in more direct antagonism to the whole circumstances of the narrative. If there be any truth in the words of John, such a fraud was impossible. There is a precision and minuteness of detail, conversational, psychological, and topographical, in the story, which separates it entirely from the domain of legend. The evangelist is evidently telling what he saw and heard, and what left an indelible impress on his mind. Every sentence of the narrative demands, and will amply repay, a thoughtful study; and such a study cannot fail to carry with it the conviction of its reality. We note the simple message of the sisters to Jesus concerning their sick brother, 'He whom thou lovest is sick.' Christ's deliberate delay that he might work out the glory of God (ver. 4). The way in which he tells his disciples of Lazarus' death; their misunderstanding of his meaning at first, and their passionate expression of sorrow at last, 'Let us also go, that we may die with him' (16). The great concourse of people to condole with the sisters, as was the custom of the Jews (Lightfoot, ad loc.; Trench, Miracles, p. 399). The meeting of Jesus and the sisters; each of the latter giving utterance to the feeling which had filled both their minds, and formed the subject of their united lamentations during the 'four days,' 'Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died' (vers. 21, 32). Christ's words of comfort and hope, which the sisters cannot fully comprehend (vers. 23-27). The outward manifestations of grief on the part of the crowd that had gathered round them, so characteristic of Eastern customs (33). The approach to and description of the tomb (38). The painful remonstrance of Martha, practical Martha (cf. Luke x. 40), 'Lord, by this time he stinketh,' which must have been literally true, unless we suppose a continuous miracle in operation from the moment of death; for in the East decomposition sets in in a few hours (cf. Augustine, Hilary, Tertullian, and others, cited by Trench, p. 413). Then, finally, the account of the resurrection—so simple, and yet so grand. One almost thinks he sees it. If ever there was a narrative of facts, this is one. The publicity of the miracle made deception impossible. In the East a death is known to, and excites, the whole community in such a village as Bethany. We may well suppose, too, that the entire population saw the miracle performed. A large number from the neighbouring city were there also (John xi. 19)—learned, fanatical, sceptical men—prepared to scrutinize every act of Jesus, and expose any attempt at deception. It ought not to be forgotten that the word Jesus, Ἰησοῦς, with John, designates the chiefs of the Jewish people, the members of the Sanhedrim—the dominant and learned party who were characterised by bitter hostility to Jesus (i. 19; vii. 12, 13; viii. 22; ix. 22 [Jews]; Alford, in loc.; Bleek, Beiträge; Trench, Miracles, pp. 400, 411). The momentous effects of the miracle, too, tend to show its reality. The moment the report of it was carried to Jerusalem, a meeting of the Sanhedrim was summoned. The members of that august council assembled in alarm. 'What do we?' was the question they addressed to each other, 'for this man doeth many miracles. If we let him alone, all men will believe on him' (John xi. 46-48). They determined that Jesus should die (ver. 53). He knew their plans, and he retired for a time from the holy city (ver. 54). On his return to Bethany, the rebuke he gave to Judas for his unseemly attack on the devoted Mary, when she anointed him at the supper, was the immediate cause of the betrayal (John xii. 4-8, with Matt. xxvi. 8-14; Alford, in loc.) The fame of the miracle spread through the surrounding country; and the popular ovation at the triumphal entry into Jerusalem was another of its results, which fully justified the excitement and alarm created among the Pharisees, and led them to remark to each other, 'Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? Behold, the world is gone after him' (John xii. 19). The miracle causing such a sensation must have been a reality. Any attempt at fraud could not have escaped detection and exposure.

The raising of Lazarus is related by John alone. None of the other Evangelists mention his name, or even allude to the miracle. This has been a puzzle to commentators, and a ground of cavil and attack to infidels and sceptics. But why should it be so? It is not the only miracle of our Lord which has a single historian among the Evangelists; nor is it the only great event in his life of which John is the sole witness (cf. John ii. 1-12; iii. 1-21; iv. 46-54; v. 1 seq.; ix. 1 seq.). It is a fact that the synoptic Gospels relate chiefly to the miracles wrought in Galilee, while John gives those of which the scene was in Judea. Why this was we cannot tell. It is vain to inquire. Who can fathom the motives and objects of the Divine Spirit in the plan and structure of revelation? Various attempts have been made to account for the silence of the three Evangelists in this case (see Trench, Miracles, p. 389; also Lightfoot, Grotius, Kuinoel, Olshausen, in loc.); but Neander has truly said that 'to seek a special reason for the omission of the miracle can lead to nothing but arbitrary hypothesis' (Das Leben Jesu, 234; cf. Alford, Prolegomena to Gospels, i. sec. 5. 1). It would have been interesting to know something of the after-life of Lazarus. What effect did the great miracle produce on his character? Was his faith shaken by the crucifixion, or did the fulness of his own experience keep him firm in the belief that Jesus was 'the resurrection and the life'? Did he meet and follow Christ after his resurrection? Did he go and preach to the churches in Palestine or elsewhere the life-giving doctrines of the Gospel—showing himself at the same time as the most wonderful monument of Jesus' divine power and divine mission? Or did he, awed and solemnized by his brief view of the world of spirits, shrink from publicity, and meditate in silence and retirement on subjects hid from mortal eyes? . . . But nothing has been revealed in God's word, and the fables of Apocryphal tradition are not worth recording (Epist. Pil. ad Tiberiam, in Giles' Cod. Apoc. N. T., p. 457; Epiphanius, Adv. Hæreses, i. 652).

2. The name of the beggar in our Lord's beautiful parable recorded in Luke xvi. 19-31. The introduction of a proper name into this parable makes it possible, and perhaps probable, that the story had a foundation in fact, as is stated in an old tradition (Theophylact, in loc.; Chrysostom, De Lazaro).

Some have thought that our Lord may have had Lazarus of Bethany here before his mind (Oosterzee, ad loc.) But however this may be, it must be admitted that there is embodied in this parable something far higher than an isolated historical fact, or an incidental and touching allusion to a friend—it contains a sublime truth, and it presents it before the mind's eye with wonderful vividness. The name Lazarus is appropriate, in whatever way it came to be selected. It signifies either 'God aids,' from the Hebrew לֵאזָרָא, and thus contemplates the beggar from a divine stand-point (Lightfoot, Meyer, Alford). Or it may mean 'the helpless,' לֵאזָרָא, regarding him from a human stand-point (Olshausen, Lange). For expositions of the parable, see Trench, Parables; Stier, Reden; Kuinoel, ad loc.; Chrysostom, l. c.—J. L. P.

LEAD (עֹפֶרֶת; Sept. Μόλυβδος), a well-known metal, the first Scriptural notice of which occurs in the triumphal song in which Moses celebrates the overthrow of Pharaoh, whose host is there said to have 'sunk like lead' in the waters of the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 10).

Before the use of quicksilver was known, lead was used for the purpose of purifying silver, and separating it from other mineral substances (Plin. Hist. Nat., xxxii. 31). To this Jeremiah alludes where he figuratively describes the corrupt condition of the people: 'In their fire the lead is consumed (in the crucible); the smelting is in vain, for the evil is not separated' (Jer. vi. 29). Ezekiel (xxii. 18-22) refers to the same fact, and for the same purpose, but amplifies it with greater minuteness of detail. Compare also Mal. iii. 2, 3.

Job (xix. 23, 24) expresses a wish that his words were engraven 'with an iron pen and lead.' These words are commonly supposed to refer to engraving on a leaden tablet; and it is undeniable that such tablets were anciently used as a writing material (Pausan. ix. 31; Plin. Hist. Nat., xiii. 11). But our authorized translators, by rendering 'an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever,' seem to have entertained the same view with Rosenmüller, who supposes that molten lead was to be poured into letters sculptured on stone with an iron chisel, in order to raise the inscription. The translator of Rosenmüller (in Bib. Cabinet, xxvii. 64) thinks that the poetical force of the passage has been overlooked by interpreters: 'Job seems not to have drawn his image from anything he had actually seen executed: he only wishes to express in the strongest possible language the durability due to his words; and accordingly he says, 'May the pen be iron, and the ink of lead, with which they are written on an everlasting rock,' i. e., Let them not be written with ordinary perishable materials.' This explanation seems to be suggested by that of the Septuagint, which has 'Ἐν γραφείῳ σιδηρῷ καὶ μολύβδῳ, ἥ ἐν πέτραις ἐγγλυφῆναι, i. e., 'that they were sculptured by an iron pen and lead, or hewn into rocks.'

Although the Hebrew weights were usually of stone, and are indeed called 'stones,' a leaden weight denominated לֵאנָא anach, which is the Arabic word for lead, occurs in Amos vii. 7, 8. In Acts xxvii. 28, a plummet for taking soundings at sea is mentioned, and this was of course of lead.

The ancient uses of lead in the East seem to have been very few, nor are they now numerous. One may travel far in Western Asia without discovering any trace of this metal in any of the numerous useful applications which it is made to serve in European countries.

We are not aware that any trace of lead has been yet found within the limits of Palestine. But ancient lead-mines, in some of which the ore has been exhausted by working, have been discovered by Mr. Burton in the mountains between the Red Sea and the Nile; and lead is also said to exist at a place called Sheff, near Mount Sinai.—J. LEAF, LEAVES. The word so translated in the A. V. in reference to foliage is עֵלֶף, φύλλον, with the exception of Ezek. xvii. 9, where לְרִפִּי is used, meaning fresh leaves, such as are easily torn off, derived from the verb רָפָה, which occurs in Gen. viii. 11, 'In her mouth an olive leaf plucked off'

עֵלֶף הָיְתָה בְּפִי. In two passages, Prov. xi. 28, Neh. viii. 15, עֵלֶף is translated branch. In Dan. iv. 9, 11 (12, 14, A. V.), the word עָנִי, from עָנָה, to sprout or bloom, is rendered leaf, but in Ps. civ. 12, branch. For leaves of doors, or folding doors, the Hebrew term is פְּתִיחוֹת (Deut. iii. 5; Josh. ii. 9, etc.), or לְתִתָּן (1 Kings vi. 32, 34; Ezek. xli. 24); in one passage, Jer. xxxvi. 23, this word is also used for the leaves (A. V.), or rather columns (σελίδας, LXX.) of a manuscript roll. In the Scriptures the green leaf is an emblem of vigour and prosperity, Ps. i. 3; Jer. xvii. 8; and the faded or fallen leaf of weakness and ruin, Lev. xxvi. 36; Job xiii. 25; Is. i. 30; xxxiv. 4. The medicinal virtues of leaves are alluded to in Ezek. xlvii. 12; Rev. xxii. 2.—J. E. R.

LEAH, one of the two daughters of Laban who became the wives of Jacob [JACOB].

LEATHER. [SKINS; TANNER.]

LEAVEN. Two Hebrew words are thus translated in the A. V., 1. שָׂאֵר, Sept. ζύμη (Exod. xii. 15, 19; Lev. ii. 11; Deut. xvi. 4). The primary meaning of this word the lexicons derive from שָׂאָה, an unused word kindred with שָׂאָה, to boil, to swell up; comp. Arab. شَار, shāra, to boil up; Gr. ζύμη, from ζῆω; Lat. fermentum, from fervio; Eng. leaven, from Fr. lever, to raise, or rather the A. S. hlefan. 2. חֲמֵץ, Sept. ζύμη (Lev. ii. 11; vi. 10 [A. V. 17]; xxiii. 17; Amos iv. 5). This word, from חָמַץ, to be sharp, sour, means anything soured, and hence anything fermented or leavened; it is properly an adjective, and is so used (Exod. xii. 15; comp. ver. 19, where מִצֵּת is used as its equivalent, Lev. vii. 13, etc.) Opposed to these is מִצֵּה, Sept. ἀζυμος scil. ἀστος, unleavened (without leaven, Lev. x. 12), pl. מִצֵּהוֹת, ἄζυμα.

That Sor and Chamets are synonymous is clear from Exod. xii. 15, where they are both used of the same object. It is probable, however, that the latter has a more general significancy than the former, so as to be applicable to both kinds of fermentation, vinous and acetous. The cognate word חֶמֶץ, is the word for vinegar (Num. vi. 3; Ruth ii. 11; Ps. lxxix. 22; Prov. x. 26).

The usual leaven in the East is dough kept till it becomes sour, and which is kept from one day to another for the purpose of preserving leaven in readiness. Thus, if there should be no leaven in all the country for any length of time, as much as might be required could easily be produced in twenty-four hours. Sour dough, however, is not exclusively used for leaven in the East, the lees of wine being in some parts employed as yeast' (Pictorial Bible, vol. i., p. 161). In the Talmud mention is made of leaven formed of the קולן של סופרים, bookmakers' paste (Pesach. iii. 1).

The process of fermentation is one simply of corruption. It was probably on this account that fermented bread was forbidden to be used in the Passover, and that all leaven was to be purged out of the houses of the Israelites for the seven days of that festival (Exod. xii. 15, ff.); and that in all offerings made by fire unto the Lord, unleavened bread alone was to be used (Lev. ii. 4, 11; vii. 12; viii. 2; Num. vi. 15); though where the offering was not to be consumed upon the altar, but eaten by the priests, it might contain bread that was leavened (Lev. vii. 13; xxiii. 17). It is to be presumed, also, that the shewbread was unleavened; both, a fortiori, from the prohibition of leaven in the bread offered on the altar, and because in the directions given for the making of the shewbread it is not specified that leaven should be used (Lev. xxiv. 5 9); for, in all such cases, what is not enjoined is prohibited. Jewish tradition also asserts that the shewbread was without leaven (Joseph. Antiq. iii. 6. 6; Talm. Minchoth v. 2, 3). As all corruption implies impurity, it was not fitting that anything in which corruption was going on should be presented to the Lord or before him; and as Israel had been delivered out of Egypt that they might be a pure people unto the Lord, it was proper that in celebrating that event they should put away from their houses whatever was a symbol of corruption. For the same reason, honey was prohibited to be offered to the Lord, because of its tendency to ferment. Traces of the same belief and feeling may be found among heathen nations (comp. Plutarch, Quest. Rom., 109; Aul. Gell., x. 15, 19). The command to purge all leaven out of their houses during the Passover festival, and the zeal of the Jews to observe that injunction (comp. Mishnah, Pesach. ii. 1; Schöttgen, Hör. Hebr. i. 598), have afforded to the apostle a striking figure by which to enforce purity of communion in the church of Christ (1 Cor. v. 7). The diffusive power of leaven, and its tendency to assimilate to itself that on which it acts, are laid hold of by our Saviour to illustrate the character of his kingdom as a progressive power in the mass of humanity (Matt. xiii. 33; Luke xiii. 21), and by him and St. Paul as illustrative of the diffusive influence of evil (Matt. xvi. 6, 12; Mark viii. 15; Luke xii. 1; 1 Cor. v. 6; Gal. v. 9). The idea seems to have been familiar to the Jews; comp. Otho, Lex Rabbin. Phil., p. 227. They even employed leaven as a figure of the inherent corruption of man. 'R. Alexander, when he had finished his prayers, said, Lord of the universe, it is clearly manifest before thee that it is our will to do thy will: what hinders that we do not thy will? The leaven which is in the mass (Gl., The evil desire which is in the heart)' (Babyl. Berachoth, 17. 1; ap. Meuschen N. T. ex Talmude ill.) We find the same allusion in the Roman poet Persius (Sat. i. 24; comp. Casaubon's note, Comment. p. 74).—W. L. A.

LEBANON, the loftiest and most celebrated mountain-range in Syria, forming the northern boundary of Palestine, and running thence along the coast of the Mediterranean to the great pass which opens into the plain of Hamath. The range of Anti-lebanon, usually included by geographers under the same general name, lies parallel to the other, commencing on the south at the fountains of the Jordan, and terminating in the plain of Hamath.

I. THE NAME.—In the O. T. these mountain ranges are always called לְבָנוֹן, Lebanon, to which in prose the art. is constantly prefixed הַלְבָנוֹן; in poetry the art. is sometimes prefixed and sometimes not, as in Is. xiv. 8, and Ps. xxix. 5. The origin of the name has been variously accounted for. It is derived from the root לָבַן, 'to be white.' הַלְבָנוֹן is thus emphatically 'The White Mountain' of Syria. It is a singular fact that almost uniformly the names of the highest mountains in all countries have a like meaning—Mont Blanc; Himalayah (in Sanscrit signifying 'snowy'), Ben Nevis, Snowdon, perhaps also Alps (from albi 'white,' like the Latin albus, and not, as commonly thought, from alp, 'high'). Some suppose the name originated in the white snow by which the ridge is covered a great part of the year (Bochart, Opera, i. 678; Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 741; Stanley, S. and P., p. 395). Others derive the name from the whitish colour of the limestone rock of which the great body of the range is composed (Winer, Realwörterbuch, s.v. Libanon; Schulzii Leitungen des Hochst., v., p. 471; Robinson, B. R., ii. 493). The former seems the more natural explanation, and is confirmed by several circumstances. Jeremiah mentions the 'snow of Lebanon' (xviii. 14); in the Chaldee paraphrase ܠܒܢܐ, 'snow mountain,' is the name given to it, and this is equivalent to a not uncommon modern Arabic appellation جبل الثلج, Jebel eth-Thelj (Gesenius, Thes., l. c.; Abulfeda, Tab. Syr., p. 18). Others derive the name Lebanon from Λιβανός, 'frankincense,' the gum of a tree called libanos (Reland, Pal., p. 312; Herodot. i. 183), which is mentioned among the gifts presented by the magi to the infant Saviour (Matt. ii. 11).

This, however, is in Hebrew לְבָנוֹן, Lebanon (Exod. xxx. 34; Is. lx. 6). The Greek name of Lebanon, both in the Septuagint and classic authors, is uniformly Λιβανός (Strabo, xvi. p. 755; Ptol. v. 15). The Septuagint has sometimes Ἀντι-Λιβανός instead of Λιβανός, but for what reason it is impossible to tell (Deut. i. 7; iii. 25; Josh. i. 4; ix. 1). The Latin name is Libanus (Pliny, v. 17), which is the reading of the Vulgate. It would appear that the Greek and Roman geographers regarded the name as derived from the snow. Tacitus speaks of it as a remarkable phenomenon that snow should lie where there is such intense heat—'Præcipuum montium Libanum erigit, mirum dictu, tantos inter ardores opacum fidumque nivibus' (Historia, v. 6). And so Jerome writes, 'Libanus λευκαμῦς—id est, candor interpretatur' (Adversus Jovianum, Opera, ii. 286, ed. Migne); he also notes the identity of the name of this mountain and 'frankincense'—δμωνίμως apud Græcos et Hebræos et mons appellatur, et thus' (in Osee, Opp. vi. 160). Arab geographers call the range Jebel Libnân, جبل لبنان (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr., p. 163; Edrisi, p. 336, ed. Jaubert). This name, however, is now seldom heard among the people of Syria, and when used it is confined to the western range. Different parts of this range have distinct names—the northern section is called Jebel Akkâr, the central Sunnûn, and the southern J. ed-Druze. Other local names are also used.

The eastern range, as well as the western, is frequently included under the general name Lebanon in the Bible (Josh. i. 4; Judg. iii. 3); but in Josh. xiii. 5 it is correctly distinguished as 'Lebanon toward the sun-rising' (הַלְבָנוֹן מִיָּמִינֵי הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ; Sept. Ἀβανὸν ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν ἡλίου; and translated in the Vulgate, 'Libani quoque regio contra orientem'). The southern section of this range was well known to the sacred writers as HERMON, and had in ancient times several descriptive titles given to it—Sirion, Shenir, Sion; just as it has in modern days—Jebel esh-Sheikh, J. el-Helf, J. Antâr [HERMON]. Greek writers called the whole range 'Ἀντιλίβανος (Strabo, xvi., p. 754; Ptolemy, v. 15), a word which is sometimes found in the Septuagint as the rendering of the Hebrew Lebanon (l. c.) Latin authors also uniformly distinguish the eastern range by the name Antilibanus (Plin. v. 20). The name is appropriate, describing its position, lying 'opposite' or 'over against' Lebanon (Strabo, l. c.) Yet it does not seem to have been known to Josephus, who uniformly calls the eastern as well as the western range Ἀβανος; thus he speaks of the fountains of the Jordan as being near to Libanus (Antiq. v. 3. 1), and of Abila as situated in Libanus (xix. 5. 1). The range of Anti-lebanon is now called by all native geographers Jebel esh-Shurky (جبل الشرقي, 'East mountain'), to distinguish it from Lebanon proper, which is sometimes termed Jebel el-Ghurby (جبل الغربي, 'West mountain'; Robinson, B. R., ii. 437; Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 4).

To insure greater definiteness, and to prevent repetition, the name Lebanon will be applied in this article to the western range, and Anti-lebanon to the eastern.

2. PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY—LEBANON.—The mountain-chain of Lebanon commences at the great valley which connects the plain of Hamath with the Mediterranean (and which was anciently called 'the entrance of Hamath,' Num. xxxiv. 8), in lat. 34° 40'; and runs in a south-western direction along the coast, till it sinks into the plain of Acre and the low hills of Galilee, in lat. 33°. Its extreme length is 110 geographical miles, and the average breadth of its base is about 20 miles. The highest peak, called Dahur el-Kudûb, is about 25 miles from the northern extremity, and just over the little cedar grove; its elevation is 10,051 feet (Van de Velde, Memoir, 170). From this point the range decreases in height toward the south. The massive rounded summit of Sunnûn, 23 miles from the former, is 8500 feet high. Jebel Keniseh, the next peak, is 6824 feet; and Tomat Niha, 'the Twin-peaks,' the highest tops of southern Lebanon, are about 6500 feet. From these the fall is rapid to the ravine of the river Litâny, the ancient Leontes.

Some writers regard the Litâny as marking the southern limit of Lebanon; and it would seem that the ancient classical geographers were of this opinion (Smith's Dict. of G. and R. Geog., s.v. Libanus; Kitto, Physical Hist. of Pal., p. 32). Diodorus Siculus describes Lebanon as extending along the coast of Tripolis, Byblus, and Sidon (Hist. xix. 58); and the Litâny falls into the sea a few miles south of Sidon. The notices of Ptolemy are somewhat indefinite, and represent the two chains of Lebanon and Anti-lebanon as commencing at the Mediterranean—the former on the north, the latter on the south (Geog. v. 15). Strabo is more definite and less accurate—'There are two mountains which enclose Cœle-syria, lying parallel to each other. The commencement of both these mountains, Libanus and Anti-libanus, is a little way above the sea. Libanus rises from the sea near Tripolis and Theoprosopon; and Anti-libanus from the sea near Sidon. They terminate somewhere near the Arabian mountains, which are above the district of Damascus and the Trachones. . . . A hollow plain lies between them, whose breadth toward the sea is 200 stadia, and its length from the sea to the interior about twice as much. Rivers flow through it, the largest of which is the Jordan' (xvi., p. 754). According to Pliny the chains begin at the sea, but they run from south to north (H. N., v. 17; cf. Ammian. Marcell. xiv. 26). Cellarius merely repeats these ancient authors (Geog. ii. 439). Reland shews their errors and contradictions, but he cannot solve them, though he derived some important information from Maundrell (Pal., pp. 317, seq.; cf. Early Trav. in Pal., Bohn, p. 483). Rosenmüller (Bib. Geog., ii. 207, Clark), Wells (Geog. i. 239), and others, only repeat the old mistakes.

The source of these errors may be seen by an examination of the physical geography of the district east of Tyre and Sidon. There can be no doubt that the range of Lebanon, viewed in its physical formation, extends from the entrance of Hamath to the plain of Acre. But between the parallels of Tyre and Sidon it is cut through by the chasm of the Litâny, which drains the valley of Cœle-syria. That river enters the range obliquely on the eastern side, turns gradually westward, and at length divides the main ridge at right angles. Here, therefore, it may be said, in one sense, that the chain terminates; and though on the south bank of the Litâny another chain rises, and runs in the line of the former, it is not so lofty, its greatest height scarcely exceeding 3000 feet. Ancient geographers thought Lebanon terminated on the north bank of the Litâny; and as that river drains the valley of Cœle-syria, which lies between Lebanon and Anti-lebanon, they naturally supposed that the chain on the south bank of the Litâny was the commencement of the latter range. Here lies the error, which the writer of this article was among the first to detect, by an examination of the general conformation of the mountain-ranges from the summit of Hermon (see Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. xi. 52; Porter's Damascus, i. 296). Anti-lebanon is completely separated from this western range by a broad and deep valley. The great valley of the Jordan extends northward to the western base of Hermon, in the parallel of the chasm of the Litâny. From this point a narrower valley, called Wady el-Teim, runs northward, till it meets an eastern branch of Cœle-syria. These three valleys, forming a continuous line, constitute the western boundary of Anti-lebanon. No part of that chain crosses them (Robinson, ii. 438). The southern end of the plain of Cœle-syria is divided by a low ridge into two branches. Down the eastern branch runs Wady el-Teim, conveying a tributary to the Jordan (Bib. Sac., i. c.; Robinson, iii. 428-30); down the western runs the Litâny. The latter branch soon contracts into a wild chasm, whose banks are in some places above a thousand feet high, of naked rock, and almost perpendicular. At one spot the ravine is only 60 feet wide, and is spanned by a natural bridge, at the height of about 100 feet above the stream. Over it rise jagged walls of naked limestone, pierced with numerous caves. The scenery is here magnificent; as one stands on this arch of nature's own building, he can scarcely repress feelings of alarm. The cliffs almost meeting overhead; rugged masses of rock shooting out from dizzy heights, and appearing as if about to plunge into the chasm; the mad river far below dashing along from rapid to rapid in sheets of foam. In wild grandeur this chasm has no equal in Syria, and few in the world. Yet, from a short distance on either side, it is not visible. The mountain-chain appears to run on in its course, declining gradually, but without any interruption. The ridge, in fact, has been cleft asunder by some terrible convulsion; and through the cleft the waters of Cœle-syria have forced their way to the Mediterranean instead of the Jordan, which is the natural outlet. It will thus be seen that the ridge on the south bank of the Litâny is the prolongation of that on the north, and is a part of Lebanon (Robinson, ii. 438); and that the chasm of the Litâny, though the drain of Cœle-syria, is no part of that valley. Neither Cœle-syria, therefore, nor Anti-lebanon, at any point, approaches within many miles of the Mediterranean (Handbook for S. and P., 571; Robinson, iii. 420, seq.; Van de Velde, Travels, i. 145, seq.).

The view of Lebanon from the Mediterranean is exceedingly grand. The writer saw its glittering summits from the shores of Cyprus. On approaching, it appears to rise from the bosom of the deep like a vast wall; the wavy top densely covered with snow during winter and spring; and the two highest peaks capped with crowns of ice on the sultriest days of summer. The western slopes are long and gradual, furrowed from top to bottom with deep rugged ravines, and broken everywhere by lofty cliffs of white rock, and rugged banks, and tens of thousands of terrace walls, rising like steps of stairs from the sea to the snow-wreaths. 'The whole mass of the mountain consists of whitish limestone, or at least the rocky surface, as it reflects the light, exhibits everywhere a whitish aspect. The mountain teems with villages, and is cultivated more or less almost to the top. Yet so steep and rocky is the surface, that the tillage is carried on chiefly by means of terraces, built up with great labour, and covered above with soil. When one looks upward from below, the vegetation on these terraces is not seen, so that the whole mountain side appears as if composed of immense rugged masses of naked whitish rock, severed by deep wild ravines, running down precipitously to the plain. No one would suspect among these rocks the existence of a vast multitude of thrifty villages, and a numerous population of mountaineers, hardy, industrious, and brave' (Robinson, ii. 493; cf. Volney, Travels, i. 272, seq.).

On looking down the western slopes from the brow of one of the projecting bluffs, or through the vista of one of the glens, the scenery is totally different; it is now rich and picturesque. The tops of the little stair-like terraces are seen, all green with corn, or straggling vines, or the dark foliage of the mulberry. The steeper banks and ridgetops have their forests of pine and oak; while far away down in the bottom of the glens, and round the villages and castellated convents, are large groves of gray olives. The aspect of the various sections of the mountains is, however, very different; the rocks and strata often assuming strange fantastic shapes. At the head of the valley of the Dog river are some of the most remarkable rock formations in Lebanon. Here numbers of little ravines fall into the main glen, and their sides, with the intervening ridges, are thickly covered with high peaks of naked limestone, sometimes rising in solitary grandeur like obelisks; but generally grouped together, and connected by narrow ledges like arched viaducts. In one place the horizontal strata in the side of a lofty cliff are worn away at the edges, giving the whole the appearance of a large pile of cushions. In other places there are tall stalks, with broad tops like tables. In many places the cliffs are ribbed, resembling the pipes of an organ, or columnar basalt. A single perch of clear soil can scarcely be found in one spot throughout the whole region, but every minute patch is cultivated. In more than one place the writer has seen wheat growing in grottoes, and under natural arches (Porter's Damascus, ii. 289). The highest peaks of the range are naked, white, and barren. A line drawn at the altitude of about 6000 feet would mark the limits of cultivation. Above that line the shelving sides and rounded tops are covered with loose limestone debris, and are almost entirely destitute of vegetable life.

The western base of Lebanon does not correspond with the shore-line. In some cases bold spurs shoot out from the mountains, and dip perpendicularly into the sea, forming bluff promontories, such as the 'Ladder of Tyre,' Promontorium Album or 'White Cape,' the well-known pass of the Dog river, and Theoprosopon, now called Ras esh-Shuk'ah. In other places the mountains retire, or the shore-line advances (as at Beyrout and Tripolis), leaving little sections of fertile plain, varying from half a mile to three miles in width. This was the territory of the old Phœnicians, and on it still lie the scattered remains of their once great cities [PHŒNICIA]. From the promontory of Theoprosopon a low ridge strikes northward along the shore past Tripolis, separated from the main chain by a narrow valley. When it terminates, the coast-plain becomes much wider, and gradually expands, till it opens at the northern base of Lebanon into the 'entrance of Hamath' (Robinson, iii. 385).

Eastern declivities.—From the east Lebanon presents a totally different aspect. It does not seem much more than half as high as when seen from the west. This is chiefly owing to the plain of Cœle-syria (now called d-Bukâ'a, CœLE-SYRIA), which extends along its base, and has an average elevation of about 3000 feet (Van de Velde, Memoir, 175). The ridge resembles a colossal wall, its sides precipitous, and thinly covered, in most places, with oak forests. There are very few—only some two or three—glens furrowing them. The summit of the ridge, or backbone, is much nearer the eastern than the western side; and extending in gentle undulations, white with snow, far as the eye can see to the right and left, it forms a grand object from the ruins of Ba'albek, and still more so from the heights of Anti-lebanon. A nearer approach to the chain reveals a new feature. A side ridge runs along the base of the central chain from the town of Zahleh to its northern extremity; and is thinly covered throughout with forests of oak intermixed with wild plum, hawthorn, juniper, and other trees. A little south of the parallel of Sunfn this ridge is low and narrow, and the Bukâ'a is there widest. Advancing northward the ridge increases in height, and encroaches on the plain, until, at the fountain of the Orontes ('Ain el-'Asy), it attains its greatest elevation, and there the plain is narrowest. From this point southwards to where the road crosses from Ba'albek to the Cedars, the central chain is steep, naked, and destitute of vegetation, except here and there a solitary oak or blasted pine clinging to the rocks (Porter's Damascus, ii. 303, seq.; Robinson, iii. 530, seq.)

The northern extremity of Lebanon is clearly defined. The side ridge above described sinks down in graceful wooded slopes into Wady Khâled, which drains a part of the plain of Hums, and falls into Nahr el-Kebîr. The main chain also terminates abruptly a little farther west, and its base is swept by the waters of the Kebir, the ancient river Eleutherus (Robinson, iii. 558-60).

Rivers.—Lebanon is rich in rivers and fountains, fed by the eternal snows that crown its summit, and the vapours which they condense. The 'streams from Lebanon' were proverbial for their abundance and beauty in the days of the Hebrew prophets (Cant. iv. 15), and its 'cold-flowing waters' were types of richness and luxury (Jer. xviii. 14). Some of them, too, have obtained a classic celebrity (see Reland, Pal., 437, 269). They are all small mountain-torrents rather than rivers. The following are the more important:—The Eleutherus (now Nahr el-Kebîr), rising in the plain of Emesa, west of the Orontes, sweeps round the northern base of Lebanon, through the 'entrance of Hamath,' and falls into the Mediterranean midway between Tripolis and Aradus. Strabo states that it formed the northern border of Phœnicia and Cœle-syria (xvi. p. 753; Robinson, iii. 576). The Kadisha, or 'sacred river,' now generally called Nahr Abu Aly, has its highest sources around the little cedar grove, and descends through a sublime ravine to the coast near Tripolis. At one spot its glen has perpendicular walls of rock on each side nearly 1000 feet high. Here, on opposite banks, are two villages, the people of which can converse across the chasm, but to reach each other requires a toilsome walk of two hours. In a wild cleft of the ravine is the convent of Kanobin, the chief residence of the Maronite patriarch (Handbook for S. and P., 586). The Adonis (Nahr Ibrahim), famous in ancient fable as the scene of the romantic story of Venus and Adonis. Killed by a boar on its banks, the blood of Adonis dyed the waters, which have ever since, on the anniversary of his death, run red to the sea (Lucien, De Syria Dea, 6; Strabo, xv. p. 170). Adonis is supposed to be identical with Tammuz, for whom Ezekiel represents the Jewish women as weeping (viii. 14). The source is a noble fountain beside the ruins of a temple of Venus, and near the site of Apheca, now marked by the little village of Afka (Eusebius, Vit. Const. iii. 55; Porter, Damascus, ii. 297; Ritter, Pal. und Syr., iv. 558). The Adonis falls into the sea a few miles south of the Biblical Gebal. The Lycus flumen, now Nahr el Kelb, or 'Dog river,' rises high up on the flank of Sunfn, and breaks down through a picturesque glen. At its mouth is that famous pass on whose sculptured rocks Assyrian, Egyptian, Roman, and French (!) generals have left records of their expeditions and victories (Robinson, iii. 618; Handbook, 407, seq.; Strabo, xvi. p. 755). The Magoras of Pliny (v. 17), is probably the modern Nahr Beyrout. The Tamyras or Damouras (Strabo, xvi. p. 756; Polybius, v. 68) rises near Deir el-Kamr, the capital of Lebanon. It is now called Nahr ed-Dammûr. The Bostrenus of ancient authors appears to be identical with Nahr el-Awaley, though some doubt this. The Leontes has already been mentioned. The lower section of it is now generally termed Kasimiyeh, and the upper section Litâny. Its chief sources are at Chalcis and Ba'albek; but a large tributary flows down from the ravine of Zahleh, and is the only stream which descends the eastern slopes of Lebanon.

ANTI-LEBANON.—The centre and culminating point of Anti-lebanon is HERMON. From it a number of ranges radiate, like the ribs of a half-open fan. The first and loftiest runs north-east, parallel to Lebanon, and separated from it by the valley of Cœle-syria, whose average breadth is about six miles. This ridge is the back-bone of Anti-lebanon. Where it joins Hermon it is broad, irregular, intersected by numerous valleys and little fertile plains, and covered with thin forests of dwarf oak. Its elevation is not more than 4500 feet. Advancing northward its features become wilder and grander, oak trees give place to juniper, and the elevation increases until, above the beautiful plain of Zebedâny—which lies embosomed in its very centre—it attains a height of about 7000 feet (Van de Velde, Memoir, 175). From this point to the parallel of Ba'albek there is little change in the elevation or scenery. Beyond the latter it begins to fall, and declines gradually until at length it sinks down into the great plain of Hamath, eight miles east of Riblah, and sixteen south of Emesa. With the exception of the little upland plains, and a few of the deeper valleys, this ridge is incapable of cultivation. The sides are steep and rugged, in many places sheer precipices of naked, jagged rock, nearly 1000 feet high. They are not so bare or bleak, however, as the higher summits of Lebanon. Vegetation is abundant among the rocks; and though the inhabitants are few and far between, immense flocks of sheep and goats are pastured upon the mountains, and wild beasts—bears, boars, wolves, jackals, hyænas, foxes—are far more abundant than in any other part of Syria or Palestine (Porter's Damascus, ii. 315).

The lowest and last of the ridges that radiate from Hermon runs nearly due east along the magnificent plain of Damascus, and continues onward to Palmyra. Its average elevation is not more than 3000 feet, and it does not rise more than about 700 feet above the plain, though some of its peaks are much higher. Its rock is chalky, almost pure white, and entirely naked—not a tree, or shrub, or patch of verdure, is anywhere seen upon it. It thus forms a remarkable contrast to the rich green of the plain of Damascus. From the central range to this ridge, there is a descent, by a series of broad bare terraces or plateaus, supported by long continuous walls of bare whitish limestone, varying from 100 to 1000 feet in height. Nothing could be more dreary or desolate than the scenery on these steppes. The gravelly soil, in many places thickly strewn with flints, is as bare as the cliffs that bound them. Yet they are intersected by several rich and beautiful glens, so deep, however, that their verdure and foliage cannot be seen from a distance. Towards the east these steppes gradually expand into broad upland plains, and portions of them are irrigated and tilled. On them stand the small but ancient towns of Yabrūd, Nebk, Jerūd, etc., around which madder is successfully cultivated.

Rivers.—Anti-lebanon is the source of the four great rivers of Syria. The Orontes, springing from the western base of the main ridge, beside the ruins of Lybo, flows away northward through a broad rich vale, leaving in its course the walls of Emesa, Hamath, Apamea, and Antioch. The Jordan, Palestine's sacred river, bursting from the side of Hermon, rolls down its deep mysterious valley into the Sea of Death. The Abana, the 'golden-flowing' stream of Damascus (Chrysorrhoeas, Pliny, v. 16; also called Bardinea, Steph. Byz.; see ABANA) rises on the western side of the main ridge, cuts through it and the others, and falls into the lake east of the city. The Leontes, Phœnicia's nameless stream, has its two principal fountains at the western base of Anti-lebanon, beside Chalcis and Ba'albek (Porter, Damascus, i. 11; Robinson, iii. 498, 506). The only other streams of Anti-lebanon are the Pharpar, now called el-'Awaj, rising on the eastern flank of Hermon [PHARPAR]; and the torrent which flows down the fertile glen of Helbon [HELBON] into the plain of Damascus.

3. GEOLOGY AND BOTANY.—The geology of Lebanon has never been thoroughly investigated. Dr. Anderson, who accompanied the United States Expedition under Lieut. Lynch, is the only man who has attempted anything like a scientific examination of the mountains. We are much indebted to his Reconnaissance, embodied in Lynch's Official Report. The German traveller Russegger also supplies some facts in his Reisen (vol. iii.)

The main ridges of Lebanon and Anti-lebanon are composed of Jura limestone; hard, partially crystallized, and containing few fossils. The strata have been greatly disturbed. In some places they are almost perpendicular; in others tilted over, laying bare veins and detached masses of trap. In the southern part of Lebanon, near Kedes and Safed, are many traces of recent disturbance. From the earliest ages earthquakes have been frequent, and most destructive in that region. The earthquake of 1837 buried thousands of the inhabitants of Safed beneath the ruins of their houses (Robinson, ii. 422, seq.; Handbk. 438). In the upper basin of the Jordan, and along the eastern flank of Hermon, trap rock abounds; the latter is the commencement of the great trap-fields of Haurān (Porter, Damascus, ii. 240, seq.)

Over the Jura limestone there is in many places a more recent cretaceous deposit; its colour is gray, and sometimes pure white. It is soft, and abounds in flints and fossils, ammonites, echinites, ostræa, chenopus, nerinea, etc., often occurring in large beds, as at Bhamdūn above Beyrout. Fossil fish are also found embedded in the rock near the ancient Gebal (Reland, Pal., p. 321). These cretaceous deposits occur along the whole western flank of Lebanon; and the lower eastern ranges of Anti-lebanon are wholly composed of them (D'Arvieux, Mémoires, ii. 393; Elliot, Travels, ii. 257; Volney, ii. 280).

Extensive beds of soft, friable sandstone are met with both in Lebanon and Anti-lebanon. According to Anderson, the sandstone is of a more recent period than the cretaceous strata. This change in the geological structure gives great variety to the scenery of Lebanon. The regular and graceful outlines of the sandstone ridges contrast well with the bolder and more abrupt limestone cliffs and peaks; while the ruddy hue and sombre pine forests of the former relieve the intense whiteness of the latter.

Coal has been found in the district of Metn, east of Beyrout; but it is impure, and the veins are too thin to repay mining. Iron is found in the central and southern portions of Lebanon; and there is an extensive salt-marsh on one of the eastern steppes of Anti-lebanon (Porter, Damascus, i. 161; Handbook, 363; Volney, i. 281; Burckhardt, 27).

The Botany of Lebanon, like the geology, is to a great extent unknown. It appears to be very rich. The writer during his residence in the country was often struck with the abundance, the variety, and the beauty of the trees, shrubs, and flowers of these noble mountains. The great variety of climate, from the tropical heat of the Jordan valley at the base of Hermon, to the eternal snows on its summit, affords space and fitting home for the vegetable products of nearly every part of the globe. The forests of Lebanon were celebrated throughout the ancient world. Its cedars were used in the temples and palaces of Jerusalem (1 Kings vi.; 2 Sam. v. 11; Ezra iii. 7; Is. xiv. 8; Josephus, Bell. Jud. v. 5. 2), Rome (Pliny, H. N., xiii. 11), and Assyria (Layard, Nin. and Bab., pp. 356, 644); and the pine and oak were extensively employed in ship-building (Ezek. xxvii. 4-6). On these mountains we have still the cedar, pine, oak of several varieties, terebinth, juniper, walnut, plane, poplar, willow, arbutus, olive, mulberry, carob, fig, pistachio, sycamore, hawthorn, apricot, plum, pear, apple, quince, pomegranate, orange, lemon, palm, and banana. The vine abounds everywhere. Oleanders line the streams, and rhododendrons crown the peaks higher up, with the rock-rose, ivy, berberry, and honeysuckle. The loftiest summits are almost bare, owing to the cold and extreme dryness. There are even here, however, some varieties of low prickly shrubs, which lie on the ground like cushions, and look almost as sapless as the gravel from which they spring. Many of the flowers are bright and beautiful—the anemone, tulip, pink, ranunculus, geranium, crocus, lily, star of Bethlehem, convolvulus, etc. Thistles abound in immense variety. The cereals and vegetables include wheat, barley, maize, lentils, beans, peas, carrots, turnips, potatoes, melons, pumpkins, cucumbers, tobacco, cotton, and numerous others. Irrigation is extensively practised, and wherever water is abundant the crops are luxuriant. Probably in no part of the world are there more striking examples of the triumph of industry over rugged and intractable nature than along the western slopes of Lebanon. The steepest banks are terraced; every little shelf and cranny in the cliffs is occupied by the thrifty husbandman, and planted with vine or mulberry (Robinson, iii. 14, 21, 615; Porter, Damascus, ii. 283; Handbk. 410, 413).

Zoology.—The zoology of Lebanon does not differ from that of PALESTINE, and will be treated of under that article.

4. CLIMATE.—There are great varieties of climate and temperature in Lebanon. In the plain of Dan, at the fountain of the Jordan, the heat and vegetation are almost tropical; and the exhalations from the marshy plain render the whole region unhealthy. The semi-nomads who inhabit it are as dark in complexion as Egyptians. The writer has seen the thermometer stand at 98° Fahr. in the shade on the site of Dan, while the day before it did not rise above 32° on the top of Hermon. The coast along the western base of Lebanon, though very sultry during the summer months, is not unhealthy. The fresh sea-breeze which sets in in the evening, keeps the night comparatively cool, and the air is dry and free from miasma. Snow never falls on the coast, and it is very rarely seen at a lower elevation than 2000 feet. Frost is unknown. In the plains of Coele-syria (3000 feet) and Damascus (about 2300 feet), snow falls more or less every winter, and the writer has seen it eight inches deep on the streets and terraced roofs of Damascus, while the roads were so hard with frost that horses could not walk on them. The main ridges of Lebanon and Anti-lebanon are generally covered with snow from December to March, sometimes so deeply that the roads are for weeks together impassable. During the whole summer the higher parts of the mountains are cool and pleasant, the air is extremely dry, and malaria is unknown. From the beginning of June till about the 20th of September rain never falls, and clouds are rarely seen. At the latter date the autumn rains begin, generally accompanied with storms of thunder and vivid lightning. January and February are the coldest months. The barley harvest begins, on the plain of Phœnicia, about the end of April, but in the upper altitudes it is not gathered in till the beginning of August. The writer spent a summer in the village of Shumlân, on the western declivity of Lebanon. Its elevation is 2000 feet. He kept a careful register of the thermometer and barometer. During the hottest part of the day the thermometer did not rise above 83° Fahr., and in the night it usually went down to 76°. In two months (June 20th to August 20th) the barometer did not vary a quarter of an inch; there were only two cloudy days, and one very slight shower of rain (August 12th). At Bludân, in Anti-lebanon, the writer spent several summers. Its elevation is 4800 feet; the air is extremely dry, and the thermometer never rose above 82° Fahr. in the shade. The nights were cool and pleasant. The sirocco wind is severely felt along the coast and on the western slopes of Lebanon, but not so much in Anti-lebanon. It blows occasionally during March and April. Dew is almost unknown along the mountain ridges, but in the low plains, and especially at the base of Hermon, it is very abundant (Ps. cxxxiii. 3).

5. HISTORICAL NOTICES.—Lebanon is first mentioned as a boundary of the country given by the Lord in covenant promise to Israel (Deut. i. 7; xi. 24). To the dwellers in the parched and thirsty south, or on the sultry banks of the Nile, the snows, and streams, and verdant forests of Lebanon must have seemed an earthly paradise. By such a contrast we can understand Moses' touching petition—'I pray thee let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon' (Deut. iii. 25). The mountains were originally inhabited by a number of warlike, independent tribes, some of whom Joshua conquered on the banks of Lake Merom (xi. 2-18). Farther north were the Hivites (Judg. iii. 3), and the Gibleites, and Arkites, whose names still cling to the ruins of their ancient strongholds [GIBLITES; ARKITES]. The Israelites never completely subdued them, but the enterprising Phœnicians appear to have had them under their power, or in their pay, for they got timber for their fleets from the mountains, and they were able to supply Solomon from the same forests when building the temple (1 Kings v. 9-11; Ezek. xxvii. 9, seq.) During the conquests of David and the commercial prosperity of the nation under Solomon, the Jews became fully acquainted with the richness, the grandeur, and the luxuriant foliage of Lebanon; and ever after that mountain was regarded as the emblem of wealth and majesty. Thus the Psalmist says of the Messiah's kingdom, 'The fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon' (lxxii. 16). And Solomon, praising the beauty of the Bridegroom, writes, 'His countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars' (Cant. v. 15). Isaiah also predicts of the church, 'The glory of Lebanon shall be given to it' (xxxv. 2; cf. lx. 13; Hos. xiv. 5, 6).

Anti-lebanon seems to have been early brought under the sway of Damascus, though amid its southern strongholds were some fierce tribes who preserved their independence down to a late period (1 Chron. v. 19-23; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 11. 3; Strabo, xvi. pp. 755, 756).

During the reign of the Seleucidæ several large cities were founded or rebuilt in these mountains; as Laodicea at the northern end of Anti-lebanon, Chalcis at its eastern base, Abila in the wild glen of the Abana (Luke ii. 1; ABILA). At the commencement of our era, Lebanon, with the rest of Syria, passed into the hands of Rome; and under its fostering rule great cities were built, and beautiful temples erected. The heights on which Baal-fires had burned in primeval times, and the groves where the rude mountain-tribes worshipped their idols, became the sites of noble buildings, whose ruins to this day excite the admiration of every traveller. Greece itself cannot surpass in grandeur the temples of Ba'albek and Chalcis. The writer has visited more than thirty temples in Lebanon and Anti-lebanon (Handbk., pp. 454, 457, 557, 411; cf. Robinson, iii. 438, 625).

During the wars of the Seleucidæ, the Romans, and the Saracens, the inhabitants of Lebanon probably remained in comparative security. When, under the Muslem rule, Christianity was almost extirpated from the rest of Syria, it retained its hold here; and the Maronites, who still occupy the greater part of the range, are doubtless the lineal descendants of the old Syrians. The sect originated in the 7th century, when the monk Maron taught them the Monothelitic heresy. In the 12th century they submitted to the Pope, and have ever since remained devoted Papists. They number about 200,000. The Druses, their hereditary foes, dwell in the southern section of the range, and number about 80,000. The jealousies and feuds of the rival sects, fanned by a cruel and corrupt government, often desolate 'that goodly mountain' with fire and sword. Anti-lebanon has a considerable Christian population, but they are mixed with Mohammedans, and have no political status. The whole range is under the authority of the Pasha of Damascus.

Literature.—The fullest accounts of Lebanon are found in Ritter's Pal. and Syr.; Robinson, B. R.; Van de Velde's Travels, and Memoir; Churchhill's Mount Lebanon; Buckhardt's Syria.

Anti-lebanon was almost a terra incognita until the writer of this article began his researches in 1850 (see Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 33). The general topography, statistics, etc., are given in Porter's Damascus; Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. xi.; Handbk. for S. and P.—J. L. P.

LEBAOTH (לְבָאוֹת; 'lions'; Λαβῶς; Alex. Λαβῶς; Lebaoth), a town on the southern border of Judah, only mentioned in Josh. xv. 32. It was manifestly unknown to Eusebius and Jerome, as they just state it to have been a town of Simeon (Onomast., s. v. Labaoth). It was probably a small desert village, or place of permanent encampment, in a region infested by wild beasts. It is called by the fuller name Beth-lebaoth (בֵּית לְבָאוֹת; Βαθαρωῶς; Alex. Βαθαλαβῶς; Bethlebaoth) in Josh. xix. 6, where it is enumerated among the towns allotted out of Judah to Simeon. Keil suggests that it is the same place which, in 1 Chron. iv. 31, is called Beth-birei (בֵּית בִּרְיָ, οἶκος Βαρουσχωῦ [combining two names]; Alex. Βαροῦμ); and Gesenius says the latter name is a corruption of Beth-lebaoth (Thesaur., p. 194; see BETH-BIREI).—J. L. P.

LEBBÆUS (Λεββαῖος), a surname of the Apostle Jude (Matt. x. 3). In Mark iii. 18 he is called Thaddæus, and this has led to variations of reading in the MSS. from a desire to reconcile the two passages. Thus in Matt. x. 3 the cod. B. and some miniscular codd. read καὶ Θαδδαῖος; so cod. N without the καὶ, cod. D. simply Λεββαῖος, while the Text. Rec. with A. and C' has A.

δ' ἐπικληθεὶς Θ. Lachmann has adopted the former of these readings. It is probable that Judas-Jacobi had both these as surnames, as they have the same signification substantially, Lebbæus (לֵבְבִי) being derived from לֵב, heart, and Thaddæus (תָּדֵא) from תָּדָה, breast (Winer, R. W. B., i. 632), though as תָּדָה means mamma rather than pectus, this latter etymology is somewhat suspicious. Meyer contends that Thaddæus is תָּדֵא, an independent proper name, while Lebbæus is a by-name common among the Jews. On this ground Fritzsche would read with some MSS. in Matt. x. 3, Θαδδαῖος δ' ἐπικλ. Λεββαῖος.—W. L. A.

LEBONAH (לְבוֹנָה; 'frankincense'; Λεβωνά; Alex. τοῦ Λιβάνου τῆς Λιβωνά; Lebona). In describing the situation of Shiloh, the author of the book of Judges says it is north of Bethel, east of the road leading from Bethel to Shechem, 'and on the south of Lebonah' (Judg. xxi. 19). The site of Shiloh is well known, and about three miles west of it is the little village of Lubdân; which is doubtless identical with Lebonah. The identity appears to have been first discovered by R. Parchi in the 14th century (Benj. of Jud. by Asher, ii. 435). The place is also mentioned by Maundrell and others (Early Travels, p. 436; Robinson, ii. 272). The village stands on the lower declivity of a hill, on the west of a little fertile plain, to which it gives its name. It is still inhabited, and its old gray houses have a venerable aspect. Above them, in the sides of the cliffs and rocks, are numbers of sepulchral caves, shewing that this was a place of wealth and importance in the days of Israel's glory (Handbk., p. 330).—J. L. P.

LEBONAH (לְבוֹנָה; Sept. Λιβανος, Λιβανωτός; Lat. thus; A. V. frankincense), a species of fragrant resin that exudes from a tree. It is a native product of Arabia Felix, and hence called Older Arabicus (Dioscorid. i. 82; Plaut., Mil. Glor., ii. 4). From Cant. iv. 6, 14, it has appeared to some that the tree was to be found in Palestine; but the allusion there may be merely poetical, the term being used as a synonym of what is pleasant and delightful. There is some uncertainty as to the particular kind of tree from which the lebonah was drawn. Pliny even in his day says, 'nec arboris ipsius quæ sit facies constat' (N. H. xii. 31); and Thophrastus also attests that different descriptions of the mother plant were given (De Plant. ix. 4). The Arabian botanist Abulfadli says it is a vigorous shrub, growing only in Yemen and on hills, and in respect of its leaves and fruit resembling the myrtle; a description which has been thought to apply very well to the Amyris katif, or the Amyris kafal (Sprengel, Hist. rei Herb., i. 12, 257; Gesch. der Botanik, i. 16). From the bad quality of the frankincense now obtained in Arabia (called there لَبَان), it has been supposed that the finer kind in use among the Hebrews must have been brought from India. The Arabs themselves use for the best sort the name كُنْدُر, kundur, from the Sanscrit kundū; and according to Colebrooke (Asiat. Res. ix. 377) this comes from a tree known to botanists as the Boswellia serrata or thurifera, and which grows on the hills in India, abundantly near Nagpure. When the bark is pierced, there exudes a gum of a whitish or yellowish colour, externally powdery from friction, but internally pellucid, very brittle, with a balsamic or resinous smell, and a somewhat acrid taste; it burns with a clear flame and an agreeable odour. It is the olibanum of the Pharmacopœia. As the Indian frankincense would come to the western nations through Arabia, this may account for all the ancient writers making it a product of that country alone. In the Mosaic ceremonial frankincense was used as an ingredient in the perfume or incense that was to be placed before the Lord (Exod. xxx. 34, ff.); and as an accompaniment to the meat-offering (Lev. ii. 1, 16; vi. 15; xxiv. 7; Num. v. 15). Its use in these cases arose from its fragrant odour when burnt; in which respect the incense was a symbol of the divine name, and its diffusion an emblem of the publishing abroad of that name (Mal. i. 11; comp. Song i. 3); and from this, as prayer is a calling on God's name, the incense came to be an emblem of prayer (Ps. cxli. 2; Luke i. 10; Rev. v. 8; viii. 3, 4). In this symbolical representation the frankincense especially set forth holiness as characteristic of the divine name, so that the burning of it was a celebration of the holiness of Jehovah (Bähr, Symbolik d. Mos. Cultus, i. 466; ii. 329, etc.) In this respect its whiteness, from which it received its name (לְבָנָה, from לָבַן, to be white), became significant. It was used also in the religious services of the heathen (Herod. i. 183; Ovid, Trist. v. 5. 11; Metam. vi. 164; Arnob. adv. Gentes, vi. 3; vii. 26, etc.) On the altars of Mylitta and the Paphian Venus only incense was burnt (Münter, Relig. der Babylonier, p. 55; Der tempel d. himml. Göttin zu Paphos, p. 20; Hom., Od. viii. 363; see Damm on Sophocles; Tacit., Hist. ii. 3). This was quite foreign from the Mosaic institute.—W. L. A.

LECAH (לֶכָּה; Ἀλεχάδ; Alex. Ἀλεχάδ; Lecha).

In enumerating the sons of Shelah, the son of Judah, 'Er, the father of Lecah,' is mentioned (1 Chron. iv. 21). Lecah was a town or village colonized or occupied by the family of Er. The name is not found in any other place, nor is its site known. It appears to have been near Mareshah.—J. L. P.

LE CLERC, JEAN (CLERICUS JOANNES), was born at Geneva in 1657. He became professor of Hebrew, and afterwards of church history to the Remonstrants at Amsterdam. In this office he continued till his death, which took place in 1736. Le Clerc was a man of indefatigable industry, and his writings are very numerous. The following are the more important of his works on Biblical subjects:—Translatio Librorum V. T. cum paraphrasi perpetua, Comment. philol., dissert. crit. etc., 4 vols. fol., Amst. 1693, 1696, 1708, 1731; Nov. Test. ex versione Vulg., cum paraphr. et adnot. H. Hammond; ex Angl. ling. in lat. transtulit, suisque animadd. auxit, 2 vols. fol., Amst. 1698, Frank. 1714; Harmonia Evangelica cui subjecta est Hist. Christi ex quatuor Evr. concinnata, fol., Amst. 1699; Ars critica in qua ad studia Lingr. Lat. Gr. et Heb. via munitur, 2 vols. 8vo, Amst. 1696, Lond. 1699, Amst. 1712. Le Clerc's supplement to Hammond's Notes was translated into English, 4to, Lond. 1699; his Harmony of the Gospels was also translated, Lond. 1700, but very inadequately.

Some of his minor writings also appeared in an English garb under the title, Twelve Dissertations out of M. Le Clerc's Genesis, etc., 8vo, Lond. 1696; and Parrhasiana, or thoughts on several subjects, etc., Lond. 1700. Le Clerc was a man of varied talents, and of great acuteness and perspicacity; his learning was extensive and accurate; his spirit bold and free; and his tendency somewhat sceptical and destructive. His exegesis, though scholarly, wants depth, earnestness, and sympathy with the sacred writers.—W. L. A.

LEE, SAMUEL, D.D., a distinguished orientalist and Biblical scholar, was born at Longnor, in Shropshire, May 14, 1783. After receiving the elements of education, he was apprenticed to a carpenter, but his native aptitude for learning having been accidentally stimulated by a desire to understand some Latin quotations and the sight of some Latin books, he procured a Latin grammar, and taught himself that language. He next acquired a knowledge of Greek, and from that advanced to Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Samaritan, all of which he acquired by his own unaided efforts before he was twenty-five years of age. By this time he had married, and exchanged his former occupation for that of a schoolmaster. Having attracted the notice of Archdeacon Corbett, and Dr. Jon. Scott, he was, by their aid, enabled to add to his other acquisitions a knowledge of Arabic, Persic, and Hindustanee, as well as some European and other tongues. In 1815 he accepted an engagement with the Church Missionary Society, and became a student of Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.A. in 1817. At this time he edited portions of the Scriptures, and of the Prayer Book, in several Oriental languages. In 1818 he took orders, and preached at Shrewsbury, still carrying on his Oriental studies; at this time he is said to have known eighteen languages. In 1819 he became professor of Arabic, and in 1834 Regius professor of Hebrew at Cambridge; besides receiving some pieces of Church preferment, and the title of D.D., first from the University of Halle, and then from that of Cambridge. Shortly before his death, which took place December 16, 1852, he had become Rector of Barley, in Somersetshire, where he died. Besides the editions of the Scriptures which he carried through the press, he published several works bearing on Biblical literature. The most important are, A Grammar of the Hebrew Language, compiled from the best authorities, chiefly Oriental, which has passed through several editions; A Lexicon, Heb., Chald., and Eng., Lond. 1840; The Book of the Patriarch Job translated, with Introduction and Commentary, Lond. 1837; An Inquiry into the Nature, Progress, and End of Prophecy, Camb. 1849; Prolegomena in Bib. Polygl. Londinens. Minora, Lond. 1828. That Dr. Lee was a great scholar cannot be doubted; perhaps he was the greatest British orientalist of his day; and his writings bear evident traces of a vigorous, earnest, and independent mind, loving truth, and boldly pursuing it. But he never wholly surmounted the want of early training, and his works display that deficiency in mental discipline, that lack of sound judgment, and that tendency to confidence and self-assertion which are incident to the self-educated and the δυσμαθής. His influence would have been greater had his dogmatism and pugnacity been less.—W. L. A.

LEEK. [CHATZIR.]

LEES. [SHEMARIM.]

LE FEVRE, JACQUES, surnamed from the place of his birth D'Étaples (FABER STAPULENSIS), was born about the year 1455. He was of humble birth and had received but a poor education, but such was his diligence, and such his ability, that he rose to the foremost place among the learned men of his day. In 1493 he became a teacher of theology at the Sorbonne; but his zeal for the restored learning, and especially his endeavours to promote the study of the Greek N. T., excited the jealous fears of his superiors, and he had to leave his post. He retired to the court of Margaret of Navarre at Nerac, where he enjoyed a peaceful retreat till his death in 1537. Though he himself never openly left the communion of the Romish Church, his entire working was in the direction of the Reformation movement; and to him Farel and others of the Reformers were indebted for much instruction and stimulus in the early part of their career. Calvin also visited him, in 1533, at Nerac, and was welcomed by the old man, who predicted that he would be 'insigne celestis in Gallia instaurandi regni instrumentum' (Beza, J. Calvini Vit.) Le Fevre wrote Commentarii Initiationis in iv. Evangelia, Meaux 1522, Colon. 1541; Pauli Epistola 14 cum Commentariis, Par. 1515; Commentarii in Epp. Cathol., Bas. 1527, Antw. 1540. Le Fevre also edited Psalterium Quincuplex videlicet Gallic. Roman. Heb. Vet. Conciliatum, cum Comment., Paris 1508, 1513; and to him also is due the honour of producing the first French version of the Scriptures from the Vulgate [FRENCH VERSIONS].—W. L. A.

LEGION (Λεγεών; legio), a division of the Roman army containing at first 3000, afterwards 4000, then 5000 or 5200, and in the time of Christ about 6000 infantry, besides horsemen. In the N. T. the term is applied to an indefinitely large number of spiritual beings acting in concert, and disciplined and officered like an army. Thus Christ speaks of the 'legions of angels' which his Father would readily send to fight for him (Matt.

321. Legionary Soldiers.

322. Legionary Soldiers.

xxvi. 53), and the interrogated unclean spirit replies, 'My name is legion, for we are many' (Mark v. 9).—J. G. C.

LEHABIM (לְהָבִים; Λαβειμ; Laabim. The passage in 1 Chron. i. 11 containing this word is omitted in the Cod. Vat. of the Sept.; but the Alex. reads both Λαβειμ and Λαβειμ). The tenth chapter of Genesis gives an outline of the genealogy of all the ancient nations, tracing them up to Noah. Mizraim was the second son of Ham, and from Mizraim sprung the Lehabim. The word is in the plural, and evidently signifies a tribe, doubtless taking the name of Lehab, Mizraim's third son (Gen. x. 13). Bochart affirms that the Lehabim are not, as is generally supposed, identical with the Libyans. His reasons are: That Lybia was much too large a country to have been peopled by one son of Mizraim; and that in other parts of Scripture Lybia is either called Phut (פּוּט), Jer. xli. 9; Ezek.

xxx. 5), or Lubim (לּוּבִים, 2 Chron. xii. 3; Nahum iii. 9), and Phut was a brother, and not a son of Mizraim (Gen. x. 6; Bochart, Opera, i. 279). These arguments do not stand the test of historical criticism. Phut and Lubim are not identical (Nahum iii. 9); and the Lehabim may have been joined by other tribes in colonizing Libya. It is quite true there is no direct evidence to identify the Lehabim and Lubim; yet there seems a high probability that the words are only different forms of the same name—the former being the more ancient, the middle radical ה was afterwards softened (as is not unusual in Hebrew, Gesen. Thes., pp. 743, 360) into ך quiescent. Thus Lehabim (לְהָבִים) became

Lubim (לּוּבִים). The Lehabim are not again mentioned in Scripture, but we find the Lubim connected with Mizraim (2 Chron. xii. 3), and the Kushites or Ethiopians (xvi. 8; see Art. LUBIM). We may therefore safely infer that the Lehabim were the ancient Lubim or Libyans, who perhaps first settled on the borders of the Nile, among or beside the Mizraim; but, as they increased in number, migrated to the wide regions south-west, and occupied the vast territory known to classic geographers as Lybia (Kalisch On Gen. x. 13; see also Michaelis, Spicileg. Geogr.; Knobel, die Völkertafel des Pent.) Dr. Beke maintains that the Lehabim, as well as the Mizraim, were a people of north-western Arabia; but, as he states himself, his views are opposed alike to the opinions of ancient and modern geographers; and his arguments do not appear of sufficient weight to command acceptance (Origines Biblica, pp. 167, 198, seq.)—J. L. P.

LEHI (לֶחִי), the 'cheek,' or 'jaw-bone'; Alex., Judg. xv. 9; ἔως Σιαγώνος, ver. 14; Alex. in ver. 9, Δεῦτ; Lechi, id est, maxilla). The story of Lehi is a romantic episode in the history of Samson. After the slaughter of the Philistines, in revenge for the murder of his wife, the warriors of that nation 'went up, and pitched in Judah, and spread themselves in Lehi' (Judg. xv. 9). The Israelites afraid, bound Samson, and gave him up to his enemies at Lehi (ver. 14). There, however, he brake his bonds, seized the jaw-bone (Lehi) of an ass, and slew a thousand of them. Having dispersed the Philistines, 'he cast away the jaw-bone, and called that place Ramath-Lehi' (17, which may be rendered 'the casting away of the jaw-bone'). After the fatigue, Samson was almost fainting with thirst, and prayed for water; and 'God clave an hollow place, which is in Lehi (אֲשֶׁר בִּלְחִי); A. V., 'that was in the jaw'), and there came water thereout; wherefore he called the name thereof En-hakkore (עֵין הַקּוֹרֵא), 'the fountain of the caller,' or 'of him who called'), which is in Lehi (אֲשֶׁר בִּלְחִי) unto this day.' Our A. V. gives an appearance of improbability to one part of the story which does not exist in the Hebrew. It represents the fountain as opened in the jaw-bone, whereas it ought to be in Lehi. The same words rendered in the first clause of the verse, 'that was in the jaw' (אֲשֶׁר בִּלְחִי), are rendered in the last clause, 'which is in Lehi.' The latter is the correct rendering for both.

The name of the place before the conflict was evidently Lehi, as appears from verses 9 and 14; perhaps so called from the form of some hill or rock (Ges., Thesaur., p. 752). After the slaughter of the Philistines, Samson, with a characteristic play upon the name, makes it descriptive of his signal and singular victory (cf. GILGAL; GILEAD). It is remarkable that in the Septuagint the word Lehi (לֶחִי) is uniformly translated (σιαγών), except in ver. 9; whether applied to the place or to the jaw-bone. This makes the whole passage very obscure. The rendering of the Vulg. is even worse (see, for instance, ver. 19). Josephus says the place was called Σιαγών, 'Jaw-bone,' on account of Samson's deed, 'though before it had no name' (Antiq. v. 8. 8).

The site of Lehi is unknown. Jerome states that Paula, when on her way from Bethlehem to Egypt, passed from Sochoth to the fountain of Samson (Opera, i. 705, ed. Migne). Later writers locate it beside Eleutheropolis (Anton. Mar., Itin. 30; Reland, p. 872); but the tradition appears to have been vague and uncertain (Robinson, ii. 64, seq.) The writer could not hear of any fountain at Eleutheropolis, nor was Dr. Robinson more successful. There is a deep old well; but, of course, it would not answer to the Scripture narrative (Robinson, ii. 26, seq.) Van de Velde tries to identify Lehi with a hill called Tel el-Lekiyeh about five miles north of Beersheba; but this is alike opposed to Scripture topography and to tradition (see, however, Memoir, p. 342). Tobler found a Beit-Likieh near Beth-horon (Dritte Wanderung); but this seems too far north.—J. L. P.

LEIGHTON, ROBERT, was born in the year 1611, and probably in London, where his father resided. Being of Scottish descent, he was educated at Edinburgh, and took his degree of M. A. at the university there in 1631. After leaving the university he spent some years on the Continent, chiefly in France. On his return to Scotland he was licensed by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, and became in 1641 minister of the parish of Newbattle, where he remained till 1653. Of events during his incumbency some curious notices, from the records of the Presbytery of Dalkeith and the kirk-session books of Newbattle, have been published in the Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, vol. iv. p. 463, ff. In 1653, Leighton became principal of the University of Glasgow, which office he held till after the Restoration. On the re-establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland, he became Bishop of Dunblane, to which office he was consecrated at Westminster, 15th December 1661; and in 1669 he became Archbishop of Glasgow. In 1674 he resigned this office and retired to England, where he resided for several years, and died at London 25th June 1684. Leighton's great work is his Practical Commentary upon the First General Epistle of St. Peter. This is not a learned exposition; the writer hardly notices questions of philology at all; but perhaps no more remarkable instance is extant of the power which sympathy with the writer gives in enabling an expositor to bring out and elucidate his meaning. Leighton wrote also Praelectiones Theologicae, of which an edition was published a few years ago by the late Prof. Scholefield of Cambridge; also some sermons and charges. There is an edition of his work in 4 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1819; but the best edition is that of Pearson, Lond. 1828.—W. L. A.

LE JAY, GUY MICHEL, was born in Paris, 1588, and died 10th July 1675. He was the editor of the Paris Polyglott, which appeared in 10 vols. fol., Par. 1629-45. The first four vols. contain the Heb., Chald., LXX., and Vulg. texts of the O. T.; vols. 5 and 6, the N. T. in Gr., Syr., Arab., and Lat.; vol. 7, the Heb. Samar. Pent., the Sam. vers., with translation by Morinus, the Arab. and Syr. Pent.; vols. 8-10, the rest of the books of the O. T. in Syr. and Arab. Lejay lost largely by this publication; but as a reward for his labour and cost he was ennobled. The work was the best of its kind till the London Polyglott appeared, by which it was soon superseded.—W. L. A.

LE LONG, JACQUES, was born at Paris in 1665. Having finished his studies, he became librarian first of the Seminary at Aubervilliers, and then of the Oratoire at Paris, an office which he held till his death in 1721. He devoted himself chiefly to bibliography. His great work is his Bibliotheca Sacra seu syllabus omnium ferme sac. Script. editionum ac versionum, etc., 2 vols., 1709. This was but the first part of a larger work which he designed to prepare; the second was to have been devoted to the authors who had written on the Scriptures. Le Long issued two other editions of his Bibliotheca, with corrections and additions; still further improvements were introduced in the edition of C. F. Boerner, Lips. 1709, and in that of Desmalets, Par. 1723; but the recasting of the work by A. G. Masch, 2 vols. 4to, 1778, gave it the form in which it has best subserved the wants of the Biblical student. To such it is invaluable.—W. L. A.

LE MAISTRE. [SACI DE.]

L'EMPEREUR, CONSTANTINE, was born at Oppyck in the Netherlands; and was successively professor of Hebrew at Harderwyk, and professor of theology at Leyden, where he died in 1648. He edited the Commentary of Ibn Ezra and Mos. Alshech on Is. lii. 13–liii. 12, with notes, Leyd. 1633; and the Paraphrase of Joseph ben Jachja on Daniel, with translation and notes, Amst. 1633. He published also Clavis Talmudica complectens formulas, loca dialectica et logica priscorum Judæorum, Leyd. 1634; and De legg. Heb. forens., Leyd. 1637.—W. L. A.

L'ENFANT, JACQUES, a minister of the French Protestant Church, was born 13th April 1661, at Bazoché, in the district of Beauce in France. He was educated at Saumur, Geneva, and Heidelberg. In the last-named place he officiated as minister of the French church; he afterwards repaired to Berlin, where he was associated with Beausobre. He died 7th August 1728. Besides his Histories of the Council of Constance and that of Nice, he is known for the share he had, along with Beausobre, in the French translation of the N. T. which appeared in 1718 [BEAUSOBRE].—W. L. A.

LEMUEL (לְמוּאֵל); LXX., ὑπὸ θεοῦ? Aquila, Λαμμουῖν; Symmachus, Ταμμουήλ; Theodotion, Πεβοῖελ), a king, to whom his mother addressed the lessons of chastity and temperance contained in Prov. xxxi. 2–9. As we are told nothing else respecting him, and his name does not occur elsewhere, a wide field has been opened to the conjectures of the learned:—1. The Jews in general, and the fathers, both Greek and Latin, identify Lemuel with Solomon. According to the Jews, Solomon had eight names, of which this was one. The name means either '(created) by God,' like Lael in Num. iii. 24 (Gesen. Thes. s. v.), or '(dedicated) to God' (J. Simonis, Onomast. V. T., p. 503); (a), Simonis thinks that לְמוּאֵל is equivalent to לְמוּאֵל (ver. 4, and cf. Samuel); and that לְמוּ is the same as לְ (as it is in Job xxvii. 14), that form being chosen for the sake of the alliteration which it furnished with שְׁלֵמָה; (β) Schultens thinks that the name Lemuel was used as a mere synonym of Jedidiah, one of the names of Solomon (2 Sam. xii. 25); (γ), M. Geier regards it as a pet name given to Solomon in his infancy by Bathsheba, to avoid the harsher לְמוּ, and J. F. Schelling also looks upon it as a diminutive. 2. Grotius first suggested that Lemuel was Hezekiah, referring to Prov. xxv. 1, and giving to Lemuel, which he derives from the Arabic, the same meaning as Hezekiah, which he interprets to be 'a Deo prehensus.' 3. The purely arbitrary conjecture of Hitzig, Ziegler, and others (Hitzig, Die Sprüche Sal., ad loc.; Rosenmüller, Schol., ad loc.) is, that Lemuel was an Arab or Edomite emir, celebrated (as the Arabs often were) for skill in proverbs. To support this view Hitzig, both in xxx. 1, and xxxi. 1, takes לְמוּ (A. V. 'prophesy') as a proper name, 'Massa,' in which opinion Bunsen partly agrees. The absence of the article with לְמוּ, renders it, however, inadmissible to translate the verse, 'Lemuel, king of Massa,' in xxxi. 1; although Davidson, by altering the reading in xxx. 1, makes Massa a proper name in that verse (Introd. ii. 338). Hitzig ingeniously compares Lemuel with Nemuel, Simeon's first-born (1 Chron. iv. 24); and then shews that Massa may have been founded by those 500 Simeonites who smote the remnant of the Amalekites in Mount Seir (1 Chron. iv. 39–43). He therefore concludes that Agur and Lemuel were both sons of the queen of Massa ('her obeyed in Massa,' as he renders xxx. 1), but that they were of Israelite descent. 4. Eichhorn (Einkl., v. 105), Ewald (Sprüche Sal., 173), Keil (Einkl., sec. 120), and others, regard Lemuel as a merely poetic and imaginary name, chosen to represent some ideal king, who may well be supposed to have been addressed in the moral precepts contained in xxxi. 2–9. It is, in the absence of all trustworthy data, impossible to decide between these conflicting theories. The LXX. give us no assistance whatever, since they render xxxi. 1, οἱ ἐμοὶ λόγια εἰσηῆται ὑπὸ θεοῦ βασιλέως, and in ver. 4 they wander so widely from the Hebrew as to leave us hopelessly in the dark as to the reading they may have followed. If we are to choose between the theories mentioned, it is obvious that the first and the fourth are less arbitrary than the others. The first is supported by the authority of Jewish tradition; the fourth is in accordance with a practice very prevalent among the Jews during the later period of their literature. We would, however, prefer to class Lemuel with Agur, Ithiel, Ucal, Darda, Ethan, and many other persons mentioned incidentally in Scripture, of whom all further record and memory have been lost.—F. LENTILES. [ADASHIM.]

LEO JUDÆ, one of the Swiss Reformers, and the early friend of Zuingli, was born at Germar in Alsace, in 1482. His father's name was John Jud; but whether this arose from his family being of Jewish descent, Leo himself tells us he was unable to say. The name, however, exposed him to reproach, and perhaps for this reason we find him sometimes designating himself Leo Keller; in Zürich he was known as Meister Löw, and this name his descendants adopted. He was educated for the medical profession; but through the influence of Zuingli he forsook this for the clerical, and in 1522 became minister of St. Peter's Church at Zürich. Here he laboured till his death, and had an important share in the reformatory movements of the time and the doctrinal controversies which divided the Reformers. He died 19th June 1542. At the time of his death he was engaged on a translation of the Bible into Latin, which he left unfinished: it was completed by Bibliander, who translated what was left of the O. T.; Ret. Choli, who translated the Apocryphal books; and Rud. Gualter, who translated the N. T. on the basis of the version of Erasmus. The work was revised by Pellican, and appeared in 1543. This translation is marked by adherence to the meaning rather than the words of the original; it is consequently somewhat paraphrastic; but it is fair and true, and the Latinity is good. It has been often reprinted. Leo translated also into German Erasmus' Paraphrases of the N. T.; Augustine's tract De Spiritu et Litera, and edited several of the works of Zuingli. He also translated the Prophets in the Deutsche Bibel which appeared at Zürich in 1529 [GERMAN VERSIONS].—W. L. A.

LEO DI MODENA, b. Isaac b. Mordecai, also called Jehudah Arje Modanese, was born in Venice, April 23, 1571, of an ancient and literary family who emigrated from France into Italy. Leo displayed his talents at so extraordinarily tender an age that he read the Sabbath lesson [HAPHTARA] before the whole congregation in the synagogue when he was two and a half years old, and appeared as preacher (רש"י) when he was ten years old. This thirst for learning and devotedness to Biblical literature and exegesis, constituted the most prominent features of his long and chequered life, as may be seen from his numerous poetical, liturgical, ethical, doctrinal, polemical, and exegetical works. Those of his productions which relate to Biblical literature and exegesis are as follows:—(1) A Hebrew and Italian lexicon called נלות יהודה, The Captivity of Judah, or פשר דבר, Explanation of Words, in which he explains in Italian all the difficult expressions in the Hebrew Bible, and which is preceded by grammatical rules, Venice 1612, Padua 1640. It has also been printed in the margin of the Hebrew Bibles published for the use of the Italian Jews, following the order of the Canonical books, and thus being equivalent to an Italian translation. (2) A Rabbinical and Italian vocabulary, called פי מריה, The Lion's Mouth, of which the Italian title is Raccolta delle voci Rabin. non Hebr. nò Chald., etc., Padua 1640; appended to the preceding work, afterwards printed separately, in Venice 1648. (3) A polemical treatise on the genuineness of the celebrated Kabbalistical interpretation of the Pentateuch called the Sohar, entitled ספר נחום, Leipzig 1840. (4) Historia de Rite Hebraici, or the history of the rites, customs, and manner of life of the Jews, consisting of thirteen chapters, and written in Italian, Venice 1638. This celebrated and most useful Manual was translated into English by Edmund Chilmead, London 1650; and also edited by Simon Ockley, under the title History of the Present Jews throughout the World, London 1707, in Picard's Ceremonies and Religious Customs of the Various Nations of the Known World, vol. i., London 1733; into French by Father Simon, who prefaced it with an elaborate account of the Karaites and Samaritans, Paris 1674; into Dutch, Amsterdam 1683; and into Latin by Grosgebauer, Historia rituum Judeorum, Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1693. Leo also wrote (5) A commentary on the books of Samuel; (6) A commentary on the five Megilloth, i.e., the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther; (7) A commentary on the Psalms; (8) A commentary on Proverbs; (9) A commentary on the Sabbath lessons; and (10) A polemical work against Christianity, entitled מנחם, but these works have not as yet been published. Leo died in Venice, where he was chief rabbi, in 1648, in the seventy-seventh year of his age; comp. Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaica, ii. p. 383, ff.; Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodliana, col. 1345-1356; Der Israelitische Volkslehrer, vol. iv., Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1854, pp. 91, ff.; 123, ff.; 186, ff.; 247, ff.; vol. v., 1855, p. 396, ff.—C. D. G.

LEOPARD (נמר, namer; Sept. πάρδαλις; Cant. iv. 8; Is. xi. 6; Jer. v. 6; xiii. 23; Hos. xiii. 7; Hab. i. 8; Dan. vii. 6; Rev. xiii. 2; Eccus. xxviii. 23). Though zoologists differ in opinion respecting the identity of the leopard and the panther, and dispute, supposing them to be distinct, how these names should be respectively applied, and by what marks the animals should be distinguished, nevertheless there can be no doubt that the nimr of the Bible is that great spotted feline which anciently infested the Syrian mountains, and even now occurs in the wooded ranges of Libanus; for the Arabs still use nimr, the same word slightly modified, to denote that animal. The Abyssinian name differs scarcely from either; and in all these tongues it means spotted. Pigikris, according to Kirschner, is the Coptic name; and in English, 'leopard' has been adopted as the most appropriate to represent both the Hebrew word and the Greek πάρδαλις, although the Latin leopardus is not found in any author anterior to the 3d century, and is derived from a gross mistake in natural history. The variety of leopard, or rather panther, of Syria, is considerably below the stature of a lioness, but very heavy in proportion to its bulk. Its general form is so well known as to require no description beyond stating that the spots are rather more irregular, and the colour more mixed with whitish, than in the other pantherine feline, excepting the Felis Uncia, or Felis Irbis, of High Asia, which is shaggy and almost white. It is a nocturnal cat-like animal in habits, dangerous to all domestic cattle, and sometimes even to man. In the Scriptures it is constantly placed in juxtaposition with the lion or the wolf; which last, if the hyena be intended, forms a natural association. There is in Asia Minor a species or variety of panther, much larger than the Syrian, not unfrequent on the borders of the snowy tracts even of Mount Ida, above ancient Troy; and the group of these spotted animals is spread over the whole of Southern Asia to Africa. From several names of places, it appears that, in the earlier ages of Israelitish dominion, it was sufficiently numerous in Palestine. Leopard skins were worn as a part of ceremonial costume by the superiors of the Egyptian priesthood, and by other personages in Nubia; and the animal itself is represented in the processions of tributary nations.—C. H. S.

LEPROSY (צִרְעָה; λέπρα, λεύκη), that foul cutaneous disease, the description of which, as well as the regulations connected therewith, are given in Lev. xiii., xiv.; comp. also Exod. iv. 6, 7; Num. xii. 10-15; 2 Sam. iii. 29; 2 Kings v. 27; vii. 3; xv. 5; Matt. viii. 2; x. 8, al. Whether Lev. xiii., xiv., speaks of one distemper, or a group of diseases having mutually a mere superficial resemblance, or a real affinity; or whether the malady here spoken of can be identified with the leprosy of modern Syria, Greece, Spain, etc., will best be decided by an analysis of the Scriptural description of this distemper. The leprosy of the Bible consists of three general classes, viz., leprosy of man, leprosy of garments and vessels, and leprosy of houses, which we shall discuss seriatim.

I. Leprous man.—Lev. xiii. 2-44, which describes this distemper as laying hold of man, gives six different circumstances under which it may develop itself. They are as follows:—

i. The first circumstance mentioned in Lev. xiii. 2-6 is that it may develop itself without any apparent cause. Hence it is enjoined that if any one should notice a rising or swelling (שֹׁאֵר), an eruption or scab (סִפְחָה), or a glossy pimple (בִּהְרָת) in the skin of his flesh, which may terminate in leprosy (צִרְעָה), he is at once to be taken to the priest, who is to examine it and pronounce it leprosy, and the man unclean, if it exhibits these two symptoms—viz., a, the hair of the affected spot changed from its natural black colour to white; and b, the spot deeper than the general level of the skin of the body (2, 3). But if these two symptoms do not appear in the bright pimple, the priest is to shut him up for seven days, examine him again on the seventh day, and if the disease appears to have made no progress during this time, he is to remand the patient for another seven days (4, 5), and then, if on inspecting it again he finds that the bright spot has grown darker (כָּהָה), and that it has not spread on the skin, he is to pronounce it a simple scab (סִפְחָה), and the person clean after washing his garments (6). If, however, the pustule spreads over the skin after it has been pronounced a simple scab and the individual clean, the priest is to declare it leprosy, and the patient unclean (7, 8). It is thus evident that the symptoms which indicated Scriptural leprosy, as the Mishna rightly remarks (Negaim iii. 3), are bright pimples, a little depressed, turning the hair white, and spreading over the skin.

As the description of these symptoms is very concise, and requires to be specified more minutely for practical purposes, the spiritual guides of Israel defined them as follows:—Both the bright pimple (בִּהְרָת) and the swelling spot (שֹׁאֵר), when indicative of leprosy, assume respectively one of two colours, a principal or a subordinate one. The principal colour of the bright pimple is as white as snow (עוֹה כִּשְׁלֵן), and the subordinate resembles plaster on the wall (כִּסְדֵּי הַחֵיבֶל); whilst the principal colour of the rising spot is like that of an egg-shell (בִּקְרוֹם בָּצָה), and the secondary one resembles white wool (בְּעֶסֶר לֶבָן; Mishna, Negaim i. 1); so that if the affected spot in the skin is inferior in whiteness to the film of an egg it is not leprosy, but simply a gathering (Maimonides On Leprosy, i. 1). Any one may examine the disease, except the patient himself or his relatives, but the priest alone can decide whether it is leprosy or not, and accordingly pronounce the patient unclean or clean, because Deut. xxi. 5 declares that the priest must decide cases of litigation and disease. But though the priest only can pronounce the decision, even if he be a child or a fool, yet he must act upon the advice of a learned layman in those matters (Mishna, Negaim iii. 1; Maimonides, ibid. ix. 1, 2). If the priest is blind of one eye, or is weak-sighted, he is disqualified for examining the distemper (Mishna, l. c., i. 3). The inspection must not take place on the Sabbath, nor early in the morning, nor in the middle of the day, nor in the evening, nor on cloudy days, because the colour of the skin cannot properly be ascertained in these hours of the day; but in the third, fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, and ninth hours (Negaim ii. 2); and the same priest who inspected it at first must examine it again at the end of the second seven days, as another one could not tell whether it has spread. If he should die in the interim, or be taken ill, another one may examine him, but not pronounce him unclean (Maimonides On Leprosy, ix. 4). There must at least be two hairs white at the root and in the body of the bright spot before the patient can be declared unclean (Maimonides, l. c., ii. 1). If a bridegroom is seized with this distemper he must be left alone during the nuptial week (Mishna, Negaim iii. 2).

ii. The second case is of leprosy reappearing after it has been cured (Lev. xiii. 9-17), where a somewhat different treatment is enjoined. If a person who has once been healed of this disease is brought again to the priest, and if the latter finds a white rising in the skin (שֹׁאֵר לִבְנֵה), which has changed the hair into white and contains live flesh (בִּשְׂרֵי חַי), he is forthwith to recognise therein the reappearance of the old malady, and declare the patient unclean without any quarantine whatever, since the case is so evident that it requires no trial (9-11). There were, however, two phases of this returned distemper which exempted the patient from uncleanness. If the leprosy suddenly covered the whole body so that the patient became perfectly white, in which case there could be no appearance of live flesh (12, 13), or if the whiteness, after having once diminished and allowed live flesh to appear, covers again the whole body, then the patient was clean (14-17). This most probably was regarded as indicative of the crisis, as the whole evil matter thus brought to the surface formed itself into a scale which dried and peeled off. The only other feature which this case represents besides the symptoms already described, is that leprosy at times also spread over the whole skin and rendered it perfectly white. As to the live flesh (בִּשְׂרֵי חַי), the Sept., the Chaldee, the Mishna, and the Jewish Rabbins, in accordance with ancient tradition, take it to denote sound flesh, or a spot in the flesh assuming the appearance of life after it had been paled by the whiteness overspreading the whole surface. The size of this spot of live flesh which renders the patient unclean must, according to tradition, be at least that of a lentil (Maimonides, l. c., iii. 1-3).

iii. The third case is of leprosy developing itself from an inflammation (שחין) or a burn (מכות אש) (שכוח), which is to be recognised by the same symptoms (Lev. xiii. 18-28). Hence when these suspicious signs were discernible in that part of the skin which was healed of an inflammation, the patient was to go to the priest, who is at once to pronounce it leprosy developed from an inflammation, if the symptoms are unmistakable (19, 20). If the priest found these marks, he remanded the patient for seven days (21), and if the disorder spread over the skin during the time the patient was declared leprous and unclean (22); but if it remained in the same condition, he pronounced it the cicatrix of the inflammation (צרכת השחין) and the patient clean (23). The same rules applied to the suspicious appearance of a burn (24-28). According to the Hebrew canons שחין is defined inflammation arising from 'an injury received from the stroke of wood or a stone, or from hot olive husks, or the hot Tiberian water, or from anything, the heat of which does not come from fire; whilst מכות אש denotes a burn from live coals, hot ashes, or from any heat which proceeds from fire' (Mishna, Negaim ix. 1; Maimonides On Leprosy, v. 1).

It will be seen that there is a difference in the treatment of the suspicious symptoms in i. and iii. In the former instance, where there is no apparent cause for the symptoms, the suspected invalid has to undergo two remands of seven days before his case can be decided; whilst in the latter, where the inflammation or the burn visibly supplies the reason for this suspicion, he is only remanded for one week, at the end of which his case is finally determined.

iv. The fourth case is leprosy on the head or chin (Lev. xiii. 29-37), which is to be recognised by the affected spot being deeper than the general level of the skin, and by the hair thereon having become thin and yellowish. When these symptoms exist, the priest is to pronounce it a scall (נתק), which is head or chin leprosy, and declare the patient unclean (30). But if this disorder on the head or chin does not exhibit these symptoms, the patient is to be remanded for seven days, when the priest is again to examine it, and if he finds that it has neither spread nor exhibits the required criteria, he is to order the patient to cut off all the hair of his head or chin, except that which grows on the afflicted spot itself, and remand him for another week, and then pronounce him clean if it continues in the same state at the expiration of this period (31-34); and if it spreads after he has been pronounced clean, the priest is forthwith to declare him unclean without looking for any yellow hair (35, 36). The Jewish canons define נתק by 'an affection on the head or chin which causes the hair on these affected parts to fall off by the roots, so that the place of the hair is quite bare' (Maimonides On Leprosy, viii. 1). The condition of the hair, constituting one of the leprous symptoms, is described as follows: 'קט is small or short, but if it be long, though it is yellow as gold, it is no sign of uncleanness. Two yellow and short hairs, whether close to one another or far from each other, whether in the centre of the Nethek, or on the edge thereof, no matter whether the Nethek precedes the yellow hair or the yellow hair the Nethek, are symptoms of uncleanness' (Maimonides, l. c., viii. 5). The manner of shaving is thus described: 'The hair round the scall is all shaved off except two hairs which are close to it, so that it might be known thereby whether it spread' (Mishna, Negaim x. 5).

v. The fifth case is leprosy which shews itself in white polished spots, and is not regarded as unclean (Lev. xiii. 38, 39). It is called Bohak (בהק), from בהק, to be white, or as the Sept. has it, ἀλφός, vittiligo alba, white scurf.

vi. The sixth case is of leprosy either at the back or in the front of the head (Lev. xiii. 40-44). When a man loses his hair either at the back or in the front of his head, it is a simple case of baldness, and he is clean (40, 41). But if a whitish red spot forms itself on the bald place at the back or in the front of the head, then it is leprosy, which is to be recognised by the fact that the swelling or scab on the spot has the appearance of leprosy in the skin of the body; and the priest is to declare the man's head leprous and unclean (42-44). Though there is only one symptom mentioned whereby head leprosy is to be recognised, and nothing is said about remanding the patient if the distemper should appear doubtful, as in the other cases of leprosy, yet the ancient Rabbins inferred from the remark, 'it is like leprosy in the skin of the flesh,' that all the criteria specified in the latter are implied in the former. Hence the Hebrew canons submit 'there are two symptoms which render baldness in the front or at the back of the head unclean, viz., live or sound flesh, and spreading; the patient is also shut up for them two weeks, because it is said of them that 'they are [and therefore must be treated] like leprosy in the skin of the flesh' (Lev. xiii. 43). Of course, the fact that the distemper in this instance develops itself on baldness, precludes white hair being among the criteria indicating uncleanness. The manner in which the patient in question is declared unclean by two symptoms and in two weeks, is as follows—'If live or sound flesh is found in the bright spot on the baldness at the back or in the front of the head, he is pronounced unclean; if there is no live flesh he is shut up and examined at the end of the week, and if live flesh has developed itself, and it has spread, he is declared unclean, and if not he is shut up for another week. If it has spread during this time, or engendered live flesh, he is declared unclean, and if not he is pronounced clean. He is also pronounced unclean if it spreads or engenders sound flesh after he has been declared clean' (Mishna, Negaim x. 10; Maimonides On Leprosy, v. 9, 10).

2. Regulations about the conduct and purification of leprous men.—Lepers were to rend their garments, let the hair of their head hang down dishevelled, cover themselves up to the upper lip, like mourners, and warn off every one whom they happened to meet by calling out unclean! unclean! since they defiled everyone and everything they touched. For this reason they were also obliged to live in exclusion outside the camp or city (Lev. xiii. 45, 46; Num. v. 1-4; xii. 10-15; 2 Kings vii. 3, etc.) 'The very entrance of a leper into a house,' according to the Jewish canons, 'renders everything in it unclean' (Mishna, Negaim xii. 11; Kelim, i. 4). 'If he stands under a tree and a clean man passes by, he renders him unclean. In the synagogue which he wishes to attend they are obliged to make him a separate compartment, ten handbreadths high and four cubits long and broad; he has to be the first to go in, and the last to leave the synagogue' (Mishna, Negaim xii. 12; Maimonides On Leprosy, x. 12); and if he transgressed the prescribed boundaries he was to receive forty stripes (Pessachim 67, a). All this only applies to those who had been pronounced lepers by the priest, but not to those who were on quarantine (Negaim, i. 7). The Rabbinic law also exempts women from the obligation to rend their garments and letting the hair of their head fall down (Sota, iii. 8). It is therefore no wonder that the Jews regarded leprosy as a living death (comp. Joseph. Antiq. iii. 11. 3, and the well-known Rabbinic saying מצורע חסוב כמות), and as an awful punishment from the Lord (2 Kings v. 7; 2 Chron. xxvi. 20), which they wished all their mortal enemies (2 Sam. iii. 29; 2 Kings v. 27).

The healed leper had to pass through two stages of purification before he could be received back into the community. As soon as the distemper disappeared he sent for the priest, who had to go outside the camp or town to convince himself of the fact. Whereupon the priest ordered two clean and live birds, a piece of cedar wood, crimson wool and hyssop; killed one bird over a vessel containing spring water, so that the blood might run into it, tied together the hyssop and the cedar wood with the crimson wool, put about them the tops of the wings and the tip of the tail of the living bird, dipped all the four in the blood and water which were in the vessel, then sprinkled the hand of the healed leper seven times, let the bird loose, and pronounced the restored man clean (Lev. xiv. 1-7; Mishna, Negaim xii. 1). The healed leper was then to wash his garments, cut off all his hair, be immersed, and return to the camp or city, but remain outside his house seven days, which the Mishna (Negaim xiv. 2), the Chaldee Paraphrase, Maimonides (On Leprosy, xi. 1), etc., rightly regard as a euphemism for exclusion from connubial intercourse during that time (8), in order that he might not contract impurity (comp. Lev. xv. 18). With this ended the first stage of purification. According to the Jewish canons, the birds are to be 'free, and not encaged,' or sparrows; the piece of cedar wood is to be 'a cubit long, and a quarter of the foot of the bed thick'; the crimson wool is to be a shekel's weight i.e., 320 grains of barley; the hyssop must at least be a handbreadth in size, and is neither to be the so-called Greek, nor ornamental, nor Roman, nor wild hyssop, nor have any name whatever; the vessel must be an earthen one, and new; and the dead bird must be buried in a hole dug before their eyes (Mishna, Negaim xiv. 1-6; Maimonides On Leprosy, xi. 1).

The second stage of purification began on the seventh day, when the leper had again to cut off the hair of his head, his beard, eyebrows, etc., wash his garments, and be immersed (Lev. xiv. 9). On the eighth day he had to bring two he-lambs without blemish, one ewe-lamb a year old, three-tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with oil, and one log of oil; the one he-lamb is to be a trespass offering, and the other, with the ewe-lamb, a burnt and a sin offering; but if the man was poor he was to bring two turtle doves, or two young pigeons, for a sin offering and a burnt offering, instead of a he-lamb and a ewe-lamb (10, 11, 21). With these offerings the priest conducted the healed leper before the presence of the Lord. What the offerer had to do, and how the priest acted when going through these ceremonies, cannot be better described than in the following graphic language of the Jewish tradition. 'The priest approaches the trespass offering, lays both his hands on it, and kills it, when two priests catch its blood, one into a vessel, and the other in his hand; the one who caught it into the vessel sprinkles it against the wall of the altar, the other goes to the leper, who, having been immersed in the leper's chamber [which is in the women's court], is waiting [outside the court of Israel, or the men's court, opposite the eastern door] in the porch of Nicamor [with his face to the west]. He then puts his head into [the court of Israel], and the priest puts some of the blood upon the tip of his right ear; he next puts in his right hand, and the priest puts some blood upon the thumb thereof; and lastly, puts in his right leg, and the priest puts some blood on the toe thereof. The priest then takes some of the log of oil and puts it into the left hand of his fellow-priest, or into his own left hand, dips the finger of his right hand in it, and sprinkles it seven times towards the holy of holies, dipping his finger every time he sprinkles it; whereupon he goes to the leper, puts oil on those parts of his body on which he had previously put blood [i.e., the tip of the ear, the thumb, and the toe], as it is written, 'on the place of the blood of the trespass-offering' [Lev. xiv. 28], and what remains of the oil in the hand of the priest he puts on the head of him who is to be cleansed for an atonement' (Mishna, Negaim xiv. 8-10; Maimonides, Hilchoth Machosrei Kephora, iv.). It is in accordance with this prerogative of the priest, who alone could pronounce the leper clean and readmit him into the congregation, that Christ commanded the leper whom he had healed to shew himself to this functionary (Matt. viii. 2, etc.).

II. Leprous garments and vessels.—Leprosy in garments and vessels is indicated by three symptoms, green and reddish spots, and spreading. If a green or reddish spot shows itself in a woollen or linen garment, or in a leather vessel, it is indicative of leprosy, and must be shown to the priest, who is to shut it up for a week. If, on inspecting it at the end of this time, he finds that the spot has spread, he is to pronounce it inveterate leprosy (צרעת ממארת), and unclean, and burn it (Lev. xiii. 47-52); if it has not spread he is to have it washed, and shut it up for another week, and if its appearance has then not changed, he is to pronounce it unclean and burn it, though it has not spread, since the distemper rankles in the front or at the back of the material (53-55). But if, after washing it, the priest sees that the spot has become weaker, he is to cut it out of the material; if it reappears in any part thereof then it is a developed distemper, and the whole of it must be burned, and if it vanishes after washing, it must be washed a second time, and is clean (56-59). The Jewish canons define the colour green to be like that of herbs, and red like that of fair crimson, and take this enactment literally as referring strictly to wool of sheep and flax, but not to hemp and other materials. A material made of camel's hair and sheep's wool is not rendered unclean by leprosy if the camel's hair preponderates, but is unclean when the sheep's wool preponderates, or when both are equal, and this also applies to mixtures of flax and hemp; dyed skins and garments are not rendered unclean by leprosy (Mishna, Negaim xi. 2. 3; Maimonides On Leprosy, xii. 10; xiii. 1-3). Nor are vessels made of skins of aquatic animals exposed to leprous uncleanness (Maimonides, ibid., xi. 1).

III. Leprous houses.—Leprosy in houses is indicated by the same three symptoms, viz., spots of a deep green or reddish hue, depressed beyond the general level, and spreading (Lev. xiv. 33-48). On its appearance, the priest was at once to be sent for, and the house cleared of everything before his arrival. If, on inspecting it, he found the first two symptoms in the walls, viz., a green or red spot in the wall, and depressed, he shut the house up for seven days (34-38), inspected it again on the seventh day, and if the distemper spread in the wall he had the affected stones taken out, the inside of the house scraped all round, the stones, dust, etc., cast into an unclean place without the city, and other stones and plaster put on the wall (39-42). If, after all this, the spot re-appeared and spread, he pronounced it inveterate leprosy, and unclean, had the house pulled down, and the stones, timber, plaster, etc., cast into an unclean place without the city, declared every one unclean, till evening, who had entered it, and ordered every one who had either slept or eaten in it to wash his garments (43-47).

As to the purification of the houses which have been cured of leprosy, the process is the same as that of healed men, except that in the case of man the priest sprinkles seven times upon his hand, whilst in that of the house he sprinkles seven times on the upper door-post without. Of course the sacrifices which the leprous man had to bring in his second stage of purification are precluded in the case of the house (Maimonides On Leprosy, xv. 8).

3. Prevalence, contagion, and curableness of leprosy.—Though the malicious story of Manetho that the Egyptians expelled the Jews because they were afflicted with leprosy (Joseph. Cont. Ap. i. 26), which is repeated by Tacitus (lib. v., c. 3), is rejected by modern historians and critics as a fabrication; yet Michaelis (Locus of Moses, art. 209), Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 652), and others, still maintain that this disease was 'extremely prevalent among the Israelites.' Against this, however, is to be urged that—1. The very fact that such strict examination was enjoined, and that every one who had a pimple, spot, or boil was shut up, shews that leprosy could not have been so wide spread, inasmuch as it would require the imprisonment of the great mass of the people. 2. In cautioning the people against the evil of leprosy, and urging on them to keep strictly to the directions of the priest, Moses adds, 'Remember what the Lord thy God did to Miriam on the way when you came out of Egypt' (Deut. xxiv. 9). Now this allusion to a single instance which occurred on the way from Egypt, and which, therefore, was an old case, naturally implies that leprosy was of rare occurrence among the Jews, else there would have been no necessity to adduce a bygone case; and 3. Wherever leprosy is spoken of in later books of the Bible, which does not often take place, it is only of isolated cases (2 Kings vii. 3; xv. 5), and the regulations are strictly carried out, and the men are shut up so that even the king himself formed no exception (2 Kings xv. 5).

That the disease was not contagious is evident from the regulations themselves. The priests had to be in constant and close contact with lepers, had to examine and handle them; the leper who was entirely covered was pronounced clean (Lev. xiii. 12, 13); and the priest himself commanded that all things in a leprous house should be taken out before he entered it, in order that they might not be pronounced unclean, and that they might be used again (Lev. xiv. 36), which most unquestionably implies that there was no fear of contagion. This is, moreover, corroborated by the ancient Jewish canons which were made by those very men who had personally to deal with this distemper, and according to which a leprous minor, a heathen, and a proselyte, as well as leprous garments, and houses of non-Israelites, do not render any one unclean; nor does a bridegroom, who is seized with this malady during the nuptial week, defile any one during the first seven days of his marriage (comp. Mishna, Negaim iii. 1, 2; vii. 1; xi. 1; xii. 1; Maimonides On Leprosy, vi. 1; vii. 1, etc.). These canons would be utterly inexplicable on the hypothesis that the distemper in question was contagious. The enactments, therefore, about the exclusion of the leper from society, and about defilement, were not dictated by sanitary caution, but had their root in the moral and ceremonial law, like the enactments about the separation and uncleanness of menstruous women, of those who had an issue or touched the dead, which are joined with leprosy. Being regarded as a punishment for sin, which God himself inflicted upon the disobedient (Exod. xv. 26; Lev. xiv. 35), this loathsome disease, with the peculiar rites connected therewith, were especially selected as a typical representation of the pollution of sin, in which light the Jews always viewed it. Thus we are told, that 'Leprosy comes upon man for seven, ten, or eleven things; for idolatry, profaning the name of God, unchastity, theft, slander, false witness, false judgment, perjury, infringing the borders of a neighbour, devising malicious plans, or creating discord between brothers' (Erachin 16, 17; Baba Bathra 164; Aboth de R. Nathan ix.; Midrash Rabba on Levit. xiv.) 'Cedar wood and hyssop, the highest and the lowest, give the leper purity. Why these? Because pride was the cause of the distemper, which cannot be cured till man becomes humble, and keeps himself as low as hyssop' (Midrash Rabba, Cohelath, p. 104).

As to the curableness of the disease, this is unquestionably implied in the minute regulations about the sacrifices and conduct of those who were restored to health. Besides, in the case of Miriam, we find that shutting her up for seven days cured her of leprosy (Num. xii. 11-13).

4. The identity of the Biblical leprosy with the modern distemper bearing this name.—It would be useless to discuss the different disorders which have been palmed upon the Mosaic description of leprosy. With the Scriptural symptoms before us, let us compare the most recent description of modern leprosy given by an eye-witness who examined this subject, 'The scab comes on by degrees, in different parts of the body; the hair falls from the head and eyebrows; the nails loosen, decay, and drop off; joint after joint of the fingers and toes shrink up, and slowly fall away. The gums are absorbed, and the teeth disappear. The nose, the eyes, the tongue, and the palate are slowly consumed; and, finally, the wretched victim shrinks into the earth and disappears, while medicine has no power to stay the ravages of this fell disease, or even to mitigate sensibly its tortures' (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 653, etc.); and again, 'Sauntering down the Jaffa road, on my approach to the holy city, in a kind of dreamy maze, . . . I was startled out of my reverie by the sudden apparition of a crowd of beggars 'sans eyes, sans nose, sans hair, sans everything.' They held up towards me their handless arms, unearthly sounds gurgled through throats without palates' (ibid. p. 651). We merely ask by what rules of interpretation can we deduce from the Biblical leprosy, which is described as consisting in a rising scab, or bright spot deeper than the general level of the skin, and spreading, sometimes exhibiting live flesh, and which is non-contagious and curable, that loathsome and appalling malady described by Dr. Thomson and others? Dr. Mason Good, with equal violation of the simple phrases of the text, has attempted to force on them modern specific significations, and has drawn out a comparative table of parallel terms as used in Lev. xiii., by Hippocrates and Celsus, e. g., שחח, herpes or tetter; נגע, ictus, blow or bruise, etc.

בהרת, Lev.,	λέπρα, Hippo-	Vitiglio, Celsus, comprehending	crates, comp.	comprehending
1. בהק	1. ἀλφός	1. Albida.
2. בהרת לבנה	= 2. λευκη	= 2. Candida.
3. בהרת כהה	3. μέλας	3. Nigrescens, or umbrae similis .

But as Mr. Hayman, the writer of the article LEPER in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, justly remarks, 'the Hebrew of (1) is in Lev. xiii. 39 predicated of a subject compounded of the phraseology of (2) and (3), whereas the (1) (2) and (3) of Hippocrates and of Celsus are respectively distinct, and mutually exclusive of one another.' Besides בהרת simply means languid, expiring, depressing.

As to the leprosy of garments, vessels, and houses, Michaelis says, that wool of sheep which died from a particular disease might fret into holes, and exhibit an appearance in the garments of which they were made, like that described in Lev. xiii. 47-59; and that the attack on the walls with what the Germans call salpêtre, and what we call mural salt, which corrodes and consumes them, may be meant by leprosy of houses described in Lev. xiii. 33-48. But he has no theory for the leprosy of leather vessels (Laws of Moses, art. ccl.) Calmet, however, thinks that this disorder is caused by animalcules which erode the garments and the stones, and is called leprosy because it is produced in much the same manner as leprosy in man (Dissertation prefixed to his Comment. on Leviticus); and those who follow this theory submit that 'the analogy between the insect which frets the human skin and that which frets the garment that covers it; between the fungous growth that lines the crevices of the epidermis and that which creeps in the interstices of masonry; is close enough for the purpose of a ceremonial law.' We must confess that these fine-spun theories cannot be deduced from the simple description of Lev. xiii., xiv., which exhibits the symptoms and working of leprosy of garments, vessels, and houses, and those of leprosy of men as so identical; without doing the greatest violence to the text. We could more easily espouse the ancient Jewish tradition, that 'leprosy of garments and houses was not found in the world generally, but was a sign and a miracle in Israel to guard them against an evil tongue' (Maimonides On Leprosy, xvi. 10), than such laws of exegesis, whereby anything and everything might be introduced into the Bible.

5. Literature.—Very important notices and canons on leprosy are given in the Mishna Tracta Negaim, by Maimonides; Iod Ha-Chesaka Hilchoth Mechosos Kapara, cap. iv., and Hilchoth Tamath Tzoraath; and by Rashi and Rashbam, Commentaries on Lev. xiii., xiv. LESHEM. [LAISH.]

LESHEM (לֶשֶׁם), a precious stone (Exod. xxviii. 19; xxxix. 12). The LXX. render it by λειτουργία, the Vulg. by ligurius; A. V. ligure. It is uncertain what stone is intended by these appellations. The prevailing opinion is that it is the jacinth that is meant, and this is supported by Rev. xxi. 20, where the jacinth occupies the place of the leshem, and by Epiphanius, who says that the ligure is the hyacinth. This view, however, is rejected by some, who think the opal is intended by leshem, while others contend for the tourmaline or rubellite. The ligurion or linkurion of the ancients was a hard stone, a gem on which seals were sometimes cut, and according to Theophrastus it possessed the magnetic or electric quality of attracting small bodies. The former quality is possessed by the opal and the jacinth alike; but neither of these possesses the latter quality. Tourmaline, again, has a magnetic power when heated; but it is not much valued as a gem, and there is no evidence that it was found in countries accessible by the Israelites at the time when the high-priest's breast-plate was made. The derivation of the Hebrew word לֶשֶׁם is uncertain; Gesenius compares the root לָשַׁם with the Arabic لَسَمَ, lasama, to lick; while Fürst, with more reason, comparing it with לָשַׁם and לָשַׁם, finds in it the notion of glancing, shimmering—a notion which will apply well to the ruddy lustre of the jacinth.

LETAAH (לֵטָאָה), a species of lizard, Sept. χαλαβώτης, Vulg. stellio; Targ. Jon. שֶׁמַמִּיּוּת, shemamitha (stellio); Syr. ܠܬܐܝܬܐ, teruritha (salamander). What species of lizard this word denotes is not certain. In the only passage where it occurs in the Bible (Lev. xi. 30) there is nothing to guide us to a decision on this point. Bochart derives the word from the Arab. لطا, lataa, to adhere to the ground, and from this argues its identity with the Arabian wachra or wachara; but this carries us little way, inasmuch as the description will apply to most lizards, and it is uncertain to what species the Arabs applied this term. As the Letaah frequented houses, it is most probable that it was the House-Gecko (Ptyodactylus Gecko), a species which abounds in Egypt, and is found also in Syria and Arabia. It is poisonous, and mere contact with it produces a fiery eruption like that caused by the sting of a nettle. From this probably has arisen the feeling prevalent in Egypt that this reptile causes leprosy, whence it has the name of Abu bureys, father of leprosy.—W. L. A.

LETUSHIM (לְטוּשִׁים, 'sharpened,' from לָטַשׁ, acuit; Λαρουσιεῖμ; Latusim). Jokshan, Abraham's second son by Keturah, had two sons, Sheba and Dedan; 'and the sons of Dedan were Asshurim, and Letushim, and Leummim' (Gen. xxv. 3). These are plural forms, and consequently Letushim must be regarded as the name of the tribe or nation. It does not again occur in either sacred or profane history, nor have we any means of identifying the people. Forster supposes that the Letushim were absorbed in the generic appellation of Dedan, several times mentioned in the prophets (Jer. xxv. 23; Ezek. xxv. 13; Is. xxi. 13). They dwelt in the desert eastward from Edom (Forster, Geogr. of Arabia, i. 334).—J. L. P.

LEUMMIM (לְאֻמִּים, 'peoples,' from אָמַן; Λαομῆμ, Laomim), a tribe descended from the third son of Dedan (Gen. xxv. 3). The name does not occur in the later books of the Bible, but Ptolemy mentions a tribe in Arabia Felix called Allumaeoti (Ἀλλουμαῖοται), which appears to be a corruption of the old Hebrew Leummim with the Arabic article prefixed (Geogr. vi. 7). He also enumerates Luma among the towns of Arabia Deserta (v. 19), and Forster suggests that this may have been an ancient settlement of the same tribe (Geogr. of Arabia, i. 335).—J. L. P.

LEUSDEN, JOHN, was born at Utrecht in 1624, and died in 1699. For nearly fifty years he sustained a very high reputation as professor of Hebrew in the recently founded university of his native city. He had well qualified himself for the duties of this office by careful study of theology and the Oriental languages at Utrecht, and afterwards of the sacred original of the O. T. under the tuition of a very learned Rabbi of Amsterdam. Few writings have descended to us from the Biblical scholars of former days of more solid utility than Leusden's. If they are defective in originality of genius (the amount of which quality, however, it is impossible rightly to determine in works like our author's), they undoubtedly afford evidence of their author's varied resources of learning, adorned by clearness of method and an easy style; characteristics which made Leusden one of the most renowned and successful teachers of his age. His numerous works were all Biblical, and may be classed as (1) Critical, (2) Introductory, and (3) Exegetical. Under the first head we have his valuable Biblia Hebraea accuratissima notis He- braicis et lemmatibus illustrata: typis Josephi Athias., Amstel. 1617 [2d edit. 1667]. This was the first critical edition by a Christian editor ['Æstimatissima primum numeratis versibus, primæque a Christiano adhibitis MSS. facta.' Steinschneider, Catal. Bodl.] In 1694 he joined Eisenmenger in publishing a Hebrew Bible without points. The Greek Scriptures also received his careful attention, as is proved by his editions of the Greek Test. in 1675, 1688, 1693, 1698, 1701, and by his edition of the Septuagint, Amster. 1683. After his death, Schaaf completed a valuable edition of the Syriac New Test. (with Tremellius' version), which Leusden had begun. Under this first head we may also place his Hebrew Lexicon (1688); Elementary Hebr. Gram., which was translated into English, French, and German (1668); his Compendia of the O. T. and the N. T. (comprising selections of the originals, with translations and grammatical notes in Latin), frequently reprinted; his Onomasticon Sacr. (1665, 1684), and his still useful Clavis Hebr. Vet. Test. (containing the Masoretic notes, etc., besides much grammatical and philological information), first published in 1683, and his Clavis Græc. N. T. (1672). His contributions to the second head of Introduction (Einleitung) and sacred archaeology were not less valuable than the works we have already commended. Of these we mention three (sometimes to be met with in one vol.) as very useful to the Biblical student: Philologus Hebr. continens Questiones Hebr. quæ circa V. Test. Hebr. fere moveri solent (the best editions contain his edition and translation of Maimonides' Precepts of Moses, p. 56); Philologus Hebræo-mixtus, una cum Spicilegio Philol. (containing treatises on several interesting points of Hebrew antiquities and Talmudical science); Philologus Hebræo-Græcus generalis, in which questions relating to the sacred Greek of the Christian Scriptures, its Hebraisms, the Syriac and other translations, its inspired authors, etc. etc., are well and succinctly handled (with this work occurs Leusden's translation into Hebrew of all the Chaldee portions of the O. T.) Under the last, or Exegetical head, we have less to record. In 1656 (reprinted in 1692) Leusden published in a Latin translation, David Kimchi's Commentary on the prophet Jonah (Jonas illustratus), and in the following year a similar work (again after David Kimchi) on Joel and Obadiah (Joel explicatus, adjunctus Obadias illustratus*). We must not conclude the list of the learned labours of this diligent scholar and worthy man without mentioning his editions (with the help of Vilemandy and Morinus) of Bochart's Works, and the works of our own learned countrymen, Lightfoot (whose works he published in Latin, in 3 vols. folio, in the last year of his life) and Poole (whose Synopsis occurs in its very best form in Leusden's edition, 5 vols. folio, 1684). Justice, on the whole, has been done to this ornament of the church of Holland. Much information respecting his life and writings is contained in Burmann (Traject. erudit.), Fabricius (Hist. Biblioth. Fabric., i. 244), Walch (Biblioth. Theol. Selecta, vols. iii., iv.), Biographie universelle anc. et mod. (1819), xxiv. 357, Kalisch (Hebr. Gram., part ii. [Historical Introd.], p. 37), and in Arnold (Herzog., viii. 345, 346).—P. H.

LEVI (לֵוִי, a joining; Sept. Aeuel), the third son of Jacob and Leah, born in Mesopotamia B. C. 1750 (Gen. xxix. 34). No circumstance is recorded of him save the part which he and his full brother Simeon took in the massacre of the Shechemites, to avenge the wrong done to their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiv. 25, 26). This transaction was to his last hour regarded by Jacob with abhorrence, and he failed not to allude to it in his dying declaration. As Simeon and Levi were united in that act, so the patriarch couples them in his prophecy: 'Accursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel! I will divide them in Jacob, and disperse them in Israel.' And, accordingly, their descendants were afterwards, in different ways, dispersed among the other tribes; although, in the case of Levi, this curse was eventually turned into a benefit and blessing.

[Two other persons of the name of Levi are mentioned in the genealogy of Jesus Christ, viz., the son of Malchi, a near ancestor of our Lord (Luke iii. 24), and a more remote ancestor, son of Simeon (ver. 29). The Evangelist Matthew also bore the name of Levi (Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27, 29), [MATTHEW].

LEVI B. GERSHON. [RALBAG.]

LEVIATHAN (לִיְאָתָן; LXX. τὸ μέγα κῆτος, δράκων; Compl. λεβιάθαν), an aquatic animal, which, though only five times mentioned by name in the Bible (Job iii. 8; xli. 1, Heb. xl. 25; Ps. lxxiv. 14; civ. 26; Is. xxvii. 1), is described in detail in the Book of Job (xli.). Its name is supposed to be derived from לִיָּה, 'a garland, wreath,' hence an animal wreathed or twisted in folds.

There can be no doubt that the description in Job applies to the crocodile, but in other passages leviathan is held to signify a large serpent, and a whale or other large marine animal. To decide how far the latter suppositions are probable, it will be necessary to examine the several passages relating to it, taking first those which certainly refer to the crocodile.

It will be well to notice the chief characteristics of leviathan in the description in Job, to render its identity with the crocodile in that place beyond doubt. The animal is first spoken of as not to be taken, like any small aquatic creature, with a hook; as not to be tamed, whether as a plaything or an object of merchandise. Yet, more, he is impenetrable to pikes or fish-spears. The subject then changes. No longer to be assailed, leviathan is to be feared as an assailant whom none is so fierce as to stir up. His description then follows. His teeth are dreadful; his back is coated with shield-like armour, closely fastened together, 'so that a breath entereth not between' the plates, 'his eyes [are] as the eyelids of [the] dawn,' his breath is fiery, his neck strong, his muscles fast fixed together, his heart 'firm as a stone, yea hard as [the] nether millstone.' None can approach him with any weapon. Iron and brass are powerless against him, so are sling-stones and the spear. The sea boils where he swims, and a path of foam shines after him. 'He is sovereign over all the children of pride' (בְּנֵי שִׁחְוָה); that is, the animals of prey (see xxviii. 8). It is marvellous that any scholar can have imagined that these characteristics denote the whale, or water-monsters in general, for, if applied to the crocodile, there is little, even in a passage full of vivid images, that is figurative. On the other hand, several points shew a minute agreement; it has been suggested by Col. Hamilton Smith, that the comparison of the eyes of leviathan to 'the eyelids of [the] dawn' may be due to the contractile cat-like pupils' having in some crocodiles 'a luminous greenish tinge' [CROCODILE, i. p. 589, a], and this is curiously illustrated by a passage in the 'Hieroglyphics' of Horapollo Nilosus, where the eyes of a crocodile are said to denote a rising or sunrise, because they alone shine from the deep ('Ἀνατολὴν δὲ λέγοντες, δύο ὀφθαλμοὺς κροκοδείλου συγγραφούσιν. ἐπειδήπερ [i. ἐπειδήπερ] πάντος σώματος ζώου ὁ ὀφθαλμοὶ ἐκ τοῦ βυθοῦ ἀναφαίνονται, i. sec. lxviii. ed. Cory, pp. 85, 86).

The use of the word 'sea' to describe the creature's abode does not militate against the crocodile, for this term describes the Nile in the account of the grandeur and sack of Thebes in Nahum (iii. 8), and its Arabic equivalent, 'bahr,' is the name of both Nile and sea in modern Egypt; besides that, it may be that a lake of Lower Egypt is intended. Certainly 'sea,' for the Nile, is a very rare use in the Bible, of which no certain instance but that in Nahum can be cited; yet the grandeur of the whole description in Job would account for a preference for the most dignified terms. The reference in an earlier passage in the same book is evidently to the same creature. Desperate men are there described as those 'who are ready to stir up leviathan' (Job iii. 8). This should be compared with, '[There is] none [so] fierce as to stir him up' (xli. 10, A. V. 2). Yet Gesenius imagines that a serpent is meant in the former passage.

In Ps. lxxiv. the terms 'dragons' (תַּנִּינִים) and leviathan are used to designate the Pharaoh of the Exodus. The Psalmist begins with a prayer for the deliverance of the Israelites and Zion from their oppressors. He then recalls God's wonders of old, 'Thou didst divide the sea by thy might: thou didst break utterly the heads of the dragons in the waters. Thou didst break the heads of leviathan in pieces, [and] gavest him [to be] meat to the people dwelling in the wilderness' (צִיָּים, the wild beasts), vers. 13, 14. With this passage must be compared the parallel one of Isaiah, where the arm of the LORD is thus addressed: 'Art not [thou] it that hath hewed Rahab, [and] pierced through the dragon? Art not [thou] it that hath dried up the sea, the waters of the great deep; that hath made the depths of the sea a path for the ransomed to pass over?' (li. 9, 10, comp. 15). With these again should be compared the mention of the Exodus in Job, 'By his might he restrained [or 'rebuked'] the sea, and by his wisdom he smote through Rahab' [or 'pride'] (xxvi. 12). These passages connect the special name leviathan with the general term, tannin, dragon, as symbols of the Pharaoh of the Exodus, who could be thus represented by a water creature with especial fitness in the relation of the miracle of dividing the sea. Tannin, though certainly a general term, is used for the crocodile where Ezekiel describes the pride and overthrow of Pharaoh Hophra, with an apparent retrospect of the Exodus (xxix. 3, 4, 5). Such a retrospect would not only be appropriate, as Egypt was again to be humbled to the dust, but also from the probability that the river ('rivers,' pl. of נָהָר) spoken of as the dragon's abode, his own, made by him for himself, was not the Nile, but (at least primarily) as Mr. Stanley Poole has argued with high probability, the Canal of the Red Sea (Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, RED SEA, iii. pp. 1010, 1011), commenced for the second time but a few years before the date of this prophecy by Hophra's grandfather Pharaoh Necho.*

The Egyptian monuments do not throw any positive light upon this subject. The crocodile was one of the sacred animals, but was not worshipped throughout the country, being hated and destroyed in some of the nomes. It was sacred to the god SEBAK, a divinity of minor importance, represented with this animal's head. The use of the crocodile as a symbol of the king of Egypt seems therefore to be Shemite, not Egyptian.

Two mentions of leviathan remain to be noticed, as to both of which there has been a general agreement of commentators against the crocodile. In Ps. civ. the abode of leviathan seems to be the sea. 'The earth is full of thy riches. [So is] this sea, great and large on every side, wherein [are] things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts. There go the ships: [there is] that leviathan [whom] thou hast created to take his pastime therein' (24, 25, 26). We have already shewn that the Nile is certainly once called the sea, and probably twice, in Scripture. The vastness of the river, with its abundant inhabitants, as in Æschylus,—

—ὁ μέγας καὶ πολυθρέμμων

in whichever of its two possible senses we take πολυθρέμμων, as abounding in monsters, comparing the still more pointedly-appropriate πολυκήρεα Νεῖλος of Theocritus (xvii. 98), or much-nourishing—and the many vessels which anciently voyaged on its surface, accord with this description, and neither ships nor whales would be as accustomed sights from the shore of Palestine, or the coasts of Arabia, as boats and crocodiles in the Nile, the Canal of the Red Sea, and perhaps one or more lakes connected with that canal. The idea of pastime may seem to suit the whale rather than the crocodile, but the notion implied seems to be space enough for the free movements of so great an animal, and if so, the Nile would be preferable to the sea.

In Is. xxvii. 1, leviathan is used as a symbol of an enemy, or the enemies of God's people: 'In that day the LORD with his hard, and great, and strong sword, shall punish [or 'fall upon'] leviathan the fleeing (?) serpent, even leviathan the tortuous serpent; and slay the dragon that [is] in the sea.' Here Gesenius supposes a great serpent to be meant, and the kingdom of Babylon to be symbolized by it. But it is evident that the prophecy, if it have a primary reference to the return from the captivity at Babylon, has a wider import, and there is at least as much reason to think that the reference is to Egypt, a future exodus from which is foretold, as well as a like deliverance from Assyria (12, 13). How then are we to account for the parallel use of leviathan and serpent? In a passage where symbols are accumulated, probably to designate a distant object or objects, there seems no need to suppose that all must be of the same signification. Dragon indeed includes leviathan, but it seems, certainly, to have a more general sense. We therefore do not see that in this case it is necessary to suppose that leviathan is used in any sense but that of crocodile, as the symbol of Pharaoh, and so of any enemy of the true Israel.—R. S. LEVISON, MORDECAI GUMPEL, a learned Jewish physician and commentator, and fellow-student of the celebrated philosopher Moses Mendelssohn in Berlin. He afterwards came over to London and was physician in one of the hospitals (1790), was then nominated by Gustavus III. of Sweden to the professional chair in Upsal, which office he held for several years; returned to his native place, Berlin, in 1781, thence went to Hamburg in 1784, where he died Feb. 10, 1797. His works which illustrate the Bible are—(1.) A commentary on Ecclesiastes, called תוכחת מנלה, dedicated to Gustavus III., Hamburg 1784. This elaborate work is preceded by five introductions, which respectively treat on the import of the book, the appropriateness of its name, Hebrew synonyms, roots, the verb and its inflexions, the names of the deity, on the design of the Bible, etc. etc.; whereupon follows the Hebrew text with a double commentary, one explains the words and their connection (ביאור הסלות ותניניהם), and the other gives an exposition of the argument of the book. It is one of the most important commentaries which have appeared on this difficult volume of the O.T., and must be added to the history of the interpretation of Ecclesiastes given by Ginsburg, Historical and Critical Commentary on Ecclesiastes. (2.) A treatise on Holy Scripture, published at the request of the king of Sweden, London 1770. (3.) A treatise on the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Talmud, entitled סלת מנחה בלולה. Hamburg 1797. (4.) A Hebrew Lexicon, called השרשים. (5.) A work on Hebrew Synonyms, entitled ספר הנרדפים; and (6.) A Hebrew Grammar, called דרך הקרש החורשה, the last three works have not as yet been published. LEVITA. [ELIAS LEVITA.]

LEVITES, or SONS OF LEVI (לְוִיִּם; Λευῖται, υἱοὶ Λευί; Levite, filii Levi), besides denoting all the descendants of the tribe of Levi (Exod. vi. 25; Levit. xxv. 32, etc.; Num. xxxv. 2; Josh. xxi. 3, 41), is the distinctive title of that portion of it which was set apart for the subordinate offices of the sanctuary, to assist the other and smaller portion of their own tribe, who are denominated the sons of Aaron, Aaronites, or Priests, and were invested with the superior functions of the hierarchy [PRIESTS]. In describing the institution and development of the Levitical order, we shall have to distinguish three periods; viz.—I. From the institution of this order by Moses till the commencement of the monarchy; II. From the changes introduced in this order by David till the exile; and III. The post-exile period.

*The ancient Egyptian ATUR, AUR, signifies river, the Nile, as the river, the inundation, lake of temple? canal? (M. de Horrack in Revue Archéologique, N. S., 1864, pp. 45, 46, 48-50). The Hebrew word year is generally used for a stream or streams of Egypt; by Amos for the, or an, inundation (viii. 7, 8; see ix. 5), and also for channels.

I. From the institution of the Levitical order till the monarchy.—This is the most interesting and important period in the history of the Levitical order, and in describing it we must first of all trace the cause which called it into existence.

1. Origin and institution of the Levitical order.—The Tabernacle, with its extensive and regular sacrificial service, which required a special priestly order regularly to perform the higher functions of the sanctuary, also called into being the Levitical staff to aid the priests in their arduous task; inasmuch as the primitive and patriarchal mode of worship which obtained till the erection of the Tabernacle, and according to which the first-born of all Israelites performed the priestly offices (comp. Exod. xxiv. 5 with xix. 24, and Art. FIRST-BORN), could not be perpetuated under the newly-organised congregational service, without interfering with the domestic relations of the people. It was for this reason, as well as to secure greater efficiency in the sacred offices, that the religious primogeniture was conferred upon the tribe of Levi, which were henceforth to give their undivided attention to the requirements of the sanctuary (Num. iii. 11-13). The tribe of Levi were selected because they had manifested a very extraordinary zeal for the glory of God (Exod. xxxii. 26, etc.), had already obtained a part of this religious primogeniture by the institution of the hereditary priesthood in the family of Aaron (Exod. xxviii. 1), and because, as the tribe to which Moses and Aaron belonged, they would most naturally support and promote the institutions of the lawgiver. To effect this transfer of office, both the first-born males of all the other tribes, and the Levites, were ordered to be numbered, from the age of one month and upwards; and when it was found that the former were 22,273 and the latter 22,000,* it was arranged that 22,000 of the first-born should be replaced by the 22,000 Levites, that the 273 first-born who were in excess of the Levites should be redeemed at the rate of five shekels each, being the legal sum for the redemption of the first-born child (Num. xviii. 16), and that the 1365 shekels be given to Aaron and his sons as a compensation for the odd persons who, as first-born, belonged to Jehovah. As to the difficulty how to decide which of the first-born should be redeemed by paying this money, and which should be exchanged for the Levites, since it was natural for every one to wish to escape this expense, the Midrash (on Num. iii. 17) and the Talmud relate that 'Moses wrote on 22,000 tickets

Levite (לוי), and on 273 Five Shekels (חמט

שקלים), mixed them all up, put them into a vessel, and then bid every Israelite to draw one. He who took out one with Levite on it was redeemed by a Levite, and he who drew one with Five Shekels on it had to be redeemed by payment of this sum' (Sanhedrin 17, a). And there is no reason to doubt this ancient tradition. It was farther ordained, that the cattle which the Levites then happened to possess, should be considered as equivalent to all the first-born cattle which all the Israelites had, without their being numbered and exchanged, one for one, as in the case of the human beings (Num. iii. 41-51), so that the firstlings should not now be given to the priest, or be redeemed, which the Israelites were hereafter required to do (Num. xviii. 15).

2. Division of the tribe of Levi.—As different functions were assigned to the separate houses of the Levitical branch of the tribe, to which frequent references are made, we subjoin the following Table from Exod. vi. 16-25, italicising the Aaronic or priestly branch, in order to facilitate these references.

LEVI	GERSHON	Libni	Aaron	Elazar Ithamar
		Shimei
	KOHATH	Amram
		Izhar
		Hebron
		Uzziel
MERARI		Mishael
		Elzaphan
		Zithri
		Mahali
		Mushi*

* There is a discrepancy between the total number of the Levites, which is given in Num. iii. 39 as 22,000, and the separate number of the three divisions which is given in verses 22, 28, and 34, as follows—Gershonites 7500, + Kohathites 8600, + and Merarites 6200 = 22,300. Compare also ver. 46, where it is said that the 22,273 first-born exceeded the total number of Levites by 273. The Talmud (Bachoroth, 5 a) and the Jewish commentators, who are followed by most Christian expositors, submit that the 300 surplus Levites were the first-born of this tribe, who, as such, could not be substituted for the first-born of the other tribes, and therefore were omitted from the total. To this, however, it is objected, that if such an exemption of first-born had been intended, the text would have contained some intimation of it, whereas there is nothing whatever in the context to indicate it. Houbigant therefore suggests that a ל has crept into the word שש in ver. 28, making it שש, and that by retaining the former word we obtain 8300 instead of 8600, which removes all the difficulty. Philippon, Keil, and others, adopt this explanation.

* Those mentioned in the above list are by no means the only descendants of Levi in their respective generations, as is evident from the fact, that though no sons of Libni, Shimei, Hebron, etc., are here given, yet mention is made in Num. iii. 21, of 'the family of the Libnites' and the family of the Shimeites; in Num. xxvii. 58, of 'the family of the Libnites;' and in Num. iii. 27; xxvi. 58, of 'the family of the Hebronites;' whilst in 1 Chron. xxiii. several sons of these men are mentioned by name. Again, no sons of Mahali and Mushi are given, and yet they appear in Num. iii. as fathers of families of the Levites. The design of the genealogy in question is simply to give the pedigrees of Moses and Aaron, and some other principal heads of the family of Levi, as is expressly stated in Exod. vi. 25: 'these are the heads of the fathers of the Levites according to their families.' In these heads all the other members of their fami-

It will thus be seen that the Levitical order comprises the whole of the descendants of Gershon and Merari, and those of Kohath through Izhar and Uzziel, as well as through Amram's second son, Moses; whilst Aaron, Amram's first son, and his issue, constitute the priestly order. It must here be remarked, that though Kohath is the second in point of age and order, yet his family will be found to occupy the first position, because they are the nearest of kin to the priests.

3. Age and qualifications for Levitical service.—The only qualification for active service specified in the Mosaic law, is mature age, which in Num. iv. 3, 23, 30, 39, 43, 47, is said to be from thirty to fifty; whilst in Num. viii. 24, 25, it is said to commence at twenty-five. Various attempts have been made to reconcile these two apparently contradictory injunctions. The Talmud (Cholin 24, a), Rashi (Comment., in loco), and Maimonides (Iod Ha-Chezaka, Hilchoth Kele Ha-Mikdash, iii. 7. 3), who are followed by some Christian commentators, affirm that from twenty-five to thirty the Levites attended in order to be instructed in their duties, but did not enter upon actual duties until they were full thirty years of age. But this explanation, as Abravanel rightly remarks, 'is at variance with the plain declaration of the text, that the Levites were called at twenty-five years of age to wait upon the service of the Tabernacle, which clearly denotes not instruction for their ministry, but the ministry itself' (Comment. on Num. viii. 24). Besides, the text itself does not give the slightest intimation that any period of the Levitical life was devoted to instruction. Hence Rashbam, Ibn Ezra, and Abravanel, who are followed by most modern expositors, submit that the twenty-five years of age refers to the Levites' entering upon the lighter part of their service, such as keeping watch and performing the lighter duties in the Tabernacle; whilst the thirty years of age refers to their entering upon the more onerous duties, such as carrying heavy weights, when the tabernacle was moved about from place to place, which required the full strength of a man (מבן שלשים שנה הוא לעבודת משא ומבן חמש ועשרים לעבודת האהל); maintaining that this distinction is indicated in the text by the words לעבוד ולמשא, for labour and burdens, when the thirty years' work lies were included, according to the principle laid down in 1 Chron. xxiii. 11: 'therefore they were in one reckoning, according to their father's house.' Some names are also mentioned for a special purpose, e.g., the sons of Izhar, on account of Korah, who was the leader of the rebellion against Moses. These observations afford an answer, to a considerable extent, to the conclusions of Bishop Colenso upon the number of the Levites (comp. The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua critically examined, part i., p. 107-112).

is spoken of (Num. iv. 30, 31), and by the omission of the word מִשָּׂא, burden, when the twenty-five years' work is spoken of (Num. viii. 24, etc.). But it may fairly be questioned, whether man is more fitted for arduous work from thirty to thirty-five than from twenty-five to thirty. Besides the Gershonites and the Merarites, who had the charge of the heavier burdens, did not carry them at all (comp. Num. vii. 3-9, and infra, sec. 4). According to another ancient Jewish interpretation given in the Siphri, and adopted by Bähr (Symbolik, ii. 41) and others, Num. iv. treats of the necessary age of the Levites for the immediate requirements in the wilderness; whilst Num. viii. gives their age for the promised land, when they shall be divided among the tribes and a larger number shall be wanted (Siphri on Num. viii.). Somewhat similar is Philippson's explanation, who affirms that at the first election of the Levitical order the required age for service was from thirty to fifty, but that all future Levites had to commence service at twenty-five. Whilst the Sept. solves the difficulty by uniformly reading twenty-five instead of thirty.

4. Duties and classification of the Levites.—The Levites were given as a gift (תְּנִינִים) to Aaron and his sons, the priests, to wait upon them, and to do the subordinate work for them at the service of the sanctuary (Num. viii. 19; xvii. 2-6). They had also to guard the tabernacle and take charge of certain vessels, whilst the priests had to watch the altars and the interior of the sanctuary (i. 50-53; viii. 19; xviii. 1-7). To carry it out effectually, the charge of certain vessels and portions of the Tabernacle, as well as the guarding of its several sides, were assigned to each of the three sections into which the tribe was divided by their respective descent from the three sons of Levi, i. e., Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, as follows:—

The Kohathites, who out of 8600 persons yielded 2750 qualified for active service according to the prescribed age, and who were under the leadership of Elizaphan, had to occupy the south side of the Tabernacle; and, as the family to whom Aaron the high-priest and his sons belonged, had to take charge of the holy things (מִשְׁמֶרֶת הַקֹּדֶשׁ)—viz., the ark, the table of shew-bread, the candlestick, the two altars of incense and burnt-offering, as well as of the sacred vessels used at the service of these holy things, and the curtains of the holy of holies. All these things they had to carry on their own shoulders when the camp was broken up (Num. iii. 27-32; iv. 5-15; vii. 9). Eleazar, the head of the priests, who belonged to the Kohathites, and was the chief commander of the three Levitical divisions, had the charge of the oil for the candlestick, the incense, the daily meat-offering, and the anointing oil (Num. iii. 32; iv. 16). (See woodcut, page 821.)

The Gershonites, who, out of 7500 men yielded 2630 for active service, and who were under the leadership of Eliasaph, had to occupy the west side of the tabernacle, and to take charge of the tapestry of the tabernacle, all its curtains, hangings, and coverings, the pillars of the tapestry hangings, the implements used in connection therewith, and to perform all the work connected with the taking down and putting up of the articles over which they had the charge (Num. iii. 21-26; iv. 22-28). (See woodcut, page 824.)

The Merarites, who out of 6200 yielded 3200 active men, and who were under the leadership of Zuriel, had to occupy the north side of the tabernacle, and take charge of the boards, bars, pillars, sockets, tent-pins, etc. (Num. iii. 33-37; iv. 39, 40). The two latter companies, however, were allowed to use the six covered waggons and the twelve oxen which were offered as an oblation to Jehovah; the Gershonites, having the less heavy portion, got two of the waggons and four of the oxen; whilst the Merarites, who had the heavier portions, got four of the waggons and eight of the oxen (Num. vii. 3-9). (See woodcut, page 825.) Thus the total number of active men which the three divisions of the Levites yielded was 8580. When encamped around the tabernacle, they formed, as it were, a partition between the people and the sanctuary; they had to guard that the children of Israel should not come near it, since those who ventured to do so incurred the penalty of death (Num. i. 51; iii. 38; xvii. 22); nor were they themselves allowed to come near the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar, lest they die, together with the priests (Num. xviii. 3-6). Israelites of any other tribe were strictly forbidden to perform the Levitical office, in order 'that there might be no plague when the children of Israel approach the sanctuary' (Num. iii. 10; viii. 19; xviii. 5); and according to the ancient Hebrew canons, even a priest was not allowed to do the work assigned to the Levites, nor was one Levite permitted to perform the duties which were incumbent upon his fellow Levite on the penalty of death (Maimonides, Hilchoth Kele Ha-Mikdash, iii. 10).

5. Consecration of the Levites.—The first act in the consecration of the Levites was to sprinkle them with the water of purifying (מֵי חַטָּאת), which, according to tradition, was the same used for the purification of persons who became defiled by dead bodies, and in which were mingled cedar wood, hyssop, scarlet, and ashes of the red heifer (Num. xix. 6, 9, 13), and was designed to cleanse them from the same defilement (comp. Rashi on Num. viii. 7). They had, in the next place, as an emblem of further purification, to shave off all the hair from their body, 'to teach them thereby,' as Ralbag says, 'that they must renounce as much as was in their power all worldly things, and devote themselves to the service of the most high God,' and then wash their garments. After this triple form of purification, they were brought before the door of the tabernacle, along with two bullocks and fine flour mingled with oil, when the whole congregation, through the elders who represented them, laid their hands upon the heads of the Levites, and set them apart for the service of the sanctuary, to occupy the place of the first-born of the whole congregation; whereupon the priests waved them before the Lord (Num. viii. 5-14), which in all probability was done, as Abrahanel says, by leading them forward and backward, up and down, as if saying, behold these are henceforth the servants of the Lord instead of the first-born בְּהִלְכַת הוֹבֵאֵת יִירֵדָה) תֵּלֶה כְּאוֹמֵר הִרְאֵנוּ לִי מַעֲבָדֵי תַחַת בְּכוֹרוֹת (בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל). The part which the whole congregation took in this consecration is a very important feature in the Hebrew constitution, inasmuch as it most distinctly shews that the Levitical order proceeded from the midst of the people (Exod. xxviii. 1), was to be regarded as essentially identical with it, and not as a sacred caste standing in proud eminence above the rest of the nation. This principle of equality, which, according to the Mosaic law, was not to be infringed by the introduction of a priesthood or monarchy (Deut. xvii. 14-20), was recognised throughout the existence of the Hebrew commonwealth, as is evident from the fact that the representatives of the people took part in the coronation of kings and the instalment of high-priests (1 Kings ii. 35; with 1 Chron. xxix. 22), and even in the days of the Maccabees we see that it is the people who installed Simon as high-priest (1 Maccab. xiv. 35).

6. Revenues of the Levites.—Thus consecrated to the service of the Lord, it was necessary that the tribe of Levi should not be engaged in the temporal pursuits of the rest of the people, to enable them to give themselves wholly to their spiritual functions, and to the cultivation of the arts and sciences, as well as to preserve them from contracting a desire to amass earthly possessions. For this reason they were to have no territorial possessions, but Jehovah was to be their inheritance (Num. xviii. 20; xvi. 62; Deut. x. 9; xviii. 1,

2; Josh. xviii. 7). To reward their labour, which they had henceforth to perform instead of the first-born of the whole people, as well as to compensate the loss of their share in the material wealth of the nation, it was ordained that they should receive from the other tribes the tithes of the produce of the land, from which the non-priestly portion of the Levites in their turn had to offer a tithe to the priests as a recognition of their higher consecration (Num. xviii. 21-24, 26-32; Neh. x. 37). But though they were to have no territorial possessions, still they required a place of abode. To secure this, and at the same time to enable the Levites to disseminate a knowledge of the law and exercise a refined and intellectual influence among the people at large, upon whose conscientious payment of the tithes they were dependent for subsistence, forty-eight cities were assigned to them, six of which were to be cities of refuge for those who had inadvertently killed any one (Num. xxxv. 1-8). From these forty-eight cities, which they obtained immediately after the conquest of Canaan, and which were made up by taking four cities from the district of every tribe, thirteen were allotted to the priestly portion of the Levitical tribe. Which cities belonged to the priestly portion of the tribe, and which to the non-priestly portion, and how they were distributed among the other tribes, as recorded in Josh. xxi., will be seen from the following Table:—

Each of these cities was required to have an out-lying suburb (מִנְכָּל, podotrea) of meadow-land for the pasture of the flocks and herds belonging to the Levites, the dimensions of which are thus described in Num. xxxv. 4, 5, 'And the suburb [or pasture-ground] of the cities which ye shall give unto the Levites, are from the wall of the city to the outside a thousand cubits round about; and ye shall measure from without the city the east corner two thousand cubits, and the south corner two thousand cubits, and the west corner two thousand cubits, and the north corner two thousand cubits, and the city in the centre.' These dimensions have occasioned great difficulty, because of the apparent contradiction in the two verses, as specifying first 1000 cubits and then 2000. The LXX., Josephus (Antiq. iv. 4. 3), Philo (De Sacerd. honoribus), get over the difficulty by reading 2000 in both verses, as exhibited in diagram I. a., whilst ancient and modern commentators, who rightly adhere to the text, have endeavoured to reconcile the two verses by advancing different theories, of which the following are the most noticeable: 1. According to the Talmud (Erubin 51, a), the space 'measured from the wall 1000 cubits round about,' was used as a common or suburb, and the space measured 'from without the city on the east side, etc.,' was a further tract of land of 2000 cubits, used for fields and vineyards, the former being 'the suburbs' properly so-called, and the latter 'the fields of the suburbs,' as represented in diagram I. b. Against this view, 326.

[I. a.]

however, which is the most simple and rational, and which is adopted by Maimonides (Hilchoth Shemita Ve-Yobel, xiii. 2), Bishop Patrick, and most English expositors, it is urged, that it is not said that the 2000 cubits are to be measured in all directions, but only in the east, south, etc., direction, or, as the Hebrew has it, east, south, etc., corner (רֵכֶס). 2. It means that a circle of 1000 cubits radius was to be measured from the centre of the city, and then a square circumscribed about that circle, each of whose sides was 2000 cubits long, as exhibited in diagram II. But the objection to this is that the 1000 cubits were to be measured 'from the wall of the city,' and not from the centre.

327. [II.]

3. The 1000 cubits were measured perpendicularly to the wall of the city, and then perpendicular to these distances, i.e., parallel to the walls of the city, the 2000 cubits were measured on the north, south, east, and west sides, as shown in diagram III. This, however, is obviously incorrect, because the sides would not be 2000 cubits long if the city were of finite dimensions, but plainly longer. 4. It is assumed that the city was built in a circular form, with a radius of 1500 cubits, that a circle was then described with a radius of 2500 cubits from the centre of the city, i.e., at a distance of 1000 cubits from the walls of the city, and that the suburbs were enclosed between the circumferences of the two circles, and that the corner of the circumscribed square was 1000 cubits from the circumference of the outer circle. Compare diagram IV. But the objection to this is, that by Euclid, I. 47, the square of the diagonal equals the sum of the square of the sides, whereas in this figure 3500^2 does not equal $2500^2 + 2500^2$. The assigned length of the diagonal varies about 35

329. The Gershonites.

cubits from its actual value. 5. The city is supposed to be of a circular form; round it a circle is described at a distance of 1000 cubits from its walls;

V. This view, which is somewhat fanciful, strictly meets the requirements of the Hebrew text. 6. The 1000 cubits are measured from the centre in

then from the walls 2000 cubits are measured to the north, south, east, and west corners—the whole forming a starlike figure, as exhibited in diagram

334.

four directions at right angles to one another, and perpendicular to each of these a side of 2000 cubits long is drawn, the whole forming a square. But in this case the condition of '1000 cubits round about' is not fulfilled, the distance of the centre from the corners of the square being plainly more than 1000 cubits. 7. The '1000 cubits round about' is equivalent to 1000 cubits square, or 305 English acres. 8. The city is supposed to be square, each side measuring 1000 or 500 cubits, and then, at a distance of 1000 cubits in all directions from the square, another square is described, as represented in diagrams VI. a. and VI. b. But this incurs the objection urged against 6, that the 1000 cubits cannot be said to be measured 'round about,' the distance from the corner of the city to the corner of the precincts being plainly more than 1000 cubits. Upon a review of all these theories, we incline to the ancient Jewish view, which is stated first, and against which nothing can be said, if we take 'on the south, east, etc.,' simply to mean, as it often does, in all directions, instead of four distinct points. It pre-supposes that the cities were built in a circular form, which was usual in the cities of antiquity, both because the circle of all figures comprises the largest area within the smallest periphery, and because the inhabitants could reach every part of the walls in the shortest time from all directions, if necessary, for purposes of defence.

332. The Merarites.

These revenues have been thought exorbitant beyond all bounds; for, discarding the unjustifiable

conclusion of Bishop Colenso, that 'forty-four people [Levites], with the two priests, and their families, had forty-eight cities assigned to them' (The Pentateuch, etc., part i., p. 112), and adhering to the Scriptural numbers, we still have a tribe which, at the second census, numbered 23,000 males, with no more than 12,000 arrived at man's estate, receiving the tithes of 600,000 people; 'consequently,' it is thought 'that each individual Levite, without having to deduct seed and the charges of husbandry, had as much as five Israelites reaped from their fields, or gained on their cattle' (Michaelis, Laws of Moses, i., p. 252). Add to this that, though so small in number, the Levites received forty-eight cities, whilst other tribes which consisted of more than double the number of men received less cities, and some did not get more than twelve cities. But in all these calculations the following facts are ignored:—1. The tithes were not a regular tax, but a religious duty, which was greatly neglected by the people; 2. Even from these irregular tithes the Levites had to give a tithe to the priests; 3. The tithes never increased, whereas the Levites did increase. 4. Thirteen of the forty-eight cities were assigned to the priests, and six were cities of refuge; and 5. Of the remaining twenty-nine cities, the Levites were by no means the sole occupants or proprietors, they were simply to have in them those houses which they required as dwellings, and the fields necessary for the pasture of their cattle. This is evident from the fact that the Levites were allowed to sell their houses, and that a special clause bearing on this subject was inserted in the Jubilee law [JUBILEE]; inasmuch as Lev. xxv. 32-34 would have no meaning unless it is presumed that other Israelites lived together with the Levites.

Such was the Mosaic organisation of the Levitical order which Joshua faithfully endeavoured to carry into effect. But so deeply rooted was the patriarchal mode of worship in the nation, according to which the head of the family, or the first-born son, performed the sacerdotal functions, that even in the lifetime of Moses this innovation of substituting the tribe of Levi and offering the sacrifices 'before the door of the Tabernacle before the Lord,' instead of on any altar erected by private individuals, created a revolt (Num. xvi. 3). It will therefore not be surprising to find that the primitive system of worship could not easily be superseded between the days of Joshua and the rise of the monarchy, that the people recurred to it again and again, that the Levites were without functions, influence, and means of subsistence, and were glad to seek refuge in any town, whether holy or not, and be maintained by the benevolence of pious individuals (Judg. ii. 5; vi. 11-20; xiii. 19, 20; xvii. 7-12; xviii. 1-31; 1 Sam. vi. 15; vii. 1-5; x. 17; xxxi. 1-6). As a striking illustration of this state of things, may be specified the conduct of Micah, a man of Mount Ephraim, who had in his own residence 'a house of God, and made an ephod and teraphim.' This man first consecrated one of his sons as a priest, and then got a homeless and breadless Levite, supposed to be the grandson of Moses himself, to dwell with him as 'a father and a priest' for little more than his food and raiment (Judg. xvii. 1-13). During the whole of Saul's reign, the Levites who had the charge of the ark of the covenant left this sacred trust to be profaned in the house of a private individual at Kirjath-jearim (1 Sam. vii. 2; 1 Chron. xiii. 2).

11. From the commencement of the monarchy to the exile.—The deplorable condition and disorganisation of the Levitical order were not much improved in the reign of the first Hebrew monarch. The self-willed Saul, who arrogated to himself the priestly functions, and massacred the priests at Nob (1 Sam. xxii.), was not likely to recognise the Levitical order and improve their circumstances. It was reserved for David to reorganise the great Levitical body. As soon as his kingdom was established, he immediately betook himself to the reconstruction of the divine worship, when he at once recognised the Mosaic ordinances about the priesthood and the Levitical order, and assigned to them their proper share of work in the sanctuary. When the ark was carried to Zion the Levites were the bearers of it (1 Chron. xiii. 2; xv., xvi., with vi. 16, etc.) The Levites engaged in conveying the ark to Jerusalem were divided into six father's houses, headed by six chiefs, four belonging to Kohath, one to Gershon, and one to Merari (1 Chron. xv. 5, etc.) The most remarkable feature in the Levitical duties of this period is their being employed for the first time in choral service (1 Chron. xv. 16-24; xvi. 4-36); others again were appointed as door-keepers (ibid. xv. 23, 24). Still the thorough reorganisation of the whole tribe was effected by the shepherd-king in the last days of his eventful life, that the Levites might be able at the erection of the Temple 'to wait on the sons of Aaron for the service of the house of Jehovah, in the courts and the chambers, and the purifying of all holy things, and the work of the service of the house of God' (1 Chron. xxiii. 28). This reorganisation may be described as follows:—

1. Number of Levites and age for service.—The Levites from thirty years of age and upwards were first of all numbered, when it was found that they were 38,000 (1 Chron. xxiii. 2, 3); this being about 29,500 more than at the first Mosaic census. It will be seen that, according to this statement, the Levites were to commence service at thirty years of age, in harmony with the Mosaic institution (Num. iv. 3, 23, 30); whilst in ver. 27 of the same chapter (i. e., 1 Chron. xxiii. 27) it is said that they were to take their share of duty at twenty years of age. Kimchi, who is followed by Bishop Patrick, Michaelis, and others, tries to reconcile this apparent contradiction by submitting that the former refers to a census which David made at an earlier period, which was according to the Mosaic law (Num. iv. 3); whilst the latter speaks of a second census which he made at the close of his life, when he found that the duties of the fixed sanctuary were much lighter and more numerous, and could easily be performed at the age of twenty, but at the same time required a larger staff of men. Against this, however, Bertheau rightly urges, that —1. The 38,000 Levites of thirty years of age given in the census of ver. 3, are the only persons appointed for the different Levitical offices; and that it is nowhere stated that this number was insufficient, or that the arrangements based thereupon, as recorded in vers. 4 and 5, were not carried out; and 2. The chronicler plainly indicates, in ver. 25, etc., that he is about to impart a different statement from that communicated in ver. 3; for he mentions therein the reason which induced David not to abide by the Mosaic institution, which prescribes the age of service to commence at thirty, and in ver. 27 expressly points out the source from which he derived this deviating account. The two accounts are, therefore, entirely different; the one records that the Levites, in David's time, were numbered from their thirtieth year; whilst the other, which appears to the chronicler more trustworthy, states that David introduced the practice which afterwards obtained (2 Chron. xxxi. 17; Ezra iii. 8) of appointing Levites to office at the age of twenty.

2. Division of the Levites according to the three great families.—Having ascertained their number, David, following the example of the Mosaic institution, divided the Levitical fathers' houses, according to their descent from the three sons of Levi, when it was ascertained that these three sons Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, were represented by twenty-four heads of fathers' houses (1 Chron. xxiii. 6-23; xxiv. 20-31), as follows:—

GERSHON	Laadan	Jehiel
		Zetham
		Joel
		Shelomith or Shelomoth
		Haziel
	Shimei	Haran
		Jahath
		Zina or Ziza
		Jeush and Beriah, counted as one Shubael
KOHATH	Amram	Rehabiah
		Izhar
		Shelomith or Shelomoth
		Jeriah
		Amariah
	Hebron	Jahaziel
		Jekameam
		Michah
		Issiah
		Shoham
MERARI	Uzziel	Zaccur
		Ibri
		Kish-Jeremeel
		Eder
		Jeremoth
	Jaaziah
	Mahli
	Mushi

3. Classification and duties of the Levites.—These twenty-four father's houses, numbering 38,000 men qualified for active service, were then divided into four classes, to each of which different duties were assigned.

a. The first class consisted of 24,000 Levites. These were appointed to assist the priests in the work of the sanctuary (ἱεροποιοῦντες). They had the custody of the official garments and sacred vessels, had to deliver them when wanted, and collect and lock them up again after they had been used; to replenish the sacrificial storehouse with cattle, flour, wine, oil, incense, and other articles used as sacrifices, and mete out each time the required quantity; to provide the different spices from which the priests compounded the incense (1 Chron. ix. 30); to prepare the shewbread and the other baked things used at sacrifices; to assist the priests in slaughtering the victims, and to attend to the cleaning of the Temple, etc. (1 Chron. xxiii. 28-32; ix. 29). They had most probably, also, the charge of the sacred treasury (1 Chron. xxvi. 20-28). Like the priests, they were subdivided into twenty-four courses or companies, according to the above-named twenty-four Levitical fathers' houses, and were headed respectively by one of the twenty-four representatives of these houses. Each of these courses was a week on duty, and was relieved on the Sabbath (2 Kings xi.) by the company whose turn it was to serve next; so that there were always a thousand men of this class on duty, and each man had to serve two weeks during the year. The menial work was done by the Nethinim, who were appointed to assist the Levites in these matters [NETHINIM].

b. The second class consisted of 4000, who were the musicians (ὑμνωδοί, (מְשֹׁרְרִים)). They too were subdivided into twenty-four courses or choirs, each headed by a chief (1 Chron. xxv.), and are to be traced back to the three great families of Levi, inasmuch as four of the chiefs were sons of Asaph, a descendant of Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 24-28); six were sons of Jeduthan, also called Ethan (1 Chron. xv. 17), a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 28); and fourteen were sons of Haman, a descendant of Kohath (1 Chron. vi. 18). Each of these chiefs had eleven assistant masters from his own sons and brothers, thus making together 288 (1 Chron. xxv. 7). Hence, when these are deducted from the 4000, there remain for each band consisting of twelve chief musicians, 154 or 155 subordinate musicians. As twelve musicians were required to be present at the daily morning and evening service, thus demanding 168 to be on duty every week, the twenty-four courses which relieved each other in hebdomadal rotation must have consisted of 4032, and 4000 given by the chronicler is simply to be regarded as a round number. Of this class, therefore, as of the former, each individual had to serve two weeks during the year.

c. The third class also consisted of 4000. They were the gate-keepers (πυλῆται, שְׁוֹרְטִים, 1 Chron. xxvi. 1-19), and as such bore arms (ibid. ix. 19; 2 Chron. xxxi. 2). They had to open and shut the gates, to keep strangers and excommunicated or unclean persons from entering the courts, and to guard the storehouse, the temple, and its courts, at night. They, too, were subdivided into twenty-four courses, and were headed by twenty-four chiefs from the three great families of Levi; seven were sons of Meshelmiah, a descendant of Kohath; thirteen were from Obededom, a descendant of Gershon; and four were sons of Hosah, a descendant of Merari. These three families, including the twenty-four chiefs, consisted of ninety-three members, who, together with the three heads of the families, viz., Meshelmiah, Obededom, and Hosah, made ninety-six, thus yielding four chiefs for each course. We thus obtain a watch-course every week of 162 or 163 persons, under the command of four superior watches, one of whom was the commander-in-chief. As twenty-four sentinel posts are assigned to these guards, thus making 168 a week, it appears that each person only served one day in the week (1 Chron. xxvi.)

d. The fourth class consisted of 6000 who were appointed for outward affairs (הַמְלָאכָה הַחִיצוֹנָה), as scribes and judges (1 Chron. xxvi. 29-32), in contradistinction to the work connected with the service of the sanctuary. It appears that this class was subdivided into three sections; Chenaniah and his sons were for the outward business of Israel (1 Chron. xxvi. 29); Hashabiah of Hebron and his brethren, numbering 1700, were officers west of Jordan, 'in all the business of the Lord and in the service of the king' (ver. 30); whilst Jerijah, also of Hebron, and his brethren, numbering 2700 active men, were rulers east of Jordan, 'for every matter pertaining to God and affairs of the king' (vers. 31, 32). It will thus be seen that this class consisted of Kohathites, being descendants of Izhar and Hebron.

This reorganisation effected by David, we are told, was adopted by his son Solomon when the Temple was completed (2 Chron. viii. 14, etc.). After the division of the kingdom, the Levites resident in the territory of the ten tribes had to emigrate into the land of Judah, in consequence of their refusing to take part in the illegitimate provincial worship established by Jeroboam (2 Chron. xi. 13, 14; xiii. 9); and though comparatively little is recorded of them in the annals of the kingdom of Judah, yet we find Levitical musicians accompanying Jehoshaphat in his journey (ibid. xx. 19, etc.). The Levites were sent out by the same monarch as teachers and judges of the people (ibid. xix. 8-10); they took part in the counter-revolution effected by Jehoiadah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1-11); in restoring the temple to its former stateliness under Joash (ibid. xxiv. 5); in cleansing and repairing the sanctuary under Hezekiah (ibid. xxix. 12-15); and regained their tithes under Ahaz, where we also hear of their old classification (ibid. xxxi. 4-17). In the reign of Josiah they are still mentioned as 'the teachers of all Israel,' and the singers are found 'in their place according to the commandment of David' (2 Chron. xxxv. 3, 15). During the Egyptian and Chaldaean invasions, however, and in the last days of the kingdom of Judah, the Levites apostatised from the God of their fathers, and shared in the idolatry of the people, as is seen from the denunciations of the prophet Ezekiel (xliv. 10-14; xlviii. 11).

III. The post-exile Period.—The apostasy of the Levites before the exile, and their rites of idolatry, which they carried with them into captivity, made them amalgamate with the heathen, and greatly diminished their number. Hence, amongst the body of returning exiles under Zerubbabel, which numbered 4289 priests, there were, according to Ezra ii. 40-42, only 341 Levites, of whom 74 belonged to the first class, i.e., to those who were appointed over the work of the temple; 128 to the second class, or to the singers; and 139 to the third class, or gate-keepers: whilst, according to Neh. vii. 43-45, there were 360, as follows—74 of those who were appointed over the work of the temple, 148 singers, and 138 gate-keepers. Still more marked is the paucity of their number in the second return of the exiles under Ezra, when there were only 38 Levites to be found, and their place had to be filled up by 220 Nethinim (Ezra vii. 7; viii. 15, 20). Tradition tells us that Ezra was so displeased with the conduct of the Levites that, as a punishment, he deprived them of their tithes, and gave them to the priests (comp. Bartenora On Sota, ix. 10). Those, however, that did return, resumed their functions as they were anciently assigned to the respective classes. How strictly these duties were enforced, and how severely any neglect in performing them was punished, may be gathered from the following description in the Mishna: 'The Levites had to guard twenty-four places, five were stationed at the five gates of the Mountain of the House (שַׁעַר הַר הַבְּרִית), four at the four corners inside, five at the five gates of the outer court, four at its four corners inside, one at the sacrificial storehouse, one at the curtain depositary, and one behind the holy of holies. The inspector of the mountain of the house went round through all the guards [every night] with burning torches before him. If the guard did not immediately stand up, the inspector of the Mountain of the House called out to him, 'Peace be with thee!' and if he perceived that he was asleep, he struck him with his stick, and even had the liberty of setting his garments on fire; and when it was asked, 'What is that noise in the court?' they were told it is the noise of a Levite who is beaten, or whose clothes have been burnt, because he slept when on duty' (Midoth, i. 1, 2). It is thought that allusion is made to the fact in the Apocalypse, when it is said 'Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments' (Rev. xvi. 15). As for the Levites who were the singers, they were summoned by the blast of the trumpet after the incense was kindled upon the altar, when they assembled from all parts of the spacious Temple at the orchestra which was joined to the fifteen steps at the entrance from the women's outer court to the men's outer court. They sung Psalms in antiphonies, accompanied by three musical instruments—the harp, the cithern, and cimbals—whilst the priests were pouring out on the altar the libation of wine. On Sunday they sung Ps. xxiv., on Monday Ps. xlviii., on Tuesday Ps. lxxxii., on Wednesday Ps. xciv., on Thursday Ps. lxxxi., on Friday Ps. xciii., and on the Sabbath Ps. xcii. Each of these Psalms was sung in nine sections, with eight pauses (פְּרָקִים), and at each pause the priests blew trombones, when the whole congregation fell down every time worshipping on their faces (Tamid vii. 3, 4).

The Levites had no prescribed canonical dress like the priests, as may be seen from the fact which Josephus narrates, that the singers requested Agrippa 'to assemble the Sanhedrim, in order to obtain leave for them to wear linen garments like the priests . . . contrary to the laws' (Antiq. xx. 9. 6). But though they wore no official garments at the service, yet the Talmud says that they ordinarily wore a linen outer-garment with sleeves, and a head-dress; and on journeys were provided with a staff, a pocket, and a copy of the Pentateuch (Ioma 122, a). Some modifications were at this period introduced in what was considered the necessary qualification for service. The Mosaic law, it will be remembered, regarded age as the only qualification, and freed the Levite from his duties when he was fifty years old; now that singing constituted so essential a part of the Levitical duties, any Levite who had not a good voice was regarded as disqualified, and if it continued good and melodious, he was retained in service all his lifetime, irrespective of age, but if it failed he was removed from that class which constituted the choristers to the gate-keepers (Maimonides, Hilchoth Kede Ha-Kodesh, iii. 8). During the period of mourning a Levite was exempt from his duties in the Temple.

Though the destruction of the Temple and the dispersion of the Jews have necessarily done away with the Levitical duties which were strictly local, yet the Levites, like the priests, still exist, have to this day certain functions to perform, and continue to enjoy certain privileges and immunities. On those festivals whereon the priests pronounce the benediction on the congregation of Israel during the morning service, as prescribed in Num. vi. 22-27, the Levites have 'to wait on the priests,' and wash their hands prior to the giving of the said blessing. At the reading of the Law in the synagogue, the Levite is called to the second section, the first being assigned to the priest [HAPHTARA]. Moreover, like the priests, the Levites are exempt from redeeming their first-born, and this exemption even extends to women of the tribe of Levi who marry Israelites, i.e., Jews of any other tribe.

LEVITICUS, in the Hebrew canon, is called שְׁפָטִים, and is the third book of Moses.

CONTENTS.—Leviticus contains the further statement and development of the Sinaitic legislation, the beginnings of which are described in Exodus. It exhibits the HISTORICAL progress of this legislation; consequently we must not expect to find the laws detailed in it in a systematic form. There is, nevertheless, a certain order observed, which arose from the nature of the subject, and of which the plan may easily be perceived. The whole is intimately connected with the contents of Exodus, at the conclusion of which book that sanctuary is described with which all external worship was connected (Exod. xxxv.-xl.) Leviticus begins by describing the worship itself. First are stated the laws concerning sacrifices (ch. i.-vii.) In this section is first described the general QUALITY of the sacrifices, which are divided into BLOODY and UNBLOODY; secondly, their AIM and OBJECT, according to which they are either THANK-OFFERINGS or SIN-OFFERINGS; and lastly, the TIME, PLACE, and MANNER in which they should be made.

Then follows a description of the manner in which Aaron and his sons were consecrated as priests, and how, by the manifestation of the divine glory, they were ordained to be mediators between God and his people (ch. viii., ix.) As formerly the ingratitude of the people had been severely punished (Exod. xxxii. seq.) so now the disobedience of the priests was visited with signal marks of the divine displeasure (Lev. x.) On this occasion were given several laws concerning the requisites of the sacerdotal office.

The theocratical sanctity of the nation was intimately connected with the existence of the sanctuary. Every subject, indeed, connected with the sanctuary was intended to uphold a strict separation between HOLY and UNHOLY things. The whole theocratical life was based on a strict separation of things UNCLEAN from things CLEAN, which alone were offered to God and might approach the sanctuary. The whole creation, and especially all animal life, should, like man himself, bear testimony to the defilement resulting from sin, and to its opposite, viz., the holiness of the Lord (ch. xi.-xv.)

The great feast of atonement formed, as it were, the central point of the national sanctity, this feast being appointed to reconcile the whole people to God, and to purify the sanctuary itself. All preceding institutions, all sacrifices and purifications, receive their completion in the great feast of Israel's atonement (ch. xvi.)

Thus we have seen that the sanctuary was made the POSITIVE central point of the whole nation, or of national holiness; but it was to be inculcated NEGATIVELY also, that all worship should be connected with the sanctuary, and that no sacrifices should be offered elsewhere, lest any pagan abuses should thereby strike root again (ch. xvii.)

The danger of deserting Jehovah and his worship would be increased after the conquest of Canaan, when the Israelites should inhabit a country surrounded by pagans. The following chapters (xviii.-xx.) refer to the very important relation in which Israel stood to the surrounding tribes, and the positive motive for separating them from all other nations; to the necessity of extirpating the Canaanites; and to the whole position which the people of the Lord should occupy with reference to paganism. Chapter xviii. begins with the description of those crimes into which the people might easily be misled by the influence of their pagan neighbours, viz., fornication, contempt of parents, idolatry, etc.

The priests were specially appointed to lead the nation by their good example scrupulously to avoid everything pagan and unclean, and thus to testify their faithful allegiance to Jehovah (ch. xxi.-xxii. 16). It is particularly inculcated that the sacrifices should be without blemish; and this is made a means of separating the Israelites from all pagan associations and customs (ch. xxii. 17-33). But the strongest bulwark erected against pagan encroachments was the appointment of solemn religious meetings, in which the attention of the people was directed to the central point of national religion, and which theocratically consecrated their whole proceedings to the worship of God. This was the object of the laws relating to fasts (ch. xxiii.) These laws divided the year into sacred sections, and gave to agricultural life its bearing upon the history of the works of God, and its peculiarly theocratic character, in contradistinction to all pagan worship, which is merely bent upon the symbolisation of the vital powers of nature.

In ch. xxiv. 1-9 follows the law concerning the preparation of the sacred oil, and the due setting forth of the shew-bread. Although this is in connection with ch. xxii. 17, seq., it is nevertheless judiciously placed after ch. xxiii., because it refers to the agricultural relation of the Israelites to Jehovah stated in that chapter. The Mosaic legislation is throughout illustrated by facts, and its power and significance are exhibited in the manner in which it subdues all subjective arbitrary opposition. So the opposition of the law to paganism, and the evil consequences of every approach to pagans, are illustrated by the history of a man who sprang from a mixed marriage, who cursed Jehovah, and was stoned as Jehovah directed (ch. xxiv. 10-23).

The insertion of this fact in its chronological place slightly interrupts the order of the legal definitions. The laws concerning the Sabbath and the year of Jubilee, which follow it, are intimately connected with the laws which precede. For the Sabbatical law completes the declaration that Jehovah is the real proprietor and landlord of Canaan, to whom belong both the territory and its inhabitants; and whose right is opposed to all occupation of the country by heathens (ch. xxv.)

This section is concluded with the fundamental position of the law, viz., that Jehovah, the only true and living God, will bless his faithful people who heartily keep his law; and will curse all who despise him and transgress his law (ch. xxvi.)

might be considered to be the owners of the country, there appropriately follows the law concerning several possessions which were more exclusively consecrated to Jehovah, or which, like the first-born, belonged to him without being specially offered. The whole concludes with an appendix embracing the law concerning vows and tithes, with a manifest reference to the preceding parts of the legislation (ch. xxvii. 17-24).

AUTHENTICITY.—The arguments by which the unity of Leviticus has been attacked are very feeble. Some critics, however, such as De Wette, Gramberg, Vatke, and others, have strenuously endeavoured to prove that the laws contained in Leviticus originated in a period much later than is usually supposed. But the following observations sufficiently support their Mosaic origin, and show that the whole of Leviticus is historically genuine. The laws in ch. i.-vii. contain manifest vestiges of the Mosaic period. Here, as well as in Exodus, when the priests are mentioned, Aaron and his sons are named; as, for instance, in ch. i. 4, 7, 8, 11, etc. The tabernacle is the sanctuary, and no other place of worship is mentioned anywhere.

Expressions like the following constantly occur, לפני

or פתח אהל מועד, the door of the tabernacle of the congregation (ch. i. 3; iii. 8, 13, etc.)

The Israelites are always described as a congregation (ch. iv. 13, seq.), under the command of the זקני העדה, elders of the congregation (ch. iv. 15), or of a נשיא, ruler (ch. iv. 22). Everything has a reference to life in a camp, and that camp commanded by Moses (ch. iv. 12, 21; vi. 11; xiv. 8; xvi. 26, 28). A later writer could scarcely have placed himself so entirely in the times, and so completely adopted the modes of thinking of the age, of Moses; especially if, as has been asserted, these laws gradually sprung from the usages of the people, and were written down at a later period with the object of sanctioning them by the authority of Moses. They so entirely befit the Mosaic age, that, in order to adapt them to the requirements of any later period, they must have undergone some modification, accommodation, and a peculiar mode of interpretation. This inconvenience would have been avoided by a person who intended to forge laws in favour of the later modes of Levitical worship. A forger would have endeavoured to identify the past as much as possible with the present.

The section in ch. viii.-x. is said to have a mythical colouring. This assertion is grounded on the miracle narrated in ch. ix. 24. But what could have been the inducement to forge this section? It is said that the priests invented it in order to support the authority of the sacerdotal caste by the solemn ceremony of Aaron's consecration. But to such an intention the narration of the crime committed by Nadab and Abihu is strikingly opposed. Even Aaron himself here appears to be rather remiss in the observance of the law (comp. x. 16, seq., with iv. 22, seq.) Hence it would seem that the forgery arose from an opposite or anti-hierarchical tendency. The fiction would thus appear to have been contrived without any motive which could account for its origin.

In ch. xvii. occurs the law which forbids the slaughter of any beast except at the sanctuary. This law could not be strictly kept in Palestine, and had therefore to undergo some modification (Deut. xii.) Our opponents cannot shew any rational inducement for contriving such a fiction. The law (ch. xvii. 6, 7) is adapted to the nation only while emigrating from Egypt. It was the object of this law to guard the Israelites from falling into the temptation to imitate the Egyptian rites and sacrifices offered to he-goats, שְׂעִירִים; which word signifies also demons represented under the form of he-goats, and which were supposed to inhabit the desert (comp. Jablonsky, Pantheon Aegyptiacum, i. 272, seq.)

The laws concerning food and purifications appear especially important if we remember that the people emigrated from Egypt. The fundamental principle of these laws is undoubtedly Mosaic, but in the individual application of them there is much which strongly reminds us of Egypt. This is also the case in Lev. xviii., seq., where the lawgiver has manifestly in view the two opposites, Canaan and Egypt. That the lawgiver was intimately acquainted with Egypt, is proved by such remarks as those about the Egyptian marriages with sisters (ch. xviii. 3); a custom which stands as an exception among the prevailing habits of antiquity (Diodorus Siculus, i. 27; Pausanias, Attica, i. 7).

The book of Leviticus has a prophetic character. The lawgiver represents to himself the future history of his people. This prophetic character is especially manifest in chs. xxv., xxvi., where the law appears in a truly sublime and divine attitude, and when its predictions refer to the whole futurity of the nation. It is impossible to say that these were vaticinia ex eventu, unless we would assert that this book was written at the close of Israelitish history. We must rather grant that passages like this are the real basis on which the authority of later prophets is chiefly built. Such passages prove also, in a striking manner, that the lawgiver had not merely an external aim, but that his law had a deeper purpose, which was clearly understood by Moses himself. That purpose was to regulate the national life in all its bearings, and to consecrate the whole nation to God. See especially ch. xxv. 18, seq.

But this ideal tendency of the law does not preclude its applicability to matters of fact. The law had not merely an ideal, but also a real character, evidenced by its relation to the faithlessness and disobedience of the nation. The whole future history of the covenant people was regulated by the law, which has manifested its eternal power and truth in the history of the people of Israel. Although this section has a general bearing, it is nevertheless manifest that it originated in the times of Moses. At a later period, for instance, it would have been impracticable to promulgate the law concerning the Sabbath and the year of Jubilee: for it was soon sufficiently proved how far the nation in reality remained behind the ideal Israel of the law. The Sabbatical law bears the impress of a time when the whole legislation, in its fulness and glory, was directly communicated to the people, in such a manner as to attract, penetrate, and command.

The principal works to be consulted with reference to Leviticus will be found under the article PENTATEUCH.—H. A. C. H.

LEYDEKKER (MELCHIOR) was born at Middleburg in Holland, in the year 1642. From 1679 to his death in 1721, he zealously discharged his duties of professor of divinity at Utrecht, in defence of the Reformed Religion against all comers. The Cartesian philosophy, the theology of Cocceius, the writings of Drusius, and the Lutheran tendencies of Hermann Witsius, were all in their turn objects of his strenuous opposition. His polemical temper, which produced many works unsuitable for mention here, characterised even his great archæological treatise, which entitles him to a place in our Cyclopædia. This work, entitled De Republica Hebræorum, was published at Amsterdam in 1704 in a thick folio volume, and is one of the largest repertoires ever written on the wide subject of Hebrew antiquities. In his treatment of it the author has exhibited vast stores of Scriptural, Rabbinical, and historical learning. It adds to the interest of the subject that his dissertations on the Hebrew laws and customs, both political and religious, are inwoven in an historical narrative, in which the Sacred History is developed, by epochs, from the earliest period to the latest. The author in his progress learnedly investigates the history, pari passu, of the leading Gentile nations, very much after the manner of Shuckford and Russell, in their Connections. This valuable work, on which Leydekker's fame deserves mainly to depend, is singularly enough ignored in Schweizer's sketch of the author (Herzog's Real-Encykl., viii. 360, 361). Leydekker's academical duties recalled his attention from polemical and clerical pursuits to the Biblical studies which his early years had been devoted to. At the age of seventeen he had made considerable advance in Rabbinical literature under the guidance of a learned Rabbi. He found no difficulty therefore in after-life in turning his attention to his youthful studies. Attempting to fit the works of Godwin (Moses and Aaron) and Cunæus (De Republica Hebr.) to his academical purposes, he soon discovered their insufficiency. To this discovery we owe his own more copious treatise, which is everywhere marked by a vigorous and independent judgment. While he conceals not his aversion to the 'futilities' of the Talmud, he quotes the great Rabbins with respect. He moreover keeps a sharp eye on the extravagancies of Christian writers, and his work censures with even-handed justice the well-known Rabbinism of the Buxtorffs and the Egyptism of our Spencer (De legibus Hebr.). It is only characteristic of this unsparing criticism of the orthodox author, that he adds an appendix of severe animadversion against the cosmogony of our Thomas Burnet, to whose Theoria telluris he prefixes the predicate profana. The six dissertations of this appendix, whatever may be thought of the author's views, are valuable for their learning, and interesting as closely bearing on the questions now raised on the Mosaic cosmogony.—P. LIBANUS. [LEBANON.]

LIBERTINES (Λιβερτινοί). 'Certain of the synagogue, which is called (the synagogue) of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians,' etc., are mentioned in Acts vi. 9. There has been much diversity in the interpretation of this word. Since Libertini here occurs among the names of nations, and Josephus (Antiq. xii. 1, and Cont.

Apion. ii. 4) has told us that many Jews were removed by Ptolemy, and placed in the cities of Libya; Beza, Le Clerc, and others conclude that the word must have been Λιβερτινῶν, i. e., 'sprung from Libya.' But there is no authority of MSS. or versions for this reading. Others, on the same premises, conceive that the word Libertini denotes the inhabitants of some town called Libertum, in Africa Proper, or Carthage; but they fail to show that any town of this name existed in that quarter. The most probable opinion, and that which is now generally entertained, is, that the Libertini were Jews, whom the Romans had taken in war and conveyed to Rome, but afterwards freed; and that this synagogue had been built at their expense. Libertini is, therefore, to be regarded as a word of Roman origin, and to be explained with reference to Roman customs. We know that there were in the time of Tiberius many libertini, or 'freed-men,' of the Jewish religion at Rome (Tacit. Annal. ii. 85; comp. Suet. Tib. 36; and Philo, Leg. ad Cæsar., p. 1014; see Bloomfield, Alford, Kuinoel, Wetstein, etc., on Acts vi. 9; and comp. Gerdes, De Synag. Libertinorum, Gron. 1736; Scherer, De Synag. Libertin., Argent. 1754).—J. K.

LIBNAH (לִבְנָה, 'whiteness'; Λεβωνά, in Num. xxxiii. 20; Λεβνά and Λοβνά; Alex. Λεβυνά and Λουνά; Libna, Lobna). 1. A station of the Israelites in the desert, the third in order after Hazeroth as enumerated in Num. xxxiii. 20. The site is unknown.

2. An ancient royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. xii. 15), situated in the plain of Philistia (xv. 42), between Makkedah and Lachish (x. 29). Libnah was one of the cities captured by Joshua after the defeat of the confederate kings at Gibeon. Makkedah was the first fenced city taken; from it he marched on Libnah, and from Libnah on Lachish. Consequently, Libnah stood in the plain, to the north-west of Lachish (Josh. x. 28, seq.) It was given to Judah and assigned to the Levites (xxi. 13). It revolted in the days of King Joram, apparently at the instigation of the Edomites, who were then extending their conquests over the southern borders of Palestine (2 Kings viii. 20, seq.) The city was besieged by Sennacherib during his great expedition against Israel; and it was while his army was encamped before it that the 'angel of the Lord went forth and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand' (Is. xxxvii. 8-36; 2 Kings xix. 8, seq.) We hear no more of it in Scripture, except the incidental note that Zedekiah's mother was a native of that place (Jer. lii. 1). Eusebius and Jerome seem to have known the site, for they say, 'it is now a village in the province of Eleutheropolis, and called Lobona' (Onomast., s. v. Lebna). The name has disappeared. The writer of this article traversed the whole of that region, but could hear of no name that would suggest identity. Libnah doubtless occupied a site naturally strong, like all the primitive cities of the Canaanites. The suggestion of Van de Velde is therefore of some weight, that it stood on the conspicuous isolated hill called 'Arak el-Menshieh, five miles west of Eleutheropolis, and on the direct route from Makkedah to Eglon. There is a little village on the hill, and there are some ruins, showing that it was once a place of strength (Van de Velde, Memoir, 330; Handbk. 260).—J. L. P.

LIBNATH. [SHIHOR-LIBNATH.]

LIBNEH (לִבְנֶה) occurs in two places of Scripture, viz. Gen. xxx. 37; Hosea iv. 13, and is supposed to indicate either the white poplar or the storax tree.

Libneh, in the passage of Hosea, is translated λεύκη, 'white poplar,' in the Septuagint, and this translation is adopted by the majority of interpreters. The Hebrew name libneh, being supposed to be derived from לָבֵן (album esse), has been considered identical with the Greek λεύκη, which both signifies 'white,' and also the 'white poplar,' Populus alba. This poplar is said to be called white, not on account of the whiteness of its bark, but of that of the under surface of its leaves. It may perhaps be so designated from the whiteness of its hairy seeds, which have a remarkable appearance when the seed-covering first bursts. The poplar is certainly common in the countries where the scenes are laid of the transactions related in the above passages of Scripture (Belon, Obs. ii. 106). Rauwolf mentions the white poplar as abundant about Aleppo and Tripoli, and still called by the ancient Arabic name haur or hor (حور), which is the word used in the Arabic translation of Hosea. That poplars are common in Syria has already been mentioned under the head of BACA.

Others, however, have been of opinion that libneh denotes the storax tree rather than the white poplar. Thus, in Gen. xxx. 37, the Septuagint has ῥαβδὸν styracīνην, 'a rod of styrax;' and the Greek translation of the Pentateuch, according to Rosenmüller, is more ancient and of far greater authority than that of Hosea. So R. Jonah, as translated by Celsius, says of libneh, Dicitur lingua Arabum Lubna; and in the Arabic translation of Genesis (لُبْنِي) lubne is employed as the representative of the Hebrew libneh. Lubne, both in Arabic and in Persian, is the name of a tree, and of the fragrant resin employed for fumigating, which exudes from it, and which is commonly known by the name of Storax. This resin was well known to the ancients, and is mentioned by Hippocrates and Theophrastus. Dioscorides describes several kinds, all of which were obtained from Asia

Minor; and all that is now imported is believed to be the produce of that country. But the tree is cultivated in the south of Europe, though it does not there yield any storax. It is found in Greece, and is supposed to be a native of Asia Minor, whence it extends into Syria, and probably farther south. It is therefore a native of the country which was the scene of the transaction related in the above passage of Genesis.

From the description of Dioscorides, and his comparing the leaves of the styrax to those of the quince, there is no doubt of the same tree being intended: especially as in early times, as at the present day, it yielded a highly fragrant balsamic substance which was esteemed as a medicine, and employed in fumigation. From the similarity of the Hebrew name libneh to the Arabic lubne, and from the Septuagint having in Genesis translated the former by styrax, it seems most probable that this was the tree intended. It is capable of yielding white wands as well as the poplar; and it is also well qualified to afford complete shade under its ample foliage, as in the passage of Hosea iv. 13. We may also suppose it to have been more particularly alluded to from its being a tree yielding incense. 'They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under the terebinth and the storax trees, because the shadow thereof is good.'—J. F. R.

LIBYA (In Ezek. xxx. 5, and xxxviii. 5, לִיָּבָי; Albues; Libyes; in Acts ii. 10, Λιβύη). For Libya of the O. T., see PHUT; and for Libya of the N. T., see LUBIM.

LIBYANS (In Jer. xli. 9, לִיָּבָי; in Dan. xi. 43, לִיָּבָי). It would have prevented much obscurity had uniformity been observed in rendering the proper names in our noble English Version of the Bible. We find the same Hebrew name לִיָּבָי (Libai) rendered 'Phut' in Gen. x. 6, and Ezek. xxvii. 10; 'Put' in 1 Chron. i. 8, and Nahum iii. 9; 'Libyans' in Jer. xli. 9; and 'Libya' in Ezek. xxx. 5, and xxxviii. 5. (For all these, see art. PHUT.)

Again, we find the name לִיָּבָי (Lubim) rendered 'Libyans' in Dan. xi. 43; while the full form of the same word, לִיָּבָיִם (Lubim), is rendered 'Lubims' in 2 Chron. xii. 3, and xvi. 8; and 'Lubim' in Nahum iii. 9. (For these, see art. LUBIM.)

The 'Libyans' of Jer. xli. 9, and the 'Libya' of Ezek. xxx. 5, are totally distinct from the 'Libyans' of Dan. xi. 43; while the latter are doubtless identical with the Lubim. Our translators have been too much influenced by the Vulgate and Septuagint in these cases.—J. L. P.

LICE. [KINIM.]

LIGHT is represented in the Scriptures as the immediate result and offspring of a divine command (Gen. i. 3). The earth was void and dark, when God said, 'Let light be, and light was.' This is represented as having preceded the placing of 'lights in the firmament of heaven, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also' (Gen. i. 14, seq.) Whatever opinion may be entertained as to the facility with which these two separate acts may be reconciled, it cannot be questioned that the origin of light, as of every other part of the universe, is thus referred to the exertion of the divine will : as little can it be denied that the narrative in the original is so simple, yet at the same time so majestic and impressive, both in thought and diction, as to fill the heart with a lofty and pleasurable sentiment of awe and wonder.

The divine origin of light made the subject one of special interest to the Biblical nations—the rather because light in the East has a clearness, a brilliancy, is accompanied by an intensity of heat, and is followed in its influence by a largeness of good, of which the inhabitants of less genial climes can have no conception. Light easily and naturally became, in consequence, with Orientals, a representative of the highest human good. All the more joyous emotions of the mind, all the pleasing sensations of the frame, all the happy hours of domestic intercourse, were described under imagery derived from light (1 Kings xi. 36; Is. lviii. 8; Esther viii. 16; Ps. xcvi. 11). The transition was natural from earthly to heavenly, from corporeal to spiritual things; and so light came to typify true religion and the felicity which it imparts. But as light not only came from God, but also makes man's way clear before him, so it was employed to signify moral truth, and pre-eminently that divine system of truth which is set forth in the Bible, from its earliest gleamings onward to the perfect day of the Great Sun of Righteousness. The application of the term to religious topics had the greater propriety because the light in the world, being accompanied by heat, purifies, quickens, enriches; which effects it is the peculiar province of true religion to produce in the human soul (Is. viii. 20; Matt. iv. 16; Ps. cxix. 105; 2 Pet. i. 19; Eph. v. 8; 2 Tim. i. 10; 1 Pet. ii. 9).

It is doubtless owing to the special providence under which the divine lessons of the Bible were delivered, that the views which the Hebrews took on this subject, while they were high and worthy, did not pass into superstition, and so cease to be truly religious. Other Eastern nations beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and their hearts were secretly enticed, and their mouth kissed their hand in token of adoration (Job xxxi. 26, 27). This 'iniquity' the Hebrews not only avoided, but when they considered the heavens they recognised the work of God's fingers, and learnt a lesson of humility as well as of reverence (Ps. viii. 3, seq.) On the contrary, the entire residue of the East, with scarcely any exception, worshipped the sun and the light, primarily perhaps as symbols of divine power and goodness, but, in a more degenerate state, as themselves divine; whence, in conjunction with darkness, the negation of light, arose the doctrine of dualism—two principles, the one of light, the good power; the other of darkness, the evil power: a corruption which rose and spread the more easily because the whole of human life, being a chequered scene, seems divided as between two conflicting agencies, the bright and the dark, the joyous and the sorrowful, what is called prosperous and what is called adverse.

When the tendency to corruption to which we have just alluded is taken into account, we cannot but feel both gratified and surprised that, while the Hebrew people employed the boldest personifications when speaking of light, they in no case, nor in any degree, fell into the almost universal idolatry. That individuals among them, and even large portions of the nation, did from time to time down to the Babylonish captivity forget and desert the living God, is very certain; but then the nation, as such, was not misled and corrupted; witnesses to the truth never failed; recovery was never impossible—nay, was more than once effected; till at last affliction and suffering brought a changed heart, which never again swerved from the way of truth.

Among the personifications on this point which Scripture presents we may specify—1. God. The Apostle James (i. 17) declares that 'every good and perfect gift cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning;' obviously referring to the faithfulness of God and the constancy of his goodness, which shine on undimmed and unshadowed. So Paul (1 Tim. vi. 16): 'God who dwelleth in the light which no man can approach unto.' Here the idea intended by the imagery is the incomprehensibility of the self-existent and eternal God.

2. Light is also applied to Christ: 'The people who sat in darkness have seen a great light' (Matt. iv. 16; Luke ii. 32); 'The light of men'; 'He was the true light'; 'I am the light of the world' (John i. 4, seq.; viii. 12; xii. 35, 36).

3. It is further used of angels, as in 2 Cor. xii. 14: 'Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light.' 4. Light is moreover employed of men: John the Baptist 'was a burning and a shining light' (John v. 35); 'Ye are the light of the world' (Matt. v. 14; see also Acts xiii. 47; Eph. v. 8).—J. R. B.

LIGHTFOOT, JOHN, was born at Stoke-upon-Trent in the year 1602. He was early imbued with the elements of sound learning. He was educated first at a grammar school at Morton Green, in Cheshire, and afterwards at Cambridge. He was remarkable both at Cambridge, and afterwards as assistant at the well-known school of Repton in Derbyshire, for his 'pregnant wit,' his proficiency and continued improvement in Greek and Latin, and his amiable disposition; but it was not till he had taken orders, and settled at Norton-under-Hales, in Staffordshire, that he began that acquaintance with Hebrew which ripened into the most familiar and consummate knowledge of the whole range of Biblical and Rabbinical literature. He was first led to embrace this line of study by the friendly recommendation and example of Sir Rowland Cotton, a pious and learned country gentleman, who resided at Bellaport, in the neighbourhood, and took Lightfoot into his house as his chaplain. Lightfoot continued with Sir Rowland Cotton till the latter left Bellaport for London, after which he settled on a sphere of ministerial labour at Stone, in Staffordshire, where he continued for two years, and married at the age of twenty-six. From Stone he removed to Hornsey, in order to be near the library of Sion College, and from thence to the rectory of Ashford, in Staffordshire, which was presented to him by his worthy friend Sir Rowland Cotton. Here, that he might devote himself more uninterruptedly to his learned labours, he bought a piece of ground not far from his parsonage, and built upon it a small house, with a study below and a sleeping-room above, where he spent most of his time, visiting his family once a day, for the single meal to which he restricted himself. And here he remained in the quiet discharge of his professional duties during the turbulent years which led to the death of Charles I., the establishment of the Commonwealth, and the temporary subversion of the Church of England. Lightfoot was one of those good men who, in those days of trouble and uncertainty, thought it best to follow the course of events; and it was natural for those in power to seek the assistance of his learning and soundness of mind in framing a new religious system for the country. Thus he became one of the assembly of divines at Westminster (1643), where his solid learning and independent spirit was often the corrective of crude and hasty deductions drawn from fanciful interpretations of Holy Scripture. While in London, he was the minister of St. Bartholomew's, behind the Exchange, where he felt himself to be in a kind of 'exile from his own,' but was soon rewarded for his services in the assembly of divines by the gift of the rectory of Great Munden, in Hertfordshire, and was appointed in the same year to the mastership of Catherine Hall at Cambridge. He became D.D. in 1652, and was vice-chancellor of the University in 1653. The living of Great Munden is in the gift of the Crown, and had been given successively to two eminent divines by the Kings James and Charles. Lightfoot received it from the Parliament, and Charles II. was no sooner restored than another person applied for and obtained the living. Lightfoot, on hearing this, acted with promptness and decision. Sheldon, then Bishop of London, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, and the munificent donor of the Sheldonian theatre to the University of Oxford, had been a devoted adherent to the Royal cause. Lightfoot, personally unknown to him, sought his presence, and so represented his claims, that Sheldon exerted himself actively in his favour, and procured his re-instatement in his living, as well as his confirmation in the mastership of Catherine Hall, which he had offered to resign. Through the influence of Sir Orlando Bridgeman he was appointed to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Ely, where he died peaceably, after a life full of labours, in the year 1675.

The idea with which Lightfoot commenced his learned labours was to produce one great and perfect work—a harmony of the four Evangelists, with a commentary, and prolegomena. But the little probability of his being able to publish at once so vast a work as he saw it would become, were he to carry out the idea in its completeness—in an age when brevity was essential to everything which issued from the press—determined him to give to the world from time to time the result of his labours, in separate treatises. The subject-matter of these treatises may be classed under the general heads of chronology, chorography, investigation of original texts and versions, examination of Rabbinical comments and paraphrases. We conclude with a list of Lightfoot's works, with the date of their original publication, where the date is stated in the work itself. Erubhin, or Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical, penned for recreation at vacant hours, dedicated to Sir Rowland Cotton, Hornsey 1629. A few and new Observations upon the Book of Genesis: The most of them certain, the rest probable, all harmless, strange, and rarely heard of before, 1642. Also an handful of gleanings out of the Book of Exodus, 1643. The Harmony of the Four Evangelists among themselves, and with the O. T. The first part: From the beginning of the Gospels to the baptism of our Saviour, with an explanation of the chiefest difficulties, both in language and sense, dated Westminster 1644. A Commentary upon the Acts of the Apostles, Chronical and Critical. The Difficulties of the Text explained, and the times of the story cast into Annals. The first part: From the beginning of the Book to the end of the Twelfth chapter, with a brief survey of the contemporary story of the Jews and Romans, 1645. The Harmony, etc. The second part: From the Baptism of our Saviour to the first Passover after, etc. No date. The Temple Service, as it stood in the days of our Saviour, described out of the Scriptures and the Eminentest Antiquities of the Jews, London 1649. The Harmony, etc. The third part: From the First Passover after our Saviour's Baptism to the second, etc. Dedication to William Cotton, Esq., Bellaport, dated Much-Mundon 1648. The Temple, especially as it stood in the days of our Saviour, dated Much-Mundon 1650. Hora Hebraica & Talmudica, Hebrew and Talmudic Exerci-tations, 1. Upon the Chorography of the Land of Israel; 2. Upon the Gospel of St. Matthew, 1658. Hora, etc., upon the Gospel of St. Mark. Together with a Chorographical Decad. Remarkable inscription 'to God and the King,' and Dedication to Gilbert, Bishop of London, 1661. Jewish and Talmudical Exerci-tations upon the Evangelist St. Luke, to which are premised some Chorographical notes. Dedication to Gilbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, undated. Jewish, etc., upon St. John, to which is premised a Chorographical inquiry, etc. Dedication to Sir Orlando Bridgeman, undated. Hora Hebraica, etc., Acts of the Apostles, and some Chapters of the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans. No dedication, preface, or date. Hora, etc., upon the First Epistle to the Corinthians, to which is added a discourse concerning what Bibles were used to be read in the religious Assemblies of the Jews. Dedication to Sir William Morice, knight, principal Secretary of State, 1664. Sermons on various occasions from 1655 to 1674. An edition of his collected works, with a preface by Dr. Bright, and a life by the editor, was published in 2 vols. folio, by John Strype, M.A., in 1684. Another edition, in folio, was published at Utrecht in 1699, another in London 1822-25, edited by Pitman, in 13 vols., and his Hora Hebraica & Talmudica at Oxford, edited by Rev. R. Gandell, in 4 vols., 1859. During the latter years of his life he contributed the most valuable assistance to the authors of Walton's Polyglott Bible, Castell's Heptaglot Lexicon, and Pool's Synopsis Criticorum.—M. H.

LIGN ALOES. [AHALIM.]

LIGURE. [LESHEM.]

LILITH (לִילִית), a term which occurs only once in Scripture (Is. xxxiv. 14). Derived from לָלַי, night, it means simply nocturnal; and, standing as it does in a list of animals, it must be regarded as either the name of some particular nocturnal creature, or as a generic name for such. The A. V. renders it by screech-owl, and this is the rendering adopted by most modern interpreters. Many, however, prefer following the example of Aquila and retaining the original word (so De Wette, Henderson, Zuntz, and the version of Joseph Athias in the Biblia Pentapla). The LXX. render the word by δρονέ-ταυρα, which is in keeping with their other renderings in this verse, all of which ascribe characters of monstrosity to the objects enumerated by the prophet. The Vulg. renders by Lamia, a word which has much the same meaning as our witch, but which was originally the name of a Libyan queen who, having lost her child, was said to prey on the children of others. These renderings are in accordance with Jewish superstition, which supposed the Lilith to be a female spectre that was wont to lie in wait, elegantly dressed, for children at night.

Some recent German interpreters have eagerly adopted this interpretation, and have compared the Jewish fable on which it is founded to the Arab tales of ghuls, and to the Greek belief in the Ἐμπύσσα (cf. Aristoph., Kan. 293, ff.; Philostr., vit.
Apollon. ii. 4; M. de Sainte Croix, Sur les mystères du Paganisme, i., p. 191, 2d ed.); but all this, besides being purely gratuitous, is opposed to the text of the prophet, who places the Lilith among animals, and who represents it as finding a place of rest in the desert, which is precisely what a spectre or a ghul never finds any more than the Hecatean Empusa. Bochart (Hieroz., i. vi., c. 9, ii. p. 831) seems inclined to account for the fabulous interpretation by calling attention to the representations given by the poets of the strix or screech-owl, as a woman who, under this guise, sought the cradles of infants by night (comp. Ovid, Fast. vi. 130, ff.)

LILY. [KRINON; SHOOSHAN.]

LIMBORCH, PHILIP A., was born at Amsterdam 19th June 1633, and died there 30th April 1717. He was a distinguished professor of theology among the Remonstrants, and in his Theologia Christiana is presented the clearest and ablest exposition of the theological views of that body extant. He published also Commentarius in Acta Apostolorum, et in Epistolas ad Romanos & He-braeos, fol., Roterd. 1711. This commentary, though written in the interest of the author's theological views, is deserving of attention for the good sense, clear thought, and acute reasoning by which it is pervaded.—W. L. A.

LIME (לִימָה; kolva; calx) was one of the few compacting substances made use of by the Jews.
It is first mentioned in Deut. xxvii. 1, 2, 3, 'where Moses with the elders of Israel commanded the people to set up great stones, and to plaster them with plaster;' a direction which has been variously interpreted. Some suppose that it simply implied that the plaster should be used as cement, joining the sides of the stones firmly together. The common opinion, however, and that which the text itself most obviously suggests, is that the surfaces of the stones were to be covered with plaster, and the law written or inscribed thereon. This is the opinion which the Jews themselves entertain. It is more than likely that the process was similar to that which the Jews had often seen used in Egypt for receiving bas-reliefs (Kitto's Pict. Bib.; Deut. xxvii. 2).

In Is. xxxiii. 12, the sudden and utter destruction of the 'people' (עַמִּי), or different races composing the Assyrian army, is compared to the 'burnings of lime,' a proof that the Jews were familiar with the use of the lime-kiln. The only other mention of lime in Scripture is in Amos ii. 1, where Moab is charged with the wanton violation of the tomb of one of the kings of Edom, inasmuch as 'he burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime,' to plaster his palace with, according to the interpretation suggested by the Targum and some of the Rabbins. A similar act of indignity is mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii. 16.—W. J. C.

LINEN. [BAD.]

LINTEL. The headpiece of a door frame, or window frame. In the A. V. three Hebrew words are thus rendered:—

(1.) לִיָּהּ (1 Kings vi. 31), translated 'post' in Ezek. xl., xli. A technical architectural term, of which the exact meaning, in our present ignorance of Semitic architecture, it is difficult to determine.
The LXX. [cod. Alex.] render it φλιατ in Kings, and in Ezekiel leave it untranslated; αλει (sometimes confounded with αλμα, A. V. 'arches') in which they are followed by the Chaldee and Syriac versions. It is omitted by the Vulgate in Kings, and in Ezekiel rendered 'frons.' Jarchi renders the word,
'a round column like a tree,' as if from לִיָּהּ = לִיָּהּ quercus; and Aquila, led astray by the resemblance of the volutes of the classical orders to rams' horns, κρωμα, לִיָּהּ elsewhere always meaning 'a ram.' The word, however, is probably connected with the obsolete root לָחַץ, and signifies a projecting architectural member, probably, according to Gesenius, the whole door-case, with its side-posts, lintel, threshold, and structural decorations. This sense would suit the passage in Kings, describing the entrance to the holy of holies (where Michaelis, Suppl., p. 70, would explain it of the triangular pediment above the doorway), as well as the passages in Ezekiel in which it is used in connection with a doorway, e.g., xl. 9, 21, etc.; xli. 3. In the plural, Gesenius considers that the word signifies projecting members along the front wall of a building ornamented with pillars or pilasters, with windows between (xl. 10, 14, 16; xli. 1). Ewald (Proph. des Alt. Bund., ii. 362) adopts the same view, rendering it 'Vorsprünge,' i.e., 'vorspringendes Mauerwerk.' So also Cocceius, 'projecturæ parietis in imo prominentis,' Böttcher (apud Rosenmüller, Schol., in loc.) very happily adopts the rendering 'antæ,' which appears to come as near to its meaning as any term derived from classical architecture can do.

(2.) לִיָּהּ, Amos ix. 1 (ἡ ἀσθήριον, LXX.;
cardo, Vulg.); Zeph. ii. 14 (φάρνυμα, LXX.; limen, Vulg.), in the margin 'chapter' or 'knop,' a rendering which is unquestionably more correct; the latter is adopted where the word occurs in the description of the golden candlestick, Exod. xxv.
31, etc. [KNOP]. Rosenmüller (Schol., in loc.), however, defends the rendering 'superliminare,' because the frieze over a doorway was often ornamented with carvings of the cups of flowers or fruit.

(3.) לִיָּהּ (Exod. xii. 22, 23); LXX. φλιαδ;
Vulg. superliminare, translated 'upper doorpost' (Exod. xii. 7). There is little doubt of the correctness of this rendering, the word being derived from לִיָּהּ, 'to overlay,' especially 'timber,' e.g., 1 Kings
vii. 5. Other meanings and derivations are given in Rosenmüller, Schol., in loc., e. g., that of Jarchi, who derives it from the Chaldee שָׁקַץ, 'to beat,' because the door when it shuts strikes the lintel, and Ibn Esra, who connects it with another meaning of the Hebrew root, 'to look down from above' (cf., Ps. xiv. 2; lxxxv. 12), and translates it 'window,' such as the Arabs have over their house doors. Bochart, adopting this view (p. 679), refers it to the lattice-work above the door through which those who knocked could be inspected.—E. V.

LINUS (Λῖνος), one of the Christians at Rome whose salutations Paul sent to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21). He is said to have been the first bishop of Rome after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul (Irenæus, Adv. Hæres. iii. 3; Euseb., Hist. Eccles. iii. 2, 4; v. 6).

LION (אַרִי ari; אַרְיֵה arjeh; Sept. λέων), the most powerful, daring, and impressive of all carnivorous animals, the most magnificent in aspect and awful in voice. Being very common in Syria in early times, the lion naturally supplied many forcible images to the poetical language of Scripture, and not a few historical incidents in its narratives. This is shewn by the great number of passages where this animal, in all the stages of existence—as the whelp, the young adult, the fully mature, the lioness—occurs under different names, exhibiting that multiplicity of denominations which always results when some great image is constantly present to the popular mind. Thus we have—1. גֹּר gor, a lion's whelp, a very young lion (Gen. xlix. 9; Deut. xxxiii. 20; Jer. li. 38; Ezek. xix. 2; Nahum ii. 11, 12, etc.). 2. כַּפִּיר chephir, a young lion, when first leaving the protection of the old pair to hunt independently (Ezek. xix. 2, 3; Ps. xci. 13; Prov. xix. 12, etc.). 3. אַרִי ari, an adult and vigorous lion, a lion having paired, vigilant and enterprising in search of prey (Nahum ii. 12; 2 Sam. xvii. 10; Num. xxiii. 24). This is the common name of the animal. 4. שָׂחַל sachal, a mature lion in full strength; a black lion? (Job iv. 10; x. 16; Ps. xci. 13; Prov. xxvi. 13; Hosea v. 14; xiii. 7). This denomination may very possibly refer to a distinct variety of lion, and not to a black species or race, because neither black nor white lions are recorded, excepting in Oppian (De Venat. iii. 43); but the term may be safely referred to the colour of the skin, not of the fur; for some lions have the former fair, and even rosy, while in other races it is perfectly black. An Asiatic lioness, formerly at Exeter Change, had the naked part of the nose, the roof of the mouth, and the bare soles of all the feet pure black, though the fur itself was very pale buff. Yet albinism and melanism are not uncommon in the felinæ; the former occurs in tigers, and the latter is frequent in leopards, panthers, and jaguars. 5. לַיִשׁ laisch, a fierce lion, one in a state of fury (Job iv. 11; Prov. xxx. 30; Is. xxx. 6). 6. לַבִּיָּא labia, a lioness (Job. iv. 11, where the lion's whelps are denominated 'the sons of Labiah,' or of the lioness).

The lion is the largest and most formidably armed of all carnassier animals, the Indian tiger alone claiming to be his equal. One full grown, of Asiatic race, weighs above 450 pounds, and those of Africa often above 500 pounds. The fall of a fore paw in striking has been estimated to be equal to twenty-five pounds' weight, and the grasp of the claws, cutting four inches in depth, is sufficiently powerful to break the vertebrae of an ox. The huge laniary teeth and jagged molars worked by powerful jaws, and the tongue entirely covered with horny papillæ, hard as a rasp, are all subservient to an immensely strong, muscular structure, capable of prodigious exertion, and minister to the self-confidence which these means of attack inspire. In Asia the lion rarely measures more than nine feet and a half from the nose to the end of the tail, though a tiger-skin of which we took the dimensions was but a trifle less than thirteen feet. In Africa they are considerably larger, and supplied with a much greater quantity of mane. Both tiger and lion are furnished with a small horny apex to the tail—a fact noticed by the ancients, but only verified of late years, because this object lies concealed in the hair of the tip and is very liable to drop off. All the varieties of the lion are spotted when whelps; but they become gradually buff or pale. One African variety, very large in size, perhaps a distinct species, has a peculiar and most ferocious physiognomy, a dense black mane extending half way down the back, and a black fringe along the abdomen and tip of the tail; while those of southern Persia and the Dekkan are nearly destitute of that defensive ornament. The roaring voice of the species is notorious to a proverb, but the warning cry of attack is short, snappish, and sharp.

If lions in primitive times were as numerous in Western Asia and Africa as tigers still are in some parts of India, they must have been a serious impediment to the extension of the human race; for Colonel Sykes relates that in less than five years, in the Dekkan alone, during his residence there, above 1000 of the latter were shot. But the counterbalancing distribution of endowments somewhat modifies the dangerous vicinity of these animals: like all the felinæ, they are more or less nocturnal, and seldom go abroad to pursue their prey till after sunset. When not pressed by hunger, they are naturally indolent, and, from their habits of uncontrolled superiority, perhaps capricious, but often less sanguinary and vindictive than is expected.

Lions are monogamous, the male living constantly with the lioness, both hunting together, or for each other when there is a litter of whelps; and the mutual affection and care for their offspring which they display are remarkable in animals by nature doomed to live by blood and slaughter. It is while seeking prey for their young that they are most dangerous; at other times they bear abstinence, and when pressed by hunger will sometimes feed on carcasses found dead. They live to more than fifty years; consequently, having annual litters of from three to five cubs, they multiply rapidly when not seriously opposed. After the conquest of Egypt by the Arabs the lion soon spread again into Lower Egypt; and Fidelio, a European traveller, in the beginning of the eighth century, saw one slain at the foot of the pyramids, after killing eight of his assailants. Later they have increased again on the Upper Nile; and in ancient times, when the devastations of Egyptian, Persian, Greek, and Roman armies passed over Palestine, there can be little doubt that these destroyers made their appearance in great numbers. The fact, indeed, is attested by the impression which their increase made upon the mixed heathen population of Samaria, when Israel was carried away into captivity (2 Kings xvii. 25, 26).

The Scriptures present many striking pictures of lions, touched with wonderful force and fidelity: even where the animal is a direct instrument of the Almighty, while true to his mission, he still remains so to his nature. Thus nothing can be more graphic than the record of the man of God (1 Kings xiii. 28), disobedient to his charge, struck down from his ass, and lying dead, while the lion stands by him, without touching the lifeless body, or attacking the living animal, usually a favourite prey. See also Gen. xlix. 9; Job iv. 10, 11; Nahum ii. 11, 12. Samson's adventure also with the young lion (Judg. xiv. 5, 6), and the picture of the young lion coming up from the underwood cover on the banks of the Jordan—all attest a perfect knowledge of the animal and its habits. Finally, the lions in the den with Daniel, miraculously leaving him unmolested, still retain, in all other respects, the real characteristics of their nature.

The lion, as an emblem of power, was symbolical of the tribe of Judah (Gen. xlix. 9). The type recurs in the prophetic visions, and the figure of this animal was among the few which the Hebrews admitted in sculpture, or in cast metal, as exemplified in the throne of Solomon. The heathen assumed the lion as an emblem of the sun, of the god of war, of Aries, Ariel, Arioth, Re, the Indian Seeva, of dominion in general, of valour, etc., and it occurs in the names and standards of many nations. Lions, in remote antiquity, appear to have been trained for the chase, and are, even now, occasionally domesticated with safety. Placability and attachment are displayed by them even to the degree of active defence of their friends, as was exemplified at Birr, in Ireland, in 1839, when 'a keeper of wild beasts, being within the den, had fallen accidentally upon a tiger, who immediately caught the man by the thigh, in the presence of numerous spectators; but a lion, being in the same compartment, rose up, and seizing the tiger by the neck, compelled it to let go, and the man was saved.' Numerous anecdotes of a similar character are recorded both by ancient and modern writers.

Zoologists consider Africa the primitive abode of lions, their progress towards the north and west having at one time extended to the forests of Macedonia and Greece; but in Asia, never to the south of the Nerbudda, nor east of the lower Ganges. Since the invention of gunpowder, and even since the havoc which the ostentatious barbarism of Roman grandees made among them, they have diminished in number exceedingly, although at the present day individuals are not unfrequently seen in Barbary, within a short distance of Ceuta.—C. LIPMANN, JOMTOB, of Muhlhausen, also called MUHLHAUSEN after his native place, and TABJOMI (טביומי = טוב יום), author of the celebrated polemical work against Christianity called Nitsachon (נצחון, Victory), flourished 1380. Very little is known of the history of this remarkable man. His contemporary Stephen, the learned Bishop of Brandeburg, who undertook to refute his work, says that he lived in Cracow, whilst others will have it that he lived in Prague. The Nitsachon, which was finished about 1399, consists of seven parts, 'according,' as he tells us, 'to the seven days of the week, and three hundred and fifty-four sections, according to the number of days in the lunar year, which is the Jewish mode of calculation to indicate that every Israelite is bound to study his religion every day of his life, and to remove every obstruction from the boundaries of his faith' (comp. the end of the preface). He does not adopt any systematic plan, but discusses and explains every passage of the Hebrew Bible which is either adduced by Christians as a Messianic prophecy referring to Christ, or is used by sceptics and blasphemers to support their scepticism and contempt for revelations, or is appealed to by rationalistic Jews to corroborate their rejection of the doctrine of creation out of nothing, the resurrection of the body, etc., etc., beginning with Genesis and ending with Chronicles, according to the order of the books in the Hebrew Bible, so that any passage in dispute might easily be found. It was largely transcribed and circulated in MS. among the Jews throughout the world; and in the numerous attacks which they had to sustain both from Christians and rationalists during the time of the Reformation, this book constituted their chief arsenal, supplying them with weapons to defend themselves. The copyists, however, not unfrequently made some additions of their own. The book, though so widely circulated among the Jews, was not printed till 1644, when Hacsplan published it under the following circumstances. This erudite professor in the Bavarian University at Altorf was engaged, about 1642, in a controversy on the questions at issue between Judaism and Christianity with a neighbouring rabbi residing in Shneitach, who in his dissertations frequently referred to this Nitsachon, a MS. copy of which, made in 1589, he possessed, and which he refused to show to his Christian opponent. The learned Hacsban, however, was determined to see it, and, according to a prearranged plan, called with three of his students on the rabbi, when he pressed him in such a manner to produce the MS. that he could not refuse. He pretended to examine it, and when the students had fairly surrounded the rabbi, the professor made his way to the door, got into a conveyance which was waiting for him, had the MS. speedily transcribed and printed, with extensive notes and an index, and then, after much earnest solicitation, returned it to the rabbi. This is the dastardly manner in which the Christian world first got to see the famous Nitzachon, and it needs hardly to be said that such disgraceful proceedings produced no favourable impression upon the mind of the rabbi whom the professor was anxious to bring over to Christianity. It was now rapidly reprinted, translated into Latin, corrected and refuted by Blendinger, Lipmanni Nitzachon in Christianos, etc., latine conversum, Altdorf 1645; Wagenseil, Tela ignea Satana, Altdorf 1681; by the same author, Sota, Liber Mischnicus de Uxore Adulterii Suspecta, Altdorf 1674, Appendix. The importance of this famous work to the Biblical student can hardly be overrated, inasmuch as it is a running commentary on all the most important Messianic prophecies and difficult portions of the Hebrew Bible. LITTER. The word translated litter in Is. lvi. 20, is ṭab; and is the same which, in Num. vii. 3, denotes the wains or carts drawn by oxen, in which the materials of the tabernacle were removed from place to place. The ṭab was not, therefore, a litter, which is not drawn, but carried. This is the only place in which the word occurs in the Authorized translation. We are not, however, to infer from this that the Hebrews had no vehicles of the kind. Litters, or palanquins, were, as we know, in use among the ancient Egyptians. They were borne upon the shoulders of men (No. 338), and appear to have been used for carrying persons of consideration short distances on visits, like the sedan-chairs of a former day in England. We doubt if the Hebrews had this kind of litter, as it scarcely agrees with their simple, unluxurious habits; but that they had litters borne by beasts, such as are still common in Western Asia, seems in the highest degree probable.

In Cant. iii. 9 we find the word אֶפְרוֹן aphiryon; Sept. ṓpeion; Vulg. ferculum, which occurs nowhere else in Scripture, and is applied to a vehicle used by king Solomon. This word is rendered 'chariot' in our A. V., although unlike any other word so rendered in that version. It literally means a moving couch, and is usually conceived to denote a kind of sedan, litter, or rather palanquin, in which great personages and women were borne from place to place. The name, as well as the object, immediately suggests that it may have

sians. It consists of a light frame fixed on two strong poles, like those of our sedan-chair. The frame is generally covered with cloth, and has a door, sometimes of lattice work, at each side. It is carried by two mules, one between the poles before, the other behind. These conveyances are used by great persons, when disposed for retirement or ease during a journey, or when sick, or feeble from age. But they are chiefly used by ladies of consideration in their journeys (No. 339).

339.

The popular illustrators of Scripture do not appear to have been acquainted with this and the other litters of Western Asia; and have, therefore, resorted to India, and drawn their illustrations from the palanquins borne by men, and from the howdahs of elephants. This is unnecessary, as Western Asia still supplies conveyances of this description more suitable and more likely to have been anciently in use, than any which the further east can produce. If the one already described should seem too humble, there are other takht-ravans of more imposing appearance. Some readers may remember the 'litter of red cloth, adorned with pearls and jewels,' together with ten mules (to bear it by turns), which king Zahr-Shah prepared for the journey of his daughter (Lane's Arab. Nights, i. 528). This was, doubtless, of the kind which is borne by four mules, two behind and two before. In Arabia, or in the countries where Arabian usages prevail, two camels are usually employed to bear the takht-ravan, and sometimes two horses. When borne by camels, the head of the hindmost of the animals is bent painfully down under the vehicle. This is the most comfortable kind of litter, and two light persons may travel in it.

The shibreeyeh is another kind of camel-litter, resembling the Indian howdah, by which name (or rather hoday) it is sometimes called. It is composed of a small square platform with a canopy or arched covering. It accommodates but one person, and is placed upon the back of a camel, and rests upon two square camel-chests, one on each side of the animal. It is very evident, not only from the text in view, but from others, that the Hebrews had litters; and there is little reason to doubt that they were the same as those now employed in Palestine, and the neighbouring countries, where there are still the same circumstances of climate, the same domestic animals, and habits of life.

LITURGY, ANCIENT HEBREW, [vol. iii. p. 906.]

LIVER (כִּבְדָּ) occurs in Exod. xxix. 13, 22; Lev. iii. 4, 10, 15; iv. 9; vii. 4; viii. 16, 25; ix. 10, 19; Prov. vii. 23; Lam. ii. 11; Ezek. xxi. 21. The Hebrew word is generally derived from כָּבַד, to be heavy, in reference to the weight of the liver as the heaviest of all the viscera, just as in English the lungs are called 'the lights,' from their comparative lightness. Gesenius, however, adduces the Arabic كبد, meaning, probably, 'the most precious,' which, indeed, suits the notions of the ancient Orientals, who esteemed the liver to be the most valuable of all the viscera, because they thought it most concerned in the formation of the blood, and held that 'in the blood is the life.' In all the instances where the word occurs in the Pentateuch, it forms part of the phrase הִיתָרַת עַל הַכֶּבֶד, or הִיתָרַת הַכֶּבֶד, translated in the A. V. 'the caul that is above the liver,' but which Gesenius, reasoning from the root, understands to be the great lobe of the liver itself, rather than the caul over it; which latter he terms omentum minus hepaticogastricum, and which, he observes, is inconsiderable in size, and has but little fat. Jahn thinks the smaller lobe to be meant. The phrase is also rendered in the Sept. τὸν λοβὸν τοῦ ἥπατος, or τὸν ἐπὶ τοῦ, etc., 'the lobe or lower pendant of the liver,' the chief object of attention in the art of hepatoscopy, or divination by the liver among the ancients. (Jerome gives reticulum jecoris, 'the net of the liver,' and arvina, 'the suet,' and adepts, 'the fat'; see Bochart, Hieroz. i. 498.) It appears from the same passages that it was burnt upon the altar, and not eaten as sacrificial food

(Jahn, Biblisches Archäol., sec. 378, n. 7). The liver was supposed by the ancient Jews, Greeks, and Romans, to be the seat of the passions, pride, love, etc. Thus, Gen. xlix. 6, 'with their assembly let not כִּבְדִּי (literally, 'my liver') be united;' Sept. τὰ ἥπατα; see also Heb. of Ps. xvi. 9; lvii. 9; cviii. 2; and Anacreon, Ode iii. fin.; Theocritus, Idyll. xi. 16; Horace, Carm. i. 13, 4; 25, 15; iv. 1, 12; and the Notes of the Delphin edition: comp. also Persius, Sat. v. 129; Juvenal, Sat. vi. 647. Wounds in the liver were supposed to be mortal; thus the expressions in Prov. vii. 23, 'a dart through his liver,' and Lam. ii. 11, 'my liver is poured out upon the earth,' are each of them a periphrasis for death itself. So also Æschylus uses the words θύγγειν πρὸς ἥπαρ to describe a heart wound (Agamemnon, 432). The passage in Ezekiel contains an interesting reference to the most ancient of all modes of divination, by the inspection of the viscera of animals and even of mankind sacrificially slaughtered for the purpose. It is there said that the king of Babylon, among other modes of divination referred to in the same verse, 'looked upon the liver.' The Cambridge manuscript of the Sept. gives ἥπατι σκοπήσασθαι; other copies use the precise technical term ἥπατοςκοπήσασθαι. The liver was always considered the most important organ in the ancient art of Extispicium, or divination by the entrails. Philostratus felicitously describes it as 'the prophesying tripod of all divination' (Life of Apollonius, viii. 7, 5). The rules by which the Greeks and Romans judged of it are amply detailed in Adam's Roman Antiquities, p. 261, etc., Lond. 1834; and in Potter's Archæologia Græca, i. 316, Lond. 1775. It is an interesting inquiry how this regard to it originated. Vitruvius suggests a plausible theory of the first rise of hepatoscopy. He says the ancients inspected the livers of those animals which frequented the places where they wished to settle; and if they found the liver, to which they chiefly ascribed the process of sanguification, was injured, they concluded that the water and nourishment collected in such localities were unwholesome (i. 4). But divination is coeval and co-extensive with a belief in the divinity. We accept the argument of the Stoics, 'sunt Dî: ergo est Divinatio.' We know that as early as the days of Cain and Abel there were certain means of communication between God and man, and that those means were connected with the sacrifice of animals; and we prefer to consider those means as the source of divination in later ages, conceiving that when the real tokens of the divine interest with which the primitive families of man were favoured ceased, in consequence of the multiplying of human transgressions, their descendants endeavoured to obtain counsel and information by the same external observances. We believe that thus only will the minute resemblances be accounted for, which we discover between the different methods of divination, utterly untraceable to reason, but which have prevailed from unknown antiquity among the most distant regions. Cicero ascribes divination by this and other means to what he calls 'the heroic ages,' by which term we know he means a period antecedent to all historical documents (De Divinatione). Prometheus, in the play of that title (474, etc.), lays claim to having taught mankind the different kinds of divination, and that of extispicy among the rest; and Prometheus, according to Servius (ad Virg. Ecl. vi. 42), instructed the Assyrians; and we know from sacred record that Assyria was one of the countries first peopled. It is further important to remark that the first recorded instance of divination is that of the teraphim of Laban, a native of Padan-aram, a district bordering on that country (1 Sam. xix. 13, 16), but by which teraphim both the Sept. and Josephus understood ἡναι τῶν αἰγῶν, 'the liver of goats' (Antiq. vi. 11. 4); nor does Whiston, perhaps, in his note on that passage, unreasonably complain that, 'since the modern Jews have lost the signification of the word נבבי, and since this rendering of the Sept., as well as the opinion of Josephus, are here so much more clear and probable, it is unaccountable that our commentators should so much hesitate as to its true interpretation' (Whiston's Josephus, p. 169, note, Edin. 1828; Bochart, i. 41, De Caprarum Nominibus; Encyclopædia Metropolitana, art. 'Divination'; Rosenmüller's Scholia on the several passages referred to; Perizonius, ad Elian. ii. 31; Peucer, De Præcipuis Divinationum Generibus, etc., Witteberg 1560). [DIVINATION.]—J. F. LIZARD. Under this denomination the modern zoologist places all the cold-blooded animals that have the conformation of serpents with the addition of four feet. Thus viewed, as one great family, they constitute the Saurians, Lacertinae, and Lacertidae of authors; embracing numerous generical divisions, which commence with the largest, that is, the crocodile group, and pass through sundry others, a variety of species, formidable, disgusting, or pleasing in appearance—some equally frequenting the land and water, others absolutely confined to the earth and to the most arid deserts; and though in general harmless, there are a few with disputed properties, some being held to poison or corrode by means of the exudation of an ichor, and others extolled as aphrodisiacs, or of medical use in pharmacy; but these properties in most, if not in all, are undetermined or illusory. For those mentioned in the Bible, see CHAMELEON; CROCODILE; DRAGON; LEVIATHAN; ANAKAH; CHOMET; COACH; LE-TAAH; SEMMAMITH; THINSEMETH; TZAB.—C. H. S.

LOAN. The Mosaic laws which relate to the subject of borrowing, lending, and repaying, are in substance as follows:—If an Israelite became poor, what he desired to borrow was to be freely lent to him, and no interest, either of money or produce, could be exacted from him; interest might be taken of a foreigner, but not of an Israelite by another Israelite (Exod. xxii. 25; Deut. xxiii. 19, 20; Lev. xxv. 35-38). At the end of every seven years a remission of debts was ordained; every creditor was to remit what he had lent: of a foreigner the loan might be exacted, but not of a brother. If an Israelite wished to borrow, he was not to be refused because the year of remission was at hand (Deut. xv. 1-11). Pledges might be taken, but not as such the mill or the upper millstone, for that would be to take a man's life in pledge. If the pledge was raiment, it was to be given back before sunset, as being needful for a covering at night. The widow's garment could not be taken in pledge (Exod. xxii. 26, 27; Deut. xxiv. 6, 17). A part of the last passage we must cite entire, as showing a most amiable and considerate spirit on the part of Moses towards the poor: 'When thou dost lend thy brother anything, thou shalt not go into his house to fetch his pledge; thou shalt stand abroad, and the man to whom thou dost lend shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee; and if the man be poor thou shalt not sleep with his pledge: in any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee; and it shall be righteousness unto thee before the Lord thy God.' The strong and impressive manner in which the duty of lending is enjoined, is worthy of being exhibited in the words of Scripture: 'If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren, thou shalt not harden thy heart nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother, but thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need. Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, the year of release is at hand, and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought, and he cry unto the Lord against thee, and it be sin unto thee: thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him; because that for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works and in all that thou puttest thy hand unto.'

These laws relating to loans may wear a strange and somewhat repulsive aspect to the mere modern reader, and cannot be understood, either in their bearing or their sanctions, unless considered from the Biblical point of view. The land of Canaan (as the entire world) belonged to its Creator, but was given of God to the descendants of Abraham under certain conditions, of which this liberality to the needy was one. The power of getting loans therefore was a part of the poor man's inheritance. It was a lien on the land (the source of all property with agricultural people), which was as valid as the tenure of any given portion by the tribe or family to whose lot it had fallen. This is the light in which the Mosaic polity represents the matter, and in this light, so long as that polity retained its force, would it, as a matter of course, be regarded by the owners of property. Thus the execution of this particular law was secured by the entire force with which the constitution itself was recommended and sustained. But as human selfishness might in time endanger this particular set of laws, so Moses applied special support to the possibly weak part. Hence the emphasis with which he enjoins the duty of lending to the needy. Of this emphasis the very essence is the sanction supplied by that special providence which lay at the very basis of the Mosaic commonwealth; so that lending to the destitute came to be enforced with all the power derivable from the express will of God, of the Almighty Creator, of the Redeemer of Israel, of Him whose favour was life, and whose frown was dismay and ruin.

It is impossible not to admire the benevolence which runs through the entire of this piece of legislation; and when the age to which its origin is referred, and the peculiar circumstances under which it was produced, are considered, our admiration rises to a very high pitch, and we feel that it is most insufficient praise to say that nothing so benign in spirit had been previously conceived: nothing more beneficent and humane has been carried into effect, even since Jesus came to seek and to save the lost. The conduct which the Romans observed towards the debtor affords a striking contrast to what is thus required by Moses. Insolvent debtors might be compelled to serve their creditors, and often had to endure treatment as bad as that of slaves (Liv. ii. 23; A. Gell. xx. i. 19; Appian, Ital. p. 40). In Athens also the creditor had a claim to the person of the debtor (Plut. Vit. Sol. 15). Moses himself seems to have admitted some restrictions to his benevolent laws; for from Lev. xxv. 39, seq., it appears that a poor Israelite might be sold to one possessed of substance: he was, however, to serve, not as a bond, but as a hired servant, who at the jubilee was restored with his children to entire liberty, so that he might return unto the possession of his fathers.

That the system of law regarding loans was carried into effect there is no reason to doubt. It formed an essential part of the general constitution, and therefore came recommended with the entire sanction which that system had on its own behalf; nor were there any predominant antagonist principles at work which would prevent this from proceeding step by step, in its proper place and time, with the residue of the Mosaic legislation. Nor do the passages of Scripture (Job xxii. 6; xxiv. 3; Matt. xviii. 28; Prov. xxviii. 8; Ezek. xviii. 8; Ps. xv. 5; cix. 11) which give us reason to think that usury was practised and the poor debtor oppressed, shew anything but those breaches to which laws are always liable, especially in a period when morals grow corrupt and institutions in consequence decline; on the contrary, the stern reproofs which such violations called forth forcibly demonstrate that the legislation in question had taken effect, and had also exerted a powerful influence on the national character, and on the spirit with which the misdeeds of rich oppressors and the injuries of the needy were regarded.

While, however, the benign tendency of the laws in question is admitted, may it not be questioned whether they were strictly just? Such a doubt could arise only in a mind which viewed the subject from the position of our actual society. A modern might plead that he had a right to do what he pleased with his own; that his property of every kind—land, food, money—was his own; and that he was justified to turn all and each part to account for his own benefit. Apart from religious considerations this position is impregnable. But such a view of property finds no support in the Mosaic institutions. In them property has a divine origin, and its use is intrusted to man on certain conditions, which conditions are as valid as is the tenure of property itself. In one sense, indeed, the entire land—all property—was a great loan, a loan lent of God to the people of Israel, who might well therefore acquiesce in any arrangement which required a portion—a small portion—of this loan to be under certain circumstances accessible to the destitute. This view receives confirmation from the fact that interest might be taken of persons who were not Hebrews, and therefore lay beyond the sphere embraced by this special arrangement. It would open too wide a field did we proceed to consider how far the Mosaic system might be applicable in the world at large; but this is very clear to our mind, that the theory of property on which it rests—that is, making property to be divine in its origin, and therefore tenable only on the fulfilment of such conditions as the great laws of religion and morality enforce—is more true and more philosophical (ex-

Had the Hebrews enjoyed a free intercourse with other nations, the permission to take usury of foreigners might have had the effect of impoverishing Palestine by affording a strong inducement for employing capital abroad; but, under the actual restrictions of the Mosaic law, this evil was impossible. Some not inconsiderable advantages must have ensued from the observance of these laws. The entire alienation and loss of the lent property were prevented by that peculiar institution which restored to every man his property at the great year of release. In the interval between the jubilees the system under consideration would tend to prevent those inequalities of social condition which always arise rapidly, and which have not seldom brought disaster and ruin on states. The affluent were required to part with a portion of their affluence to supply the wants of the needy, without exacting that recompense which would only make the rich richer and the poor more needy; thus superinducing a state of things scarcely more injurious to the one than to the other of these two parties. There was also in this system a strongly conservative influence. Agriculture was the foundation of the constitution. Had money-lending been a trade, money-making would also have been eagerly pursued. Capital would be withdrawn from the land; the agriculturist would pass into the usurer; huge inequalities would arise; commerce would assume predominance, and the entire commonwealth be overturned—changes and evils which were prevented, or, if not so, certainly retarded and abated, by the code of laws regarding loans. As it was, the gradually increasing wealth of the country was in the main laid out on the soil, so as to augment its productiveness and distribute its bounties.

These views may prepare the reader for considering the doctrine of 'the Great Teacher' on the subject of loans. It is found forcibly expressed in Luke's Gospel (vi. 34, 35): 'If ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again: but love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest; for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil.' The meaning of the passage is distinct and full, unmistakeable, and not to be evaded. He commands men to lend, not as Jews to Jews, but even to enemies, without asking or receiving any return, after the manner of the Great Benefactor of the Universe, who sends down his rains and bids his sun to shine on the fields of the unjust as well as of the just. To attempt to view this command in the light of reason and experience would require space which cannot here be given; but we must add, that any attempt to explain the injunction away is most unworthy on the part of professed disciples of Christ; and that, not possibly at least, fidelity to the behests of Him whom we call Lord and Master would of itself answer all doubts and remove all misgivings, by practically shewing that this, as every other doctrine that fell from His lips, is indeed of God (John vii. 17).—J. LOAVES. [BREAD.]

LOCK. ῥαγισμός; κλειδοον, sera (Neh. iii. 3, 13, 14, 15; Cant. v. 5). Details of the mode of fastening gates and doors in the East have been already given [DOOR; KEY]. The locks are commonly huge clumsy things of wood (Dr. Thomson, Land and Book, p. 317, speaks of one to a castle door, which, with its key, was almost a load for a camel), of which the accompanying sketch shews the nature. They consist of a bar (a) hollowed at one end to admit the key (b), and passing horizontally through a groove (c) in a strong piece of wood (d) attached vertically to the inside of the door, into a hole in the door-post. In (e) are a number of movable metal pins (e) corresponding to holes drilled in the bar (f) into which they drop, and render it fast (fig. 2). The key (b) is a flat piece of wood with the same number of fixed metal pegs (g) projecting from its upper surface, which when introduced into the end of the bar (as in fig. 3) raises the movable pegs (e), and allows the bar to be drawn back. These locks are placed on the inside of doors of gardens and courts, and sometimes even of inner rooms. A hole is cut in the door to allow the arm to be introduced to insert the key, which explains Cant. v. 4. The locks being easily picked, are sometimes, as an additional safeguard, plastered over with clay, on which a seal is impressed (cf. Job xxxviii. 14).—E. V.

LOD, and in the N. T. LYDDA (Λύδα, perhaps 'strife'; Λύδα, Λοδα; Alex. Λόδα, Λύδα; Lod; in N. T. Λύδα). We read in 1 Chron. viii. 12, that Shamed, a Benjamite, built Ono and Lod, with the towns thereof. Probably it was rebuilt, like most other towns in Canaan, upon an ancient site. The site is a noble one—a gentle eminence in the midst of the vast and fertile plain, which extends to the sea on the west, to the mountains of Judah on the east, and north and south far as the eye can see. It is twelve miles from Joppa, on the road to Jerusalem, and about two and a half miles north of Ramleh. The site of Ono, which was founded at the same time, is four miles across the plain to the north-west. Lod was again occupied immediately after the captivity (Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37); but we hear no more of it in O. T. history. About the year B. C. 145 the district of Lydda, with two others adjoining, was separated from Samaria and annexed to Judæa, on account of the respect entertained for the Jewish leader, Jonathan, by Demetrius Nicator (1 Maccab. xi. 30, seq.; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 4. 9; Reland, pp. 178, seq.). After the death of Julius Cæsar, Cassius Longinus, one of his murderers, commanded in Palestine, and was guilty of many acts of cruelty. Among others, he sold to slavery the whole people of Lydda (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 11. 2); a short time afterwards, however, they were set at liberty and restored to their homes by order of Antony (Id., xiv. 12. 5; Robinson, B. R., ii. 245).

But Lydda derives its chief and undying interest from the miracle wrought by Peter upon the paralytic Eneas (Acts ix. 33). The glad and wondrous tidings soon sped to Joppa, 'forasmuch as Lydda was nigh to Joppa'; and thither the apostle was soon summoned to perform a miracle still more wonderful (ver. 38, seq.). Lydda suffered severely during the wars between the Jews and Romans. It was burned to ashes by Cestius Gallus (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 19. 1); and being captured by Vespasian at a later period, was colonized by his adherents (Id., iv. 8. 1). But, notwithstanding these calamities, it was a large and flourishing town, and famous as a seat of Jewish learning (Lightfoot, Opera, ii. 145; Edersheim, Hist. of the Jews, p. 176). Like many other towns in Palestine which were rebuilt or adorned during the Roman rule, Lydda got a new name. The Hebrew Lod, and the Greek corruption Lydda, were both set aside, and the official designation became Diospolis. This name first appears on coins of Septimius Severus, in the beginning of the third century (Eckhel, Nummor. Doctr., iii. 432; cf. Jerome, Opera, i. 696; ed. Migne). From this time the town became one of the most important places in western Palestine (Reland, p. 877). It was made the seat of a bishopric at an early period, and continues so down to the present time (Id., pp. 215, 227; Le Quien, Oriens Chr., iii.). Very early traditions affirm Lydda to be the birthplace of St. George; and in some of the Notitie Ecclesiastica, we find it mentioned as 'Diospolis or City of George' (Γεωργίου πόλις; Reland, p. 220). A splendid church was there erected in honour of the saint, some say by the emperor Justinian (Will. Tyr., Hist. vii. 22; cf. Anton. Mart., Itin. 30). In the beginning of the eighth century Lydda was laid in ruins by the Saracens; but the church escaped, only to be destroyed, however, by the Mohammedans on the approach of the Crusaders (Will. Tyr., vii. 22). It is worthy of note that at this time the new name, Diospolis, had disappeared, and the old Hebrew name, Lod, which had probably been always used by the inhabitants, appears again in history. The Crusaders paid great respect to Lydda, and adopted George as their patron-saint (Heylin, History of St. George). The church was rebuilt by them; but after the evacuation of Palestine it gradually fell to ruin, and Lydda dwindled down to a small and poor village. A part of the church was converted into a mosque, and to that circumstance we are indebted for the beautiful fragment of it which still remains.

The village of Lydda, now called Lud, contains about a thousand inhabitants; and though its houses are small and poor, and its lanes dirty, yet there is an air of thrift and prosperity about the place not often seen in Palestine. The orchards which surround it are rich and beautiful, and the plain beyond them is well cultivated. Of St. George's Church only the walls and part of the vault of the chancel remain. The capitals of the pilasters and the cornice are marble, and profusely ornamented. One lofty pointed arch stands on the south side of the aisle, and has a very striking appearance. Full descriptions of Lydda may be seen in Robinson, vol. ii.; Thomson, The Land and the Book; Handbook, 278, seq. Its history is sketched in Reland and Le Quien; and the story of St. George is given at great length in Acta Sanctorum, tom. iii. p. 100, seq., and in Heylin's History.—J. LO-DEBAR (לֹדְבָר and לֹדֶבֶר, 'without pasture'; Λοδδβαρ and Λωδαβάρ; Alex. Λαδδβαρ; Lodabar), a town of Gilead, where Mephibosheth, the deformed son of Jonathan, found a home after the death of his father and grandfather (2 Sam. ix. 5). When David fled from Jerusalem to Mahanaim on the rebellion of Absalom, Machir of Lo-debar, who had previously sheltered Mephibosheth, was among the first to supply the wants of the royal refugee (xvii. 27). Gilead was a pastoral country; and its people, simple and primitive in their habits, exercised a generous and profuse hospitality to strangers. The site of Lo-debar appears to have been unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast., s. v. La-dabar and Lo-dabar). It must have been near Mahanaim, for there Ishbosheth was crowned by Abner, and we may suppose the relatives of Saul would gather round it (2 Sam. ii. 9); there, too, David had taken refuge when Machir supplied him with furniture and provisions. Reland suggests that this town may be identical with Lidbir (לִדְבִיר), or Debir (דְּבִיר, DEBIR) of Josh. xiii. 26. Although Lidbir may be the real form of the latter word, yet it seems very doubtful whether Lo-debar could be so contracted (Reland, p. 875; Keil, On Josh. xiii. 26).—J. L. P.

LONGEVITY. Longevity is a compound of two Latin words, and signifies prolongation of life. The lengthened ages of some of the ante and post-diluvian fathers, as given by Moses in the Hebrew text, are as follows:—

		Years.
Adam	Gen. v. 5	930
Seth	" 8	912
Enos	" 11	905
Cainan	" 14	910
Mahalaleel	" 17	895
Jared	" 20	962
Enoch	" 23	365
Methuselah	" 27	969
Lamech	" 31	777
Noah	" ix. 29	950
Shem	" xi. 10, 11	600
Arphaxad	" 12, 13	438
Salah	" 14, 15	433
Eber	" 16, 17	464
Peleg	" 18, 19	239
Reu	" 20, 21	239
Serug	" 22, 23	230
Nahor	" 24, 25	148
Terah	" 32	205
Abraham	" xxv. 7	175

Infidelity has not failed, in various ages, to attack revelation on the score of the supposed absurdity of assigning to any class of men this lengthened term of existence. In reference to this, Josephus (Antiq. i. 3. 9) remarks:—"Let no one upon comparing the lives of the ancients with our lives, and with the few years which we now live, think that what we say of them is false; or make the shortness of our lives at present an argument that neither did they attain to so long a duration of life." When we consider the compensating process which is going on, the marvel is that the human frame should not last longer than it does. Some, however, have supposed that the years above named are lunar, consisting of about thirty days; but this supposition, with a view to reduce the lives of the antediluvians to our standard, is replete with difficulties. At this rate the whole time from the creation of man to the Flood would not be more than about 140 years; and Methuselah himself would not have attained to the age which many even now do, whilst many must have had children when mere infants! Besides, if we compute the age of the postdiluvians by this mode of calculation—and why should we not?—we shall find that Abraham, who is said to have died in a good old age (Gen. xxv. 8) could not have been more than fifteen years old! Moses must therefore have meant solar, not lunar years—not, however, exactly so long as ours, for the ancients generally reckoned twelve months, of thirty days each, to the year. 'Nor is there,' observes St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xv. 12), 'any care to be given unto those who think that one of our ordinary years would make ten of the years of these times, being so short; and therefore, say they, 900 years of theirs are 90 of ours—their 10 is our 1 and their 100 our 10. Thus think they, that Adam was but 20 years old when he begat Seth, and he but 204 when he begat Enos, whom the Scriptures call (the Sept. ver.) 205 years. For, as these men hold, the Scripture divided one year into ten parts, calling each part a year; and each part had a six-fold quadrate, because in six days God made the world. Now 6 times 6 is 36, which multiplied by 10 makes 360—i.e., twelve lunar months.' Abarbanel, in his Comment. on Gen. v., states that some, professing Christianity, had fallen into the same mistake, viz., that Moses meant lunar, and not solar years. Ecclesiastical history does not inform us of this fact, except it be to it that Lactantius refers (ii. 13) when he speaks of one Varro:—'The life of man, though temporary, was yet extended to 1000 years; of this Varro is so ignorant that, though known to all from the sacred writings, he would argue that the 1000 years of Moses were, according to the Egyptian mode of calculation, only 1000 months!'

That the ancients computed time differently we learn from Pliny (Hist. Nat. vii.), and also from Scaliger (De Emend. Temporum, i.); still this does not alter the case as above stated (see Heidegger, De Anno Patriarcharum).

But it is asked, if Moses meant solar years, how came it to pass that the patriarchs did not begin to beget children at an earlier period than they are reported to have done? Seth was 105 years old, on the lowest calculation, when he begat Enos; and Methuselah 187 when Lamech was born! St. Augustine (i. 15) explains this difficulty in a two-fold manner, by supposing—

1. Either that the age of puberty was later in proportion as the lives of the antediluvians were longer than ours; or

2. That Moses does not record the first-born sons but as the order of the genealogy required, his object being to trace the succession from Adam, through Seth, to Abraham. The learned Heidegger (De Ante-Diluv.) thus confirms this latter view: 'Consilium fuit Mosi, uti cuilibet confectum proclive est. Nox et Abrahami genealogiam pertexere, tum quia illi duo inter ceteros fide et pietate eminebant et uterque divinitus insigni donatus est prerogativa.'

Whilst the Jews have never questioned the longevity assigned by Moses to the patriarchs, they have yet disputed, in many instances, as to whether it was common to all men who lived up to the period when human life was contracted. Maimonides (More Nevochim, ii. 47) says—

'Longævitate hanc non fuisse nisi quorundam singularium commemoratorum in lege; reliquos illorum seculorum annos attigisse non plures, quam hodie adhuc communiter fieri solet.'

With this opinion Abarbanel, on Gen. v., agrees; Nachmanides, however, rejects it, and shews that the life of the descendants of Cain must have been quite as long as that of the Sethites, though not noticed by Moses; for only seven individuals of the former filled up the space which intervened between the death of Abel and the Flood, whereas ten of the latter are enumerated. We have reason then to conclude, that longevity was not confined to any peculiar tribe of the ante or post-diluvian fathers, but was vouchsafed, in general, to all. Irenæus (Adversus Hæres. v.) informs us that some supposed that the fact of its being recorded that no one of the antediluvians named attained the age of 1000 years, was the fulfilment of the declaration (Gen. iii.), 'in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die;' grounding the opinion, or rather conceit, upon Ps. xc. 4, namely, that God's day is 1000 years.

As to the probable reasons why God so prolonged the life of man in the earlier ages of the world, and as to the subordinate means by which this might have been accomplished, Josephus says (Antiq. l. 3): 'For those ancients were beloved of God, and lately made by God himself; and because their food was then fitter for the prolongation of life, they might well live so great a number of years: and because God afforded them a longer time of life on account of their virtue and the good use they made of it in astronomical and geometrical discoveries, which would not have afforded the time for foretelling the periods of the stars unless they had lived 600 years; for the great year is completed in that interval.' To this he adds the testimony of many celebrated profane historians, who affirm that the ancients lived 1000 years.

In the above passage Josephus enumerates four causes of the longevity of the earlier patriarchs. As to the first, viz., their being dearer to God than other men, it is plain that it cannot be maintained, for the profligate descendants of Cain were equally long-lived, as mentioned above, with others. Neither can we agree in the second reason he assigns, because we find that Noah and others, though born so long subsequently to the creation of Adam, yet lived to as great an age, some of them to a greater age, than he did. If, again, it were right to attribute longevity to the superior quality of the food of the antediluvians, then the seasons, on which this depends, must about Moses's time—for it was then that the term of human existence was reduced to its present standard—have assumed a fixed character. But no change at that time took place in the revolution of the heavenly bodies, by which the seasons of heat, cold, etc., are regulated; hence we must not assume that it was the nature of the fruits they ate which caused longevity. How far the antediluvians had advanced in scientific research generally, and in astronomical discovery particularly, we are not informed; nor can we place any dependence upon what Josephus says about the two inscribed pillars which remained from the old world (see Antiq. i. 2. 3). We are not, therefore, able to determine, with any confidence, that God permitted the earlier generations of man to live so long, in order that they might arrive at a high degree of mental excellence. From the brief notices which the Scriptures afford of the character and habits of the antediluvians, we should rather infer that they had not advanced very far in discoveries in natural and experimental philosophy (see ANTEDILUVIANS). We must suppose that they did not reduce their language to alphabetical order, nor was it necessary to do so at a time when human life was so prolonged, that the tradition of the creation passed through only two hands to Noah. It would seem that the book ascribed to Enoch is a work of postdiluvian origin (see Jurieu, Crit. Hist., i. 41). Possibly, a want of mental employment, together with the labour they endured ere they were able to extract from the earth the necessities of life, might have been some of the proximate causes of that degeneracy which led God in judgment to destroy the old world. If the antediluvians began to bear children at the age on an average of 100, and if they ceased to do so at 600 years (see Shuckford's Connat., i. 36), the world might then have been far more densely populated than it is now. Supposing, moreover, that the earth was no more productive antecedently than it was subsequently to the flood; and that the antediluvian fathers were ignorant of those mechanical arts which so much abridge human labour now, we can easily understand how difficult they must have found it to secure for themselves the common necessities of life, and this the more so if animal food was not allowed them. The prolonged life, then, of the generations before the flood, would seem to have been rather an evil than a blessing, leading as it did to the too rapid peopling of the earth. We can readily conceive how this might conduce to that awful state of things expressed in the words, 'And the whole earth was filled with violence.' In the absence of any well-regulated system of government, we can imagine what evils must have arisen: the unprincipled would oppress the weak; the crafty would outwit the unsuspecting; and, not having the fear of God before their eyes, destruction and misery would be in their ways. Still we must admire the providence of God in the longevity of man immediately after the creation and the flood. After the creation, when the world was to be peopled by one man and one woman, the age of the greatest part of those on record was 900 and upwards. But after the flood, when there were three couples to re-people the earth, none of the patriarchs except Shem reached the age of 500; and only the three first of his line, viz., Arphaxad, Selah, and Eber, came near that age, which was in the first century after the flood. In the second century we do not find that any attained the age of 240; and in the third century (about the latter end of which Abraham was born) none except Terah arrived at 200; by which time the world was so well peopled, that they had built cities, and were formed into distinct nations under their respective kings (see Gen. xv.; see also Usher and Petavius on the increase of mankind in the three first centuries after the flood).

That the common age of man has been the same in all times since the world was peopled, is manifest from profane as well as sacred history. Plato lived to the age of 81, and was accounted an old man; and those whom Pliny reckons up (vii. 48) as rare examples of long life, may, for the most part, be equalled in modern times. We cannot, then, but see the hand of God in the proportion that there is between births and deaths; for by this means the population of the world is kept up. If the fixed standard of human life were that of Methuselah's age, or even that of Abraham's, the world would soon be overstocked; or if the age of man were limited to that of divers other animals—to 10, 20, or 30 years only—the decay of mankind would then be too fast. But on the present scale the balance is nearly even, and life and death keep an equal pace! In thus maintaining throughout all ages and places these proportions of mankind and all other creatures, God declares himself to be indeed the ruler of the world. We may, then, conclude in the language of the Psalmist (Ps. civ. 29, 30), 'Thou hidest thy face, all creatures are troubled; thou takest away their breath, they die and return to their dust. Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created; and thou renewest the face of the earth.'—J. W. D.

LOOKING-GLASSES. [MIRRORS.]

LORD, a Saxon word signifying ruler or governor. In its original form it is hlaford (hlaforð), which, by dropping the aspiration, became laford, and afterwards, by contraction, lord. In the authorised translation of the Scriptures it is used, without much discrimination, for all the names applied to God—which cannot be helped, as our language does not afford the same number of distinguishing titles as the Hebrew. When, however, the word represents the dread name of JEHOVAH it is printed in small capitals, LORD, and is by this contrivance made a distinguishing term. Having already explained the different names of GOD which the term LORD is made to represent [ADONAI; GOD; JEHOVAH], no further statement on the subject is here necessary. It also, however, represents the Greek Kύριος, which, indeed, is used in much the same way and in the same sense as Lord. It is from κύριος, authority, and signifies 'master' or 'possessor.' In the Septuagint this, like Lord in our version, is invariably used for 'Jehovah' and 'Adonai'; while Θεός, like GOD in our translation, is generally reserved to represent the Hebrew 'Elohim.' Kύριος in the Greek Testament, and Lord in the authorised version of it, are used much in the same manner as in the Septuagint; and so also is the corresponding title, Dominus, in the Latin versions. As the Hebrew name JEHOVAH is one never used with reference to any but the Almighty, it is to be regretted that the Septuagint, imitated by our own and other versions, has represented it by a word which is also used for the Hebrew 'Adonai' when applied to angels (Gen. xix. 2; Dan. x. 16, 17); for Adonim and Adon when used of men in authority (Gen. xlii. 30, 33; Is. xix. 4), and of proprietors, owners, masters (Gen. xlv. 8). In the N. T. Kύριος, representing 'Adonai,' and both represented by Lord, the last, or human application of the term, is frequent. In fact, the leading idea of the Hebrew, the Greek, and the English words, is that of an owner or proprietor, whether God or man; and it occurs in the inferior application with great frequency in the N. T. This application is either literal or complimentary: literal, when the party is really an owner or master, as in Matt. x. 24; xx. 8; xxi. 40; Acts xvi. 16, 19; Gal. iv. 1, or as having absolute authority over another (Matt. ix. 38; Luke x. 2), or as being a supreme lord or sovereign (Acts xxv. 26); and complimentary, when used as a title of address to superiors, like the English Master, Sir, French Sieur, German Herr, as in Matt. xiii. 27; xxi. 30; Mark vii. 28; Luke ix. 54.

It cannot but be deemed desirable that, instead of the extensive use of the word Lord which we have described, discriminating terms should be adopted in translations. Apart from the Jewish superstitions which influenced the Seventy in their translation, there can be no good reason why the name JEHOVAH should not be retained wherever it occurs in the Hebrew. Then LORD might represent Adonai; or Sir, or Master, might be used when applied to creatures; and GOD would properly represent Elohim.—J. K.

LORD'S DAY. [CHRISTIAN SABBATH, vol. iii. p. 716; JESUS CHRIST, vol. ii. pp. 555, 581; SYNAGOGUE, vol. iii. pp. 904, 909.]

LORD'S SUPPER, THE (κυριακὸν δείπνον, i

Cor. xi. 20). By the phrase the Lord's Supper, most Protestant commentators agree that St. Paul designated the religious service by which the apostolic churches commemorated the death of the Lord Jesus. Whatever may be the correct interpretation of the whole verse, 'When ye come together to the same place, it is not to eat the Lord's Supper,'—whether it be that the Corinthians did not intend 'to eat the Lord's Supper,' or that it was not right for them 'to eat the Lord's Supper' in their disorderly meetings, or that their perversion of the sacred service ought not to be called the eating of 'the Lord's Supper';—the scope and connection of the passage shew that the apostle could have referred to nothing else than the sacramental commemoration of the death of Jesus. Were there any doubt respecting his meaning, the account of the institution of the service (ver. 23-26), evidently given as a directory for its continued observance, would be sufficient to satisfy any unprejudiced reader.

Catholic commentators, however, deny that the apostle so designates the Eucharistic service. 'The Lord's Supper' is so inappropriate a name for 'the offering of the body and blood of Christ, a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the living and the dead,' that we do not wonder Catholics refuse to acknowledge it. The person for whose sins the sacrifice is offered on the altar of the church need not partake of it. He may be absent; he may be dead; he may have been in purgatory for ages, like the founders of many charities and chantries, for whose souls the mass has been said at regular intervals for centuries. To the absent or dead it cannot be 'a supper.' Even if the person for whom the sacrifice is offered be living and present, the consecrated bread is put in his mouth, as a sign that the sacrifice is offered for him. Nor, unless he be a priest, can he communicate in both parts of the Eucharist.

Catholics, therefore, say that the apostle, in speaking of the Lord's Supper, intended to designate the charity feast of the primitive churches, and that the subsequent reference to the institution of the Eucharist may be explained by the ancient custom of observing the charity feast on the occasion of meeting to celebrate the Eucharist. In the Rheims version of the N. T., it is said (note to 1 Cor. xi. 20), 'The Lord's Supper.' So the apostle calls the charity feasts observed by the primitive Christians, and reprehends the abuses of the Corinthians on these occasions, which were the more criminal because these feasts were accompanied with the celebration of the Eucharistic sacrifice and sacrament.' [AGAPE, vol. i. p. 79.]

As we have distinct accounts of the institution of the Lord's Supper in the first three gospels, and also in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, we may take them for our guide in considering the nature of the service, and the several controversies to which it has given rise. [JESUS CHRIST, p. 572.]

In Matthew xxvi. 26-28 we read, 'And as they were eating, Jesus having taken the bread and blessed, brake, and gave to his disciples, and said, Take, eat, this is my body. And having taken the cup and given thanks, he gave to them, saying, Drink ye all of it, for this is my blood, that of the new covenant, which is shed for many, for the remission of sins.' In Mark xiv. 22-24, the words are, 'And as they were eating, Jesus having taken bread, and blessed, brake, and gave to them, and said, Take, this is my body. And having taken the cup and given thanks, he gave to them, and they all drank of it. And he said to them, This is my blood, that of the new covenant, which is shed for many.' In Luke xxii. 19, 20, we read, 'And having taken bread and given thanks, he brake, and gave to them, saying, This is my body, which is given for you, do this for the remembrance of me. In like manner the cup, after the supper, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as often as ye drink it, for the remembrance of me.' The words of Paul, which, as may be expected from his intimate connection with Luke, correspond more nearly with those of that evangelist than with those of either of the other two, are (1 Cor. xi. 23-25), 'For I received from the Lord that which I delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus, in the night in which he was betrayed, took bread, and having given thanks, he brake, and said, This is my body which is [broken, uncertain reading] for you. This do for the remembrance of me. In like manner also the cup, after the supper, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as often as ye drink it, for the remembrance of me.'

We have given a bald and literal translation of these several accounts, that the reader unaccustomed to consult the original text may easily observe wherein they agree, and how far they differ.

With these Scriptural statements we may compare the account which Justin Martyr gives of the manner in which the Lord's Supper was celebrated in the earlier part of the 2d century. In his first Apology he says, 'After we have concluded the prayers, we salute one another with a kiss. After this, bread and a cup of wine and water are brought to the president, who having taken them, offers with a loud voice praise and glory to the Father of all, through the name of his Son and Holy Spirit, and offers thanksgiving for the gifts received from him. When this prayer and thanksgiving are ended, all the people express their assent by saying Amen. Those who are called deacons distribute this bread and wine, which is Eucharistic, to those who are present, and carry it away to those who are absent. Of this Eucharistic food none are allowed to partake who do not believe our teaching to be true, and have not been washed with the laver for the remission of sins, and do not live as Christ has commanded us. For we do not receive it as common bread and common drink; but in what manner Jesus Christ, our Saviour, became incarnate by the word of God, and had flesh and blood for our salvation, in that manner also we have been taught that the Eucharistic food, through the prayer of the Word by which our flesh and blood are nourished according to a transmutation, is the flesh and blood of the incarnate Jesus. For the apostles, in the memorials composed by them, which are called Gospels, have thus delivered, that Jesus, having taken bread and given thanks, said, Do this for the remembrance of me. And in the same manner having taken the cup and given thanks, said, This is my blood, and distributed it to them only.' In another passage of the same Apology, Justin says:—'On the day called Sunday, all who live in the same city or country assemble in one place, where the memorials of the apostles or writings of the prophets are read, and when the reader has finished the president makes a discourse, in which he admonishes and exhorts to the practice of all good things, at the conclusion of which all rise and pray, and the bread and wine and water are brought, and the president solemnly offers prayers and thanksgivings, and the people respond Amen. Then distribution is made to every one of that over which thanks have been offered, and it is sent to the absent by the deacons. And the rich contribute according as they are willing, and whatever is collected is intrusted to the president, and from it he relieves the widows and orphans, and those who suffer from sickness or other causes, as well as those who are in bonds, and strangers, and, indeed, all who are in need of assistance.'

We have now briefly to notice the several particulars which are mentioned in these different accounts, as, unhappily, almost every one of them has given rise to some dissension and controversy which it is our purpose to indicate rather than to determine. [PASSOVER, vol. iii. p. 425.]

'As they were eating' the passover, 'Jesus took bread.' That bread was undoubtedly unleavened, for no other could have been obtained at the passover. From this circumstance has arisen a long and apparently fruitless controversy, ἀρομαχία, the bread-fight, whether the bread used at the Sacrament ought to be leavened or unleavened? The only Scriptural argument that can be adduced on the one side is, 'Christ made use of unleavened bread;' and on the other, 'He could not have obtained leavened bread even if he preferred it.' Furnished with such a store of argument, which, though small, seems—like the widow's cruise of oil—inexhaustible, the Latin church and the Greek, the Lutherans and the Calvinists, have taken opposite sides, and continued a controversy of nine hundred years' standing.

'Having blessed,' says Mark. 'Having given thanks,' say Luke and Paul. In Matthew the reading is doubtful. That the same act is denoted by the 'having blessed' (εὐλογῆσας) of Mark, and the 'having given thanks' (εὐχαριστήσας) of Luke and Paul, there can be no reasonable doubt. In Mark's account of the miracle of the loaves and fishes the same words are used, but in reversed order. Jesus 'gave thanks' (εὐχαριστήσας) on breaking the seven loaves, and 'blessed' (εὐλογῆσας) on distributing the small fishes (Mark viii. 6, 7). Here surely the same act is denoted by the thanksgiving and the blessing. This particular would be scarcely worthy of notice were it not for the frequency with which we hear of Jesus blessing the bread. But Jesus blessed God, not the bread; that is, gave thanks to God for it. To bless (εὐλογεῖν) has for its object persons, not things. To bless may denote to wish well to a person, as when we bless them that curse us; or to give a blessing to a person, as when God blesses a man; or to ascribe thanks and praise to a person, as when we bless the Lord. The cup which we bless, is a Scriptural phrase; but, explained by other passages, it must denote the cup for which we bless God. The sacramental elements were no more blessed or consecrated than were the loaves and fishes with which Jesus fed the multitude in the desert. The blessing for, not of, the bread of the passover, according to the Rabbinical writers, was, 'Blessed be thou, O Lord God, who hast commanded us concerning the eating of the unleavened bread.' In accordance with this mode of blessing is the statement of Justin Martyr, who says, that before the distribution of the bread, the president offered praise and thanksgiving, and the people responded Amen. He makes no reference to any other blessing or consecration of the elements.

'Jesus brake the bread.' The breaking of the bread is distinctly mentioned in every one of the Scriptural accounts, and was so general in the apostolic times as to suggest one of the names by which the Lord's Supper was commonly designated, 'the breaking of bread' (Acts ii. 42; xx. 7). The apostle seems to have attributed some importance to the practice when he said, 'The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?' a question which can scarcely be asked by those who observe the Lord's Supper without breaking the bread. Although the practice is not mentioned by Justin, yet the fractus panis of Irenæus and the Latin fathers, shews that it was preserved in the Western churches for some three or four centuries. By the use of consecrated wafers, placed upon the tongue of the communicant, in the Romish church, and by similar expedients employed in other churches, the broken bread as a symbol of the broken body of our Lord has been long forgotten in almost all the churches of Christendom. Although in the Lutheran church the consecrated bread is put into the mouths of the communicants, the ancient practice has been restored in the Church of England, and generally in the Reformed Churches of Europe. The bread is usually broken by the officiating minister; but in some churches the communicants severally break from the bread small portions for themselves.

'And gave it to them.' This is said by each of the three Evangelists. When the communicants became numerous, as in the time of Justin, 'those called deacons distributed the eucharistic bread and wine, and then they carried it to the absent.' It was not the ancient custom for the communicants to approach the table and receive the elements from the officiating minister.

According to Matthew, Jesus said, 'Take, eat, this is my body;' according to Mark, 'Take, this is my body' (φάγετε is wanting in the best MSS.); according to Luke, 'This is my body which is given for you;' according to St. Paul, 'This is my body which is broken' (or given; a various reading) 'for you: this do for the remembrance of me.' It is evident that the exact sayings of our Lord are not preserved; though as the words 'This is my body,' to which words so awfully mysterious a power is attributed by the advocates of transubstantiation, are contained in every one of the Scriptural accounts, we may conclude that they were certainly spoken by our Lord. This meaning has been the subject of many angry and apparently interminable controversies.

Romanists say that they teach and prove the doctrine of transubstantiation. Cardinal Wiseman, in his Lectures on the Eucharist (lect. v.), contends that if our Lord had intended to teach that the bread represented his body, he would have said 'This bread is my body;' just as it is said, 'The seven good kine are seven years,' and 'The seven horns are seven kings.' But Jesus said, 'This' (not this bread, but 'this,' whatever it be) 'is my body.' He intentionally avoided calling it bread, because when he spake it was not bread, but his own body. 'This,' says the Cardinal, 'is nothing, and it represents nothing, it means nothing until it is identified at the close of the sentence with the substance named.' The Cardinal should have explained how it was that, if our Lord carefully avoided calling that substance bread which was not bread, St. Paul did not follow his example when he said, 'As often as ye eat this bread;' and again, 'Whosoever shall eat this bread the Lord unworthily;' words which, if literally interpreted, are, according to the Cardinal's own argument, subversive of the doctrine of transubstantiation. Considering, moreover, how great respect Romanists pay to the authority of the fathers, he might have offered some sort of explanation of the language of the Latin fathers, as of Tertullian, who says, 'Christ called the bread his body' (Adv. Jud.); of Cyprian, who says, 'The Lord called the bread, which is constituted of many grains, his body' (Ep. ad Mag. lxxix.); and of Augustine, who uses the same language, 'The Lord calls the bread his body.' These venerable men never thought of the reason which the Cardinal has discovered for the words of our Lord, 'This' (not this bread) 'is my body.'

Christ's words, literally interpreted, seem less appropriate to the Romish doctrine of transubstantiation than to some other forms in which the doctrine of the real presence has been propounded. Dr. Wiseman says, in his Lectures on the Catholic Church (lect. xiv., p. 136)—'The blessed Eucharist, which was originally bread and wine, is by the consecration changed into the substance of the body and blood of our Lord together with his soul and divinity, in other words, his complete and entire person.' See also the notes to the Rheims Testament on John vi. 54, and the Acts of the Council of Trent, Sess. xiii., c. 4. The doctrine of the Catholic Church is, that the priest, on pronouncing with a good intention the words 'Hoc est corpus meum,' transubstantiates the bread not only into the body, but also into the soul and divinity of Christ, that is, into his whole and complete person, human and divine. If it be so, why did our blessed Lord call that substance his body which included his soul and divinity? The priest who can change bread into the spiritual and divine nature of Christ has certainly marvellous power; but the authorities by which the Latin Church is bound for ever, distinctly, and in express language, attribute this power to the officiating priest, and repudiate in the strongest terms any other explanation or modification of the doctrine. However Catholics may differ on almost all other subjects—as on the authority and power of the Pope, the immaculate conception of the Virgin, worship of saints and angels, the doctrines of predestination and grace, on the entire transubstantiation of the bread into the whole person, human and divine, of Christ—there can be no difference between Dominicans and Franciscans, Jansenists and Jesuits, or Cismontanists and Ultramontanists. The authority of the Council of Trent is here decisive.

Our purpose is not controversy. If it were, we might propose the inquiry how and when the great and mysterious power of transubstantiation left the original Syriac or Greek words of our Lord and came to belong to the Latin words 'Hoc est corpus meum!' Whether on that occasion Jesus spake Syriac or Greek is an inquiry we may not be able to answer; but certainly those Latin words are no more like the words he used than are the

The words 'This is my body' have been thought by some more appropriate to the Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation, or to the old notion of impanation, according to which the consecrated bread becomes by incorporation a new body for the Spirit of Christ, or to the undefined form of a real presence, which is held by some Episcopalians, who renounce transubstantiation as being, in the words of the twenty-ninth article, 'repugnant to the plain words of Scripture.'

The reformed churches interpret the words of our Lord as figurative, that is, just as the Latin fathers interpreted them. They say, as Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine said long before them, 'The Lord called the bread his body.' The passover was a commemorative service by appropriate emblems; and so was 'the Lord's Supper' instituted in connection with, or immediately after, its celebration. As the paschal lamb, the unleavened bread, the bitter herbs, the cups of wine, were significant memorials, so is 'the cup of blessing which we bless the communion of the blood of Christ,' and the bread which we break the communion of the body of Christ.' According to this interpretation the words of our Lord mean 'This represents my body which is given for you.'

In the extract from Justin Martyr a sentence occurs of considerable importance, if theologians could agree about its meaning, in enabling us to ascertain the prevalent opinion of Christians in the second century respecting the change which was supposed to be wrought in the bread and wine of the Eucharist. 'We do not receive these as common bread and common drink; but in what manner Jesus Christ, having become incarnate by the Word of God, had flesh and blood for our salvation, in that manner also we have been taught that the Eucharistic food, by the prayer of the word, from which our flesh and blood are nourished by transmutation (κατὰ μεταβολήν), is also the flesh and blood of the incarnate Jesus.' Is this the doctrine of transubstantiation? Or is it consubstantiation? Or is it impanation? Or is it highly figurative language? Or is it absolute nonsense?

The last inquiry is that of the late Principal Cunningham, who boldly answers it in the affirmative, and assures us that 'if we could call up its author, and interrogate him on the subject, he would be utterly unable to tell us what he meant when he wrote it' (Theology of the Reformation, p. 232). As we cannot call him before us, and are not bold enough to dismiss him in quite so summary a manner, we must be content to let every party make what it can of his somewhat obscure language.

As he speaks of a transmutation, Roman Catholics universally claim the sanction of his venerable authority. But the words, by a transmutation (κατὰ μεταβολήν), refer not to any transmutation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, but to the change which takes place by the assimilation of bread and wine in the nourishment of our bodies. This being considered, the passage does not appear so favourable as many think to the doctrine of transubstantiation. It should also be observed, that Justin calls the Eucharistic elements bread and wine, when he distinguishes them from common bread and wine; but Dr. Wiseman says, that to call the elements bread and wine after they are consecrated is subversive of transubstantiation.

As Justin calls the Eucharistic elements, as they are after the thanksgiving, bread and wine, and also the flesh and blood of Jesus, Lutheran divines have very confidently claimed his testimony as being decidedly in favour of consubstantiation.

Others, with some plausibility, have maintained that Justin is to be understood as meaning that in the Eucharistic service there is a repetition of the incarnation of Christ when the divine nature is incorporated with the bread and wine, which thus become the true body of Christ, though not the same body as that which was crucified. The particles of Christ's body thus becoming by assimilation united to the bodies of the communicants, are the germs of immortality and the principles of their resurrection bodies. This form of the doctrine of the real presence, apparently held by several of the Fathers, has been called impanation. It, or something very like it, seems to have been held by Irenæus, who says, 'As bread taken from the earth is, on the invocation of God, no longer common bread but Eucharist, consisting of two substances, the earthly and the heavenly; so our bodies partaking of the Eucharist are no longer corruptible, but have the hope of the everlasting resurrection' (Adv. Hæres., lib. iv., c. 34).

From this root grew, though slowly, the doctrine of transubstantiation, although in the middle ages it was strenuously opposed by some of the greatest theologians of Europe, as in the ninth century by Raban Maurus, archbishop of Mentz, and Bertram, abbot of Corbey; in the tenth century, by Ælfric the grammarian, whose letters to Wulfstan, archbishop of York, and Wulfsin, bishop of Sherbourn, have been preserved in the cathedral libraries of Worcester and Exeter; and in the eleventh century by Berenger, archdeacon of Angers. All controversy was for ever closed on this subject in the Romish Church by the decree of the Council of Trent, which declares that 'by the consecration of the bread and wine a conversion is made of the whole substance of the bread into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord, and of the whole substance of the wine into the substance of his blood' (Sess. xiii., c. 4).

'This do for the remembrance of me.'—These words, preserved by Luke and Paul, teach us the meaning and intention of the service. It is a commemorative observance, the authorised commemoration of the death of Christ. This most Christians admit, though many contend that it is also something more than a commemoration.

Roman Catholics assert that in the sacrament of the Eucharist the body and blood of Christ are offered a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the living and the dead. It is understood that they are offered especially for the sins of the person on whose behalf the mass is said, whether he be a living man or soul in purgatory. As Catholics cannot believe that the body of Christ is put to death in the Eucharistic service, we may inquire how it is sacrificed upon the altar? or how 'an unbloody sacrifice,' as they call it, of a human body can be any sacrifice at all?

In support of this doctrine, the only argument we can discover independent of the authority of the church, is the frequent mention of sacramental oblations and sacrifices in the writings of the Fathers.

Justin Martyr speaks of the Eucharist as an offering and sacrifice—'Concerning the sacrifices which are offered by us in every place, that is the bread of the Eucharist' (Dial. c. Tryph., c. 117). But 'the offering of the bread of the Eucharist' is very different from the offering of the body of Christ for sin. On these words Justin himself supplies the best commentary in the words already cited, 'When the bread and a cup of wine and water are brought to the president, he offers praise and thanksgiving to the Father of all.' In the Dialogue he also says (c. 117), 'That prayer and thanksgivings offered by the worthy are the only perfect and acceptable sacrifices (θυσίαι). For them only Christians have received a command to offer at the commemoration of their dry and wet food (bread and wine), in which they commemorate the sufferings that the Son of God endured for them.'

Irenæus and Tertullian used the words 'oblation' and 'sacrifice' in reference to the Eucharist in the same manner as did Justin, and as they designated other acts of religious worship. In doing so, they followed the example not only of Justin, but of the inspired writers, 'Let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually.' No one can suppose that by the sacrifice of praise is intended a propitiatory sacrifice for sin.

A different signification of the words oblation and sacrifice is found in Cyprian (Tract. x. 12), 'Think you that you celebrate the Lord's Supper who entirely neglect the offering, who come into the Lord's house without a sacrifice, and take part of that sacrifice which the poor have offered?' By the offering and sacrifice Cyprian intended the offering of bread, wine, or other things needful to the church at the communion, without reference to any official act of a priest. This sense of the words may be found in later writers, though gradually a more literal and unevangelic spirit was given to them, until the table became an altar, the president a priest, and the bread the host or sacrifice offered for sin, and given to the communicant in assurance that the propitiatory sacrifice had been offered for his sins.

The Lutherans, though maintaining the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament, do not represent them as offered a propitiatory sacrifice for sin. Some high Lutherans have on this subject, as on some others, used language not unlike that of Catholic divines, but they generally regard the benefit of the Eucharist to consist in eating the flesh of Christ and drinking his blood. It would not be right to charge them with holding the old notion of some of the fathers that by our eating the body of Christ some particles of it become incorporated with our bodies, and so make them immortal, though it is not easy to say what other than some such physical benefit can be attributed to the actual eating of the true body or drinking of the true blood of Christ.

The doctrine of the Greek church respecting the Eucharist, with which corresponds generally the doctrine of the Eastern churches, is thus stated in The Orthodox Doctrine of the Apostolic Eastern Church, translated by A. Coray, and recommended by the ecclesiastical authorities of the Greek Church in England, 'The Holy Eucharist is a sacrament in which the believer receives, under the form of bread, the body itself of Christ; and under the form of wine, the blood itself of Christ, to the remission of sins and eternal life' (Article xxxiv.) In the exposition of this article is the following account of the celebration of the Eucharist in the Greek Church :—' As soon as the community of the Lord are assembled, the Psalms are sung to the glory of the Highest; the priest then, after reciting several prayers from Scripture, begins, in conformity with the example of Christ, to glorify and thank the heavenly Father, to relate his benefits to mankind, and especially his having sent on earth for our salvation his only begotten Son to die for our sins, thanking God most heartily, in the name of the whole Church, for all these privileges. After this he blesses the holy gifts, invokes the Holy Ghost, partakes himself first of the Holy Eucharist, and then administers it to all the other communicants in both kinds.' In the same exposition the benefits of communicating are thus stated, 'The Holy Eucharist causes our obtaining Christ. Accordingly the communicant becomes spiritually one with Christ, as he himself saith, He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me, and I in him.'

The doctrine of Zwingle is sufficiently plain, though wherein it differed from that of Calvin is not so obvious. According to him the Lord's Supper is the authorised commemoration of the death of Christ, in which the bread and wine are appropriate emblems of his body broken for us and his blood shed for us, suggesting to the devout communicant profitable thoughts of evangelical truth, and so strengthening the divine life within him. Of Calvin's views of the sacrament, Dr. Hill in his 'Theological Lectures' says, 'He (Calvin) thought that the system of Zwinglius did not come up to the force of the expressions used in Scripture, and although he did not approve of the manner in which the Lutherans explain those expressions, it appeared to him that there was a sense in which the full significance of them might be preserved, and a great part of the Lutheran language might continue to be used. As he agreed with Zwinglius in thinking that the bread and wine were the signs of the body and blood of Christ, which were not locally present, he renounced both transubstantiation and consubstantiation. He agreed further with Zwinglius in thinking that the use of these signs, being a memorial of the sacrifice once offered on the cross, was intended to produce a moral effect. But he taught that, to all who remember the death of the Saviour in a proper manner, Christ is by the use of these signs spiritually present—present to their minds; and he considered this spiritual presence as giving a significance that goes far beyond the Socinian sense to the words.'

In this statement of Calvin's doctrine there appears nothing which Zwingle would not readily have acknowledged. If Calvin thought with Zwingle that the body of Christ was not locally present, Zwingle would quite as readily have agreed with Calvin that it was 'spiritually present to the minds' of devout communicants—that is, it was the object of their devout contemplations. It is very true that Calvin sometimes spoke as if he attributed to the emblems of the sacrament a real presence of Christ's body in a more literal sense than Zwingle and Carlostadt, as when he says, 'a spiritual presence may be as real as a corporeal presence.' But the real presence of a body must be a corporeal presence; and if the body be not corporeally present, it is present only spiritually, in which Zwingle would cordially have agreed with

As to the coincidence of the opinions of Zwingle with those of the Socinians, while he and they differed so widely respecting the evangelical truth, they could have maintained very little agreement in their interpretation of the emblems by which it is represented. With regard to the benefits derived from devout communion in the Eucharist, the difference between Zwingle and Calvin seems to have been more defined and certain. Zwingle was disposed to regard the sacraments chiefly, if not exclusively, as emblems of evangelical truth; Calvin looked rather to their spiritual influence, by which they wrought as means of grace upon the hearts of devout communicants. With Zwingle they were signs of truth; with Calvin seals of grace. But even here the difference between them has been often exaggerated, especially by Lutheran writers. Thus Mosheim says, 'Zwingle asserted that all Christians without distinction, regenerate or unregenerate, could be partakers of the body and blood of Christ; Calvin confined the privilege to the pious and regenerate alone.' What can these words mean more than an assertion, on the part of Zwingle, that all men could partake of the sacramental emblems, and another assertion on the part of Calvin that only the pious could derive any benefit from the participation? In the two apparent counter-statements there is no real contrariety.

In an interesting article of the late Principal Cunningham, on 'Zwingle and the Doctrine of the Sacraments,' reprinted from the Brit. and For. Evang. Review, Oct. 1860, he notices three great general principles which guided Zwingle in the formation of his doctrine of the sacraments. 1st, 'That great care should be taken to avoid anything which may appear to trench upon the grace of God, the meritorious efficacy of Christ's work, and the almighty agency of his Spirit, in bestowing upon men all spiritual blessings.' 2d, 'That whatever external means of grace may have been appointed, and in whatever way those means may operate, God must not be held to be tried or restricted in the communication of spiritual benefits to the use of anything of an external kind, though he has himself appointed and prescribed it.' 3d, 'That the most important matter connected with the subject of the sacraments is the state of mind and heart of the recipient; and that with respect to this the essential thing is, that the state of mind and heart of the recipient should correspond with the outward act which, in participating of the sacrament, he performs.'

Of these several views, it will probably be acknowledged that Presbyterians generally adhere to the doctrine of Calvin; that Congregationalists more generally incline to the views of Zwingle; while in the formularies of the Episcopal churches several expressions may be attributed to the influence of Melancthon and other Lutheran divines.

The remarks which we have made in reference to the nature and design of the Lord's Supper, as they are taught by the words 'This do for the remembrance of me;' will enable us to notice more briefly the part of the evangelists' account which refers to the communion in the cup of wine. 'He took the cup.' Although Matthew, Mark, Luke, and Paul say, Jesus 'took the cup;' no one of them tells us what liquid it contained. That it contained wine there can be no reasonable doubt; but whether it was fermented or unfermented, undiluted or mingled with water, has been the subject of frequent controversy. We may with good reason suppose that our Lord took a cup of the wine which was usually drunk at the passover, and that we have no doubt was fermented wine diluted with water. That it was fermented we infer from the frequent references of Jewish authorities to the reason for introducing it at the paschal feast, to cheer and exhilarate the company in remembrance of their possession of the promised land; which exhilaration, we presume, could not be got out of water in which raisins had been steeped, though in later times it has been the Jewish practice to provide unfermented wine. The later practice has arisen from the excessive scrupulosity of the Jews about the presence of leaven in the wine of the passover.

So customary was it for the Jews to 'mingle their cup,' when they 'furnished their table,' that we should expect to find the custom observed at the passover. The rabbinical authorities confirm such expectation, as they give very particular directions about the due proportions of the mingled water and wine. That this was the practice of the early Christians in celebrating the Eucharist, is evident from many citations of the fathers. Thus in the account of Justin we read, 'Bread and a cup of wine and water are brought to the president.' Irenæus speaks of the diluted cup (temperamentum calicis), and of the mingled cup (mistus calix). Reference is made to the mingled drink (the κράνα of the Greeks and mistum of the Latins) by Cyprian, Clement of Alexandria, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Augustine, Theodoret, and many other Greek and Latin writers. In the Romish Church, the mingling of wine and water is not only retained, but elevated into a great mystery and symbol of the blood and water which flowed from the wounded side of Jesus. An ancient sect mentioned by Epiphanius used only water, and another milk instead of wine.

'He gave thanks;' as he did before the breaking of the bread.

'He gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it.' In Mark it is said, 'And they all drank of it.' In the Corinthian church the people, even the unworthy communicants, drank of the cup as well as ate of the bread. According to Justin Martyr, distribution was made to all present of the eucharistic bread and wine, after which the deacons carried them to the absent. Reference is so frequently made by the early Christian writers to the communion of 'the cup of the Lord,' 'the cup of life,' 'the cup of blessing,' 'the cup of mixture,' that Romish writers readily admit that in refusing the cup to the laity they have departed from the primitive practice, and they plead the authority of the church to do so on account of its frequent abuse. In the middle ages considerable variety of usage may be observed. At one time the practice prevailed to a considerable extent of dipping the bread in the wine and then giving it to the communicants; at another, of giving the wine without the bread, when infants were allowed to communicate. Before the denial of the cup to the people became the general practice of the Latin church, a usage arose in many places of consecrating two cups of wine, one for the priests, the other for the laity. The cup of the priests represented but too faithfully their arrogant assumption of exclusive honour and privilege in the Church of Christ. The Greek and Eastern Churches strenuously maintain the right of the people to participate in the cup. So strong is the feeling in favour of the communion in both kinds in the East, that the pope has under certain circumstances been induced to concede the cup to the people in the congregations which have been gathered by Romish missionaries in Eastern countries.

'For this is my blood, that of the New Covenant, which is shed for many for the remission of sins,' are the words of Matthew. Mark omits the clause 'for the remission of sins.' According to Luke and Paul, our Lord said, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood.' As the several writers do not profess to give the precise words of our Lord, who probably spoke in a different language, it is not possible for us to determine the exact formula which was used by him. In reply to an objection which has been brought against the literal interpretation of the words, 'This is my blood,' from the parallel passage, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood,' Cardinal Wiseman very ingeniously says, 'A cup cannot be a covenant, and, therefore, the phrases are not parallel.' It is not said, 'This is the new covenant,' but 'this cup is the new covenant;' but it is said, 'This (not this bread) is my body,' and 'This (not this cup) is my blood.' (See his Lectures on the Sacrament.)

Did Jesus himself partake of the bread and wine at the institution of the Eucharist? Romanists strenuously contend that he did not; for if he did, he must, according to their doctrine, have eaten and drunken himself, his whole person, human and divine. This is startling, though it seems to us no more incredible than that he held himself in his own hand, brake himself to pieces, and gave himself, his whole and undivided person, to every one of his disciples separately. As to the inference which has been deduced in favour of this opinion from the words of our Lord, 'I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom;' we do not see how these words can prove that our Lord did not drink of that cup, when the similar words respecting the passover, 'I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God,' certainly do not prove that Jesus did not eat of that passover.

Matthew and Mark say, 'When they had sung a hymn they went out.' What connection, if any, this singing of a hymn had with the sacramental institution it may not be easy to say, as it is not possible to ascertain how much of the interesting conversation of the evening occurred between the supper and the singing, or between the singing and the going out. The hymn was probably one of the Psalms which constituted the hallelujah of the Paschal service as it was observed by the Jews of the later times. A hymn of praise seems to be an appropriate close of the Eucharistic feast, and in many churches it is sung in imitation of our Lord's example. Among the ancient Christians the singing seems to have preceded the communion service, 'Ye hear the chanter with a sacred tune calling you to the communion of the holy mysteries, and saying, O taste, and see that the Lord is good' (Cyril, Lect. in Myst. v. 17). The thirty-fourth Psalm is prescribed in the Apostolic Constitutions, but other Psalms were sung in different churches. Appropriate as is the song of praise, we cannot but feel how strange is the desecration of this solemn rite, when it is converted into a musical service, as it often is by the Latin and Greek church, in honour of some event of national interest, as a royal marriage, a signal victory, or a successful revolution.

Of the names of this institution we may observe that it is called in Scripture 'the breaking of bread,' as well as the Lord's Supper (Acts ii. 42). If not Scriptural, yet very early names of the service were, 'the Communion,' and 'the Eucharist.' The former may claim apostolic sanction. 'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ' (1 Cor. x. 16)? The latter is appropriate, as it is especially a thanksgiving service. At the institution, Jesus 'gave thanks' over both the bread and the wine. Justin Martyr calls the bread and wine 'Eucharistic food,' and the early Christians named the whole service the Eucharist or thanksgiving, and occasionally the Eulogia or blessing.

As to the time and frequency of the observance, it was daily observed by the first Christians, as it is now every morning in the Catholic churches. Some Christians observe it regularly on the first day of the week, and contend that they follow the practice of the apostolic churches, who 'came together' on 'the first day of the week' 'to break bread.' This was the custom of Christians in the time of Pliny, when they assembled for the purpose in the early morning of Sunday. Some scrupulously communicate on the great church festivals, especially at Christmas and Easter. No good Catholics, except in extremis, commune on Good Friday. Some foreign Protestants solemnise, by its observance, the most interesting events of domestic and social life, as on coming of age, marriage, and the birth of a child. Many assert that Christian churches are left to regulate, on considerations of expediency and mutual improvement, the time and frequency of observing the communion, for 'as often,' whether it be once a week, or once a month, or once a year, as they 'eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, they shew the Lord's death until he come.'

Some few Christians, generally, though not always, belonging to the Society of Friends, deny the obligation of the continued observance of the Lord's Supper. They do so, asserting that under the gospel all ritual observances are abolished, and that, without ceremonial or emblem, God is to be worshipped in spirit and in truth. To account for 'the breaking of bread' in the apostolic churches, it is sometimes said, that like the continued practice of circumcision for a time, and the distinction of certain meats, it was a temporary concession to Jewish prejudice. (See a pamphlet entitled, The Eucharist not an Ordinance of the Christian Church.) But the reply is obvious. Circumcision and the distinction of meats belonged to Judaism, and therefore for some time were conceded to Jewish Christians, but the Lord's Supper was no part of the Jewish ritual, but a new institute peculiarly Christian in its nature and design. Another explanation is offered by J. J. Gurney, in his Observations on the Peculiarities of the Society of Friends, p. 126, 'Our Lord's injunction may be understood as intended to give a religious direction to the more common social repasts of his disciples.' In reply, it is said, The Lord's Supper was not a common social repast: the disciples came together to break bread; the hungry were to eat at home, for they had houses to eat and drink in; they were to tarry for one another.

With regard to the Christian profession and character of the communicants, we shall only say, 'Whosoever shall eat this bread and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord' (1 Cor. xi. 29).

As Justin speaks of a contribution made on the occasion for the poor and destitute, so in many churches there is connected with the service an offertory or collection for the poor, the distribution of which is intrusted to the minister, elders, deacons, or other officers of the church.—R. H.

LOT (לֹט, a covering; Sept. Λῳτ), son of Haran and nephew of Abraham, who by the early death of his father had already come into possession of his property when Abraham went into the land of Canaan (Gen. xi. 31). Their united substance, consisting chiefly in cattle, was not then too large to prevent them from living together in one encampment. Eventually, however, their possessions were so greatly increased, that they were obliged to separate; and Abraham with rare generosity conceded the choice of pasture-grounds to his nephew. Lot availed himself of this liberality of his uncle, as he deemed most for his own advantage, by fixing his abode at Sodom, that his flocks might pasture in and around that fertile and well-watered neighbourhood (Gen. xiii. 5-13). He had soon very great reason to regret this choice; for although his flocks fed well, his soul was starved in that vile place, the inhabitants of which were sinners before the Lord exceedingly. There 'he vexed his righteous soul from day to day with the filthy conversation of the wicked' (2 Pet. ii. 7).

About eight years after his separation from Abraham (B.C. 1913), Lot was carried away prisoner by Chedorlaomer, along with the other inhabitants of Sodom, and was rescued and brought back by Abraham (Gen. xiv.), as related under other heads [ABRAHAM; CHEDORLAOMER]. This exploit procured for Abraham much celebrity in Canaan; and it ought to have procured for Lot respect and gratitude from the people of Sodom, who had been delivered from hard slavery and restored to their homes on his account. But this does not appear to have been the result.

At length the guilt of 'the cities of the plain' brought down the signal judgments of Heaven. The avenging angels, after having been entertained by Abraham, repaired to Sodom, where they were received and entertained by Lot, who was sitting in the gate of the town when they arrived. While they were at supper the house was beset by a number of men, who demanded that the strangers should be given up to them, for the unnatural purposes which have given a name of infamy to Sodom in all generations. Lot resisted this demand, and was loaded with abuse by the vile fellows outside on that account. They had nearly forced the door, when the angels, thus awfully by their own experience convinced of the righteousness of the doom they came to execute, smote them with instant blindness, by which their attempts were rendered abortive, and they were constrained to disperse. Towards morning the angels apprised Lot of the doom which hung over the place, and urged him to hasten thence with his family. He was allowed to extend the benefit of this deliverance to the families of his daughters who had married in Sodom; but the warning was received by those families with incredulity and insult, and he therefore left Sodom accompanied only by his wife and two daughters. As they went, being hastened by the angels, the wife, anxious for, those who had been left behind, or reluctant to remove from the place which had been long her home, and where much valuable property was necessarily left behind, lingered behind the rest, and was suddenly involved in the destruction, by which—smothered and stiffened as she stood by saline incrustations—she became ‘a pillar of salt.’

Lot and his daughters then hastened on to Zoar, the smallest of the five cities of the plain, which had been spared on purpose to afford him a refuge; but being fearful, after what had passed, to remain among a people so corrupted, he soon retired to a cavern in the neighbouring mountains, and there abode. After some stay in this place, the daughters of Lot became apprehensive lest the family of their father should be lost for want of descendants, than which no greater calamity was known or apprehended in those times; and in the belief that, after what had passed in Sodom, there was no hope of their obtaining suitable husbands, they, by a contrivance which has in it the taint of Sodom, in which they were brought up, made their father drunk with wine, and in that state seduced him into an act which, as they well knew, would in soberness have been most abhorrent to him. They thus became the mothers, and he the father, of two sons, named Moab and Ammon, from whom sprung the Moabites and Ammonites, so often mentioned in the Hebrew history (Gen. xix.) This circumstance is the last which the Scripture records of the history of Lot; and the time and place of his death are unknown.

The difficulties which the narrative that we have sketched has been supposed to involve may be reduced to two—the death of Lot's wife, and the conduct of his daughters. With respect to the former of these, whatever difficulty has been connected with the subject has arisen from the ridiculous notions which have been connected with it, for which no authority is found in the Scriptural narrative. It has been supposed that the woman was literally turned into a pillar of salt, and that this pillar stood for many ages, if it does not still exist, as a standing monument of the transaction. Indeed, sundry old travellers have averred that they had seen it; and no doubt they did see something which they supposed to be the pillar into which Lot's wife was turned, or were told to be such. This notion originated with the author of the Wisdom of Solomon, which was regarded by the Roman Catholics as Scriptural authority that might not be disputed. Therefore old pilgrims and travellers sought for this monument; and, from their example, more modern travellers have done the same: although, if Protestants, they could attach no particular weight to the authority which alone justified their predecessors in their hopes of finding it. The passage referred to is that in which the author, after alluding to the punishment of Sodom and the denunciation of Lot, adverts to the existing evidence of the same, and then adds, somewhat vaguely, ἀρισφύχης μνημείον ἐστὶν κίονα στήλην ἄλως, ‘a pillar of salt is a monument of an unbeliever.’ This was no doubt the authority upon which, indeed, we find it expressly quoted by some old travellers as the ground of their expectation. But the testimony of Josephus is still more explicit, and with us would be quite as authoritative. He expressly says not only that the monument existed, but that he had seen it (Antiq. i. 11. 4). His contemporary, Clement of Rome, makes a similar statement (Epist. i. sec. 11); and so, in the next century, does Irenæus (iv. 51, 64). But their evidence is of little original value on a point like this. Josephus and the author of Wisdom no doubt believed what they stated: and their testimony amounts to this, that in their day an object existed which was said to be the pillar into which Lot's wife was turned, and which they believed to be such. But in the present day, when the sources of historical evidence are more carefully investigated than in former times, we regard these authorities, 2000 years after the event, as having no particular weight, unless so far as they may be supported by anterior probabilities and documents, which in this case do not exist. Further, it is all but impossible that if so strange a monument had existed on the borders of the Dead Sea, it should not have been noticed by the sacred historians, and alluded to by the poets: and we may be almost certain that if it had remained when the book of Genesis was written, the frequent formula, that it was there ‘unto this day,’ would not have been omitted. Indeed there is every probability that, if such a monument had then existed, the Canaanites would have made it one of their idols. The expression of our Lord, ‘Remember Lot's wife’ (Luke xvii. 32), appears from the context to be solely intended as an illustration of the danger of going back or delaying in the day of God's judgments. From this text, indeed, it would appear as if Lot's wife had gone back, or had tarried so long behind, in the desire of saving some of their property. Then, as it would seem, she was struck dead, and became a stiffened corpse, fixed for the time to the soil by saline or bituminous incrustations. The particle of similitude must here, as in many other passages of Scripture, be understood—‘like a pillar of salt.’

With respect to Lot's daughters, Whiston and others are unable to see any wicked intention in them. He admits that the incest was a horrid crime, except under the unavoidable necessity which apparently rendered it the only means of preserving the human race: and this justifying necessity he holds to have existed in their minds, as they appear to have believed that all the inhabitants of the land had been destroyed except their father and themselves. But it is incredible that they could have entertained any such belief. The city of Zoar had been spared, and they had been there. The wine also with which they made their father drunk must have been procured from men, as we cannot suppose they had brought it with them from Sodom. The fact would therefore seem to be that, after the fate of their sisters, who had married men of Sodom and perished with them, they became alive to the danger and impropriety of marrying with the natives of the land, and of the importance of preserving the family connection. The force of this consideration was afterwards seen in Abraham's sending to the seat of his family in Mesopotamia for a wife to Isaac. But Lot's daughters could not go there to seek husbands; and the only branch of their own family within many hundred miles was that of Abraham, whose only son, Ishmael, was then a child. This, therefore, must have appeared to them the only practicable mode in which the house of their father could be preserved. Their making their father drunk, and their solicitous concealment of what they did from him, shew that they despaired of persuading him to an act which, under any circumstances, and with every possible extenuation, must have been very distressing to so good a man. That he was a good man is evinced by his deliverance from among the guilty, and is affirmed by St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 7); his preservation is alluded to by our Saviour (Luke xvii. 28, etc.); and in Deut. ii. 9, 19, and Ps. lxxxiii. 8, his name is used to designate the Moabites and Ammonites, his descendants.—J. K.

LOT (לֹט, sometimes written לוֹט) is mentioned in two passages of Scripture, in both of which it is erroneously translated myrrh in the A. V. In Gen. xxxvii. 25, 'Behold a company of Ishmeelites came from Gilead, with their camels bearing spicery (neoth), and balm (tseri), and myrrh (lot), going to carry it down to Egypt.' Again, in chap. xliii. 11, Jacob directs his sons to take into Egypt 'of the best fruits in the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm (tseri) and a little honey, spices (neoth) and myrrh (lot), nuts (botnim) and almonds (shakadim). In this enumeration, in one case, of merchandise, and in the other, of several articles intended for a present, and both destined for Egypt, at that time a highly civilized nation, it is evident that we are to look only for such substances as were likely to be acceptable in that country, and therefore not such as were produced there, or as were more easily procurable from elsewhere than from Syria, as was the case with myrrh, which was never produced in Syria, and could not have been an article of export from thence. This difficulty has been felt by others, and various translations of lot have been proposed, as lotus, chestnuts, mastiche, stacte, balsam, turpentine, pistachio nuts. Junius and Tremellius render it ladanum, which is suitable, and appears to be correct.

Ladanum, or gum ladanum, as it is often called, was known to the Greeks as early as the times of Herodotus and Theophrastus, and bore the names of ladon and ladanon, which are very closely allied to ladun, the Arabic name of the same drug. It has been well observed by Rosenmüller that the proper root and origin of these names is lad, but that the Hebrew has the hard consonant t instead of the softer d, of which letters many permutations are to be found in these, as well as in other languages. A Hebrew author, as quoted by Celsius (Hierobot. i. p. 281), says, 'Est aroma, ex succo arboris cujusdam proveniens.' Ladanum is described by Herodotus as particularly fragrant, though gathered from the beards of goats, where it is found sticking. This is explained by referring to the description of Dioscorides, from which we learn that goats, after browsing upon the leaves of the ladanum plants, necessarily have this viscid substance adhering to their hair and beards, whence it is afterwards scraped off. Tournefort, in modern times, has given a detailed description of the mode of obtaining ladanum, and relates that it is now gathered by means of a kind of rake with whip-like thongs, which is passed over the plants. When these thongs are loaded with the odoriferous and sticky resin, they are scraped with a knife, and the substance rolled into a mass, in which state it is called ladanum or labdanum. It consists of resin and volatile oil, and is highly fragrant, and stimulant as a medicine, but is often adulterated with sand in commerce. The ladanum which is used in Europe is collected chiefly in the Greek isles, and also in continental Greece. It is yielded by species of the genus Cistus (especially by C. creticus), which are known in this country by the name of Rock Rose. They are natives of the south of Europe, the Mediterranean islands, and the north of Africa. Species are also found in Judæa; and C. creticus in some parts of Syria. Some authors have been of opinion that one species, the Cistus roseus, is more likely than any other to be the Rose of Sharon, as it is very common in that locality, while nothing like a true rose is to be found there. Ladanum seems to have been produced in Judæa, according to writers in the Talmud (Cels. loc. cit. p. 286). It is said by Pliny, as long before by Herodotus, to be a produce of Arabia, though this has not been proved to be the case in modern times. Sufficient, however, has been adduced to show that ladanum was known to, and esteemed by, the ancients, and as its Greek and Arabic names are similar to the Hebrew, and as it is stated to have been a produce of Syria, it was very likely to have been sent to Egypt both as a present and as merchandise.—J. LOTS, FEAST OF. [PURIM.]

LOVE-FEASTS. [AGAPE.]

LÖWE, JOEL B. JEHUDAH LOEB, also called

Bril בְּרִיל from the initials לֹבֵב יְהוּדָה לֹבֵב Ben R. Jehudah Loeb, was born about 1740, and died in Breslau, Feb. 11, 1802. He was a distinguished disciple of Moses Mendelssohn, and professor in the William school at Breslau, where he wrote most of his numerous works which are such valuable contributions to Biblical exegesis and literature. Those of his productions which bear on the Bible are as follows—(1.) A commentary on the Song of Songs with an elaborate introduction, which he wrote conjointly with Wolfsohn to Mendelssohn's German translation of this book, Berlin 1788, republished in Prague 1803, Lemberg 1817. (2.) Annotations on Ecclesiastes, which he wrote conjointly with Wolfsohn, and which were published with Mendelssohn's commentary on this book and Friedländer's German translation, Berlin 1788. (3.) A commentary on the book of Jonah, with a German translation, Berlin 1788. (4.) A commentary on the Psalms, with an extensive introduction (זמירות)

(ישראל עם באור), in which he gives an elaborate treatise on the musical instruments of the ancient Hebrews as well as on Hebrew poetry, and which was published with Mendelssohn's German translation of this book, Berlin 1785-91. (5.) A German translation and Hebrew commentary on the Sabbatic and Festival Lessons from the Pentateuch and the Prophets [HAPHTARA], Berlin 1790-91. (6.) A literal German translation of the Pentateuch for beginners, preparatory to Mendelssohn's version, Breslau 1818. (7.) A Hebrew grammar, entitled עמודי הלשון, the Elements of the Hebrew language developed according to logical principles, a Handbook for teachers, Berlin 1794, republished in Prague 1803. He also wrote a number of articles on Biblical subjects, both in Hebrew and German, which are published in various quarterlies, and of which the following are the most important—a. Notes on Joshua and the Song of Songs, in Eichhorn's Allgemeine Bibliothek, vol. ii., Leipzig 1789, p. 183, ff. b. A treatise on Personification of the Deity and the Sephiroth, ibid., vol. v., Leipzig 1793, p. 378, ff. LOWTH, ROBERT, was born at Boriton, or, as some will have it, in the Close of Winchester, November 27, 1710. He was educated on the foundation of Winchester College, where he displayed his poetical talent at a very early age, and from whence he was elected to a scholarship at New College in 1730, and took his degree of M.A. in 1737. He became professor of poetry in 1741, was presented to the rectory of Ovington in Hampshire in 1744, was appointed to the archdeaconry of Winchester in 1750, and to the rectory of East-Woodhay in Hampshire in 1753. It was in this year that Lowth published his famous Prælectiones Academicae de Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum, Oxon. 1753, comprising thirty-four lectures, which he had previously read to the students at Oxford when poetical professor. In these masterly and classical dissertations he not only evinces a deep knowledge of the Hebrew language, but philosophically exhibits the true spirit and characteristics of that poetry in which the prophets of the O. T. clothed the lively oracles of God. It does not at all detract from Lowth's merits that both Abravanel and Azariah de Rossi had pointed out, two centuries before him, the same features of Hebrew poetry [ROSSI] upon which he expatiates, inasmuch as the enlarged views and the invincible arguments displayed in his handling of the subject are peculiarly his own; and his work is therefore justly regarded as marking a new epoch in the treatment of the Hebrew poetry. The greatest testimony to the extraordinary merits of these lectures is the thorough analysis which the celebrated philosopher Mendelssohn, to whom the Hebrew was almost vernacular, gives of them in the Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften und der freyen Künste, vol. i., 1756. A second edition, enlarged with annotations by Michaelis, appeared in Göttingen, 1758. Other editions were published in Oxford 1763, Göttingen 1768, Oxford 1775, 1810; with notes by Rosenmüller, Leipzig 1815, Oxford 1821. An English translation of the first eighteen lectures, by Dr. Dodd, appeared in the Christian Magazine for 1766-67, and an excellent version of the whole by Dr. Gregory was published in London 1787, 1816, 1835, 1839, 1847. So rapidly did the fame of this work spread over Europe, that it was translated into German by Schmidt, Danzig 1793; and into French by Sicard, Lyon 1812. Twelve months after the appearance of the Prælectiones the University of Oxford conferred upon their author the degree of doctor of divinity. Lowth subjoined to the Prælectiones A short Confutation of Bishop Hare's System of Hebrew Metre, which had appeared in a new edition of the Psalms by Bishop Hare (1736), and was afterwards translated into English in 1755. The Harian metre was, however, defended by Dr. Edwards, both in his Prolegomena in Libros Veteris Testamenti Poeticos, 1762, and in a Latin epistle, 1765. To this Lowth replied the following year in a pamphlet addressed to Dr. Edwards, entitled A larger Confutation of Bishop Hare's System of Hebrew Metre, London 1766, reprinted in his Memoir and Remains, by the Rev. Peter Hall, London 1834, which is also a very important contribution to Biblical Literature. The same year (1766) he was promoted in June to the see of St. David's; was translated about four months after to that of Oxford, and thence to the see of London in 1777. He had hardly been twelve months in the metropolis when he published his last and greatest work, entitled Isaiah; a new Translation with a Preliminary Dissertation, and Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory, in which he aimed 'not only to give an exact and faithful representation of the words and sense of the prophet by adhering closely to the letter of the text, and treading as nearly as may be in his footsteps; but, moreover, to imitate the air and manner of the author, to express the form and fashion of the composition, and to give the English reader some notion of the peculiar turn and cast of the original.' In the elaborate and valuable Preliminary Dissertation where Lowth states this, he enters more minutely than in his former production into the form and construction of the poetical compositions of the O. T., lays down principles of criticism for the improvement of all subsequent translations, and frankly alludes to De Rossi's view of Hebrew poetry, which is similar to his own [ROSSI]. This masterly work soon obtained an European fame, and was not only rapidly reprinted in England, but was translated into German by Professor Koppe, who added some valuable notes to it, Göttingen 1779-81, 4 vols. 8vo. But notwithstanding the great merits of his truly classical and erudite contributions to Biblical literature, it must be said that Lowth indulged too freely in conjectural emendations, that he often proceeded very rashly and unwarrantably with the sacred text, and that if succeeding commentators had followed his example in this respect, and taken similar liberties with the respective volumes of the O. T., we should now have had a different Bible. Lowth died November 3, 1787, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, full of years and full of honours. LOWTH, WILLIAM, D.D., was born in London in 1661. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, whence he was elected to a scholarship at St. John's College, Oxford, in 1675, before he had completed his fourteenth year. He became M.A. in 1683, and B.D. in 1688. His first publication was a Vindication of the Divine authority of the O. and N. T., Lond. 1692, in answer to Le Clerc's attacks on the inspiration of Scripture. This brought him to the notice of Bishop Mew of Winchester, who made him his chaplain, and presented him with a prebendal stall at Winchester in 1696, and the living of Buriton with Petersfield in 1699, which preferments he held till his death in 1732. He was less eminent than his son, the Bishop of London, but he was believed to have been the profounder scholar; though such was his modesty that it is rather from his contributions to the works of others than from his own that the extent and depth of his reading are to be estimated. He had carefully read and annotated upon almost every Greek and Latin author, whether profane or ecclesiastical, and he dispensed his stores with a most liberal hand. The edition of Clemens Alexandrinus, by Dr. (afterwards Archbishop) Potter; that of Josephus, by Hudson; and the Ecclesiastical Historians, by Reading, were enriched with valuable notes from his pen, and many other scholars were indebted to his labours for important aid. In addition to the Vindication, of which a second edition appeared in 1699, with an admirable dissertation on the objections against the Pentateuch then current, Lowth published in 1708 Directions for the profitable reading of Holy Scripture, an excellent little work which has gone through many editions. The work with which his name is chiefly connected is his Commentary on the Prophets, originally published in separate portions, between 1714 and 1725, and afterwards collected in a folio volume as a continuation of Bishop Patrick's commentary on the earlier portion of the O. T., in which form it has been frequently reprinted, together with Whitby, Arnald, and Lowman on the N. T. The merits of his commentary were never very great, and it has been long since entirely superseded. Its tone is pious but cold, and he entirely fails to grasp the high spiritual and poetical character of the prophetic writings. Besides, his knowledge of Hebrew was far too small for such a work, his critical discernment was feeble, and in his zeal for Messianic interpretations he too often neglects the first historical sense of a passage. His method of unfolding the meaning of a passage, however, is simple, direct, and brief; and his interpretations, if not always satisfactory, and often shallow, have the merit of being uniformly intelligible, and characterised by good sense.—E. V.

LUBIM, LUBIMS, and in Dan. xi. 43 LIBYANS (לִיבִים; but in Dan. לִיבִים; Libues; Libyes, Libya); in the N. T. LIBYA (Λιβύη). When, during the reign of Rehoboam, Shishak king of Egypt invaded Judah, he was accompanied by 'the Lubims, the Sukkims, and the Ethiopians' (2 Chron. xii. 3); and in all the other passages in which the Lubim are mentioned, they appear as the allies or companions in war of the Ethiopians (Cushim) and Egyptians (2 Chron. xvi. 8; Dan. xi. 43; Nahum iii. 9). From these circumstances, and from the radical identity in name, we infer that they were the inhabitants of the great province of Libya in northern Africa, and that they were identical with the Lehabim who sprung from Mizraim (Gen. x. 13; see LEHABIM).

Originally the Lubims appear to have been dependent on, or under the command of, the Mizraim (Egyptians). In fact, they were just a tribe or family of Mizraim, who, for the sake of distinction, took the name of their more immediate progenitor, and settled down in a district of their own. They appeared to have multiplied with amazing rapidity, and to have early become a powerful nation. Less civilized than the Egyptians, more addicted to the arts of war than peace, being, besides, mainly a pastoral people, they roamed far and wide over the arid plains of northern Africa, and gave their name to a region supposed by ancient geographers to extend from the banks of the Nile to the Atlantic, and from the shores of the Mediterranean to the equator.

Early geographers employed the name Libya in a somewhat vague sense. Sometimes they make it include all Africa; sometimes all except Egypt; and sometimes that region which lies immediately on the west side of Egypt. The truth seems to be that the Greeks were best acquainted with two African nations—the Egyptians and the Libyans. The boundaries of Egypt were known to them, and they gave the name Libya vaguely to the rest of the continent, just as they called the whole of southern Syria Palestine from the Philistines (Homer, Od. iv. 87, seq.; cf. Strabo, book i. generally). Herodotus was the first to give definite information about Libya. He applied the name to all Africa, except Egypt. 'As for Libya, we know it to be washed on all sides by the sea, except where it is attached to Asia;' and he then tells the manner in which Phœnician mariners sailed round the continent from the Red Sea to the mouth of the Nile (iv. 41, 42). He describes the vast deserts of the interior (ii. 32), and the nomad and warlike character of the people (iv. 182, seq.). He classes the Ethiopians and Libyans together, as the sacred writers do (iv. 197). The accounts of Strabo and Ptolemy agree in the main with Herodotus (Strabo, i.; Ptolemy, iv. 4). The physical geography of Libya is remarkable. The country consists of two great belts (Herodotus says thre, iv. 181): 1. A belt of desert running across the whole interior, from east to west, appropriately called Sāhāra, 'the Desert.' It is covered with loose shifting sand, or dry gravelly soil; it is without water; its pastures are very scanty; in some places for scores of miles there is not a blade of grass. But here and there it is dotted with little tracts of fertile ground, green with herbs and trees (Bruce, Travels; Burckhardt, Nubia). This vast and dreary region, with the mountain-ranges along portions of its northern and southern borders, was the home of the warlike and nomad Lubim, as it still is of numerous and powerful Arab tribes. 2. A belt of cultivated ground, in some places narrow, in others stretching far into the interior. At favourable positions along the coast, the Greeks and Phoenicians formed settlements at a very early period. The most celebrated of these colonies was Cyrene, founded by Greeks about 600 years B.C. A large province was in time attached to the city, and took its name [CYRENE]. To this province those belonged who were present at the miraculous gift of tongues on the day of Pentecost, and who are correctly described by Luke as 'dwellers in the parts of Libya about Cyrene' (Acts ii. 10). For full accounts of Libya, see Ritter, Africa; Mannert, Geographie; Heeren, African Nations; Smith, Dict. of G. and R. Geog., s. v.; and the works cited above.—J. L. P.

LUCAS. [LUKE.]

LUCAS, FRANCISCUS (BRUGENSIS), one of the ablest of the Roman Catholic commentators, was born at Bruges in 1549. He studied under Arias Montanus, was a licentiate of theology of Louvain, and Dean of St. Omers, and died at the age of seventy, Feb. 19, 1619. He was celebrated for his knowledge of the sacred languages, and their cognate dialects; and was appointed to superintend the edition of the Biblia Regia, brought out by Plantin, the famous printer of Antwerp, under the auspices of Philip II. of Spain. The work by which he is principally known is his Commentarius in Quatuor Evangelia, Antw. 1606, which was completed by Supplementum Commentar. in Luc. et Joann., Antw. 1612, 1616. The commentary is preceded by a harmony of the gospels under the title of Itinerarium J. Ch., and has appended to it a dissertation on the Chaldee paraphrase. This work originated in his compliance with a request of Plantin that Lucas would compile Scholia on the N. T. similar to those of Vatablus on the O. T. The work grew on his hands and became a commentary, and one of no ordinary merit. Entirely passing by, or alluding in the briefest manner to the mystical sense, and omitting all doctrinal discussions, he explains clearly and concisely the literal meaning, illustrating it frequently from the Greek and Latin fathers, as well as from later writers of authority, though never burdening his pages with lists of conflicting authorities. His plan is a simple one, and judiciously carried out. He chooses one sense, and that the one which the sacred writer appeared to have had in view, and briefly expounds and illustrates that, never distracting his readers with varying interpretations only mentioned to be rejected. Lucas had no mean critical ability, and his knowledge of Greek, Hebrew, and Syriac, was exact and trustworthy. A truly devotional spirit breathes through the whole. He was also the compiler of Notationes in Sac. Bibl., Amst. 1581, with a careful summary of the various readings, which were also appended to the edition of the Vulgate that appeared from the press of Plantin with Emman. Sa's notes, Antw. 1624, under the title Fr. Luca, Roman. correct. in Bibl. Latin. loc. insigniora. He also produced a Concordance of the Vulgate, corrected and augmented by Herbert Phalesius and Benedict of Afflighem, Antw. 1606 (best edition, Antw. 1642).—E. V.

LUCIFER (הַיֵּל; Sept. ὁ Ἑωσφόρος), a word that occurs once in the English Version in the lines—

'How art thou fallen from heaven,
Lucifer, son of the morning!

How art thou felled to the ground,
That didst weaken the nations!'

(Is. xiv. 12). It is taken from the Vulgate, which understood the Hebrew word הַיֵּל hayel, to be the name of the morning star, and therefore rendered it by the Latin name of that star, Lucifer, i. e. 'light-bringing.' This, the popular sense, is conveyed in the note in Barker's Bible: 'Thou that thoughtest thyself most glorious, and as it were placed in the heaven; for the morning starre that goeth before the sunne is called Lucifer, to which Nebuchadnezzar is compared.'

הַיֵּל hayel, the word translated 'Lucifer,' however, occurs also in Ezek. xxi. 12 (Heb. 17), as the imperative of הָלַל halal, 'to howl,' 'to lament,' and is there rendered 'howl.' Some take it in the same acceptance in the above passage, and would translate, 'Howl, son of the morning!' But to this the structure of the verse is entirely opposed; for the parallelism requires the second line to refer entirely to the condition of the star before it had fallen, as the parallel member—the fourth line—does to the state of the tree before it was cut down. This necessity is apparent even in the English version, where the word 'lament,' in the place which 'Lucifer' occupies, would not agree with the context, nor make good sense, or indeed, any sense. Any imperative interjected would spoil the beauty and impair the force of the language. It is from this consideration that we must concur with those who refer the source of the word not to הַיֵּל hayel, but to הָלַל halal, 'to shine,' and regard it as a verbal noun designed to be intensive in its signification. 'Hence it would mean 'brilliant,' 'splendid,' 'illustrious,' or, as in the Septuagint, Vulgate, the Rabbinical commentators, Luther, and others, 'brilliant star;' and if הַיֵּל, in this sense, was the proper name among the Hebrews of the morning star, then 'Lucifer' is not only a correct but beautiful interpretation, both as regards the sense and the application. And that it was such is probable from the fact that the proper name of the morning star is formed by a word or words expressive of brilliance, in the Arabic and Syriac, as well as in the Greek and Latin. Tertullian and Gregory the Great understood this passage of Isaiah in reference to the fall of Satan; in consequence of which the name Lucifer has since been applied to Satan; and this is now the usual acceptance of the word. But Dr. Henderson, who in his Isaiah renders the line, 'Illustrious son of the morning!' justly remarks in his annotation: 'The application of this passage to Satan, and to the fall of the apostate angels, is one of those gross perversions of Sacred Writ which so extensively obtain, and which are to be traced to a proneness to seek for more in any given passage than it really contains, a disposition to be influenced by sound rather than sense, and an implicit faith in received interpretations. "Quum," says Calvin, "temere arripiuntur Scripturæ loci, nec attenditur contextus, hos errores passim oboriri mirum non est"' (Comment. in loc.) The scope and connection shew that none but the king of Babylon is meant. In the figurative language of the Hebrews, כֹּכַב, a star, signifies an illustrious king or prince (Num. xxiv. 17; comp. Rev. ii. 28; xxii. 16). The monarch here referred to having surpassed all other kings in royal splendour, is compared to the harbinger of day, whose brilliancy surpasses that of the surrounding stars. Falling from heaven denotes a sudden political overthrow—a removal from the position of high and conspicuous dignity formerly occupied (comp. Rev. vi. 13; viii. 10).—J. K.

LUCIUS. I. (LXX. Λεύκιος; Ald. Λούκιος; Vulg. Lucius), a Roman consul (ῥωμῶν συνέτακτος), who is recorded as having written a letter to King Ptolemee (Euergetes II., Physcon), in which the old friendship and league was to be renewed with Simon, and the protection of the Romans accorded to him (cir. B.C. 139-138; 1 Maccab. xv. 10, 16-21). Letters of the same purport were also written by Lucius to other kings and to several nations (1 Maccab. xv. 22-24). Though the letter cannot be altogether rejected as spurious, there are many circumstances connected with it which lay it open to suspicion, and it is probable that it is not a true copy of the original document. The Romans never wrote their letters in the name of one consul, but in the name of the senate, nor was a consul ever designated by his praenomen. The date is also wanting, and the whole tenor of the language and the gist of the letter is contrary to the laws of the time (cf. Wernsdorff, De fid. libr. Maccab., sec. cxix.). In the account of Simon by Josephus (Antiq. xiii. 6. 7; 7. 1-4) no mention is made of this letter, though there is a decree of the senate very similar in its contents, made on the motion of a Lucius Valerius during the reign of Hyrcanus II. (Antiq. xiv. 8. 5). There is evidently a mistake in this latter passage of Josephus, for the decree should have spoken about the restoration of Jerusalem (cf. the decree, Antiq. xiv. 10. 5). It has been supposed (Hudson, Joseph. l. c.) that Josephus has confused the names of the two Hyrcani, and that the decree should apply to the first, though, if an error be allowed, there seems no reason to doubt, as Mr. Westcott (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Lucius) already observes, that Josephus must have removed the incident from its proper place.

Lucius has been identified with three distinct personages; (1.) L. [Lucius] Junius Philus (not P. [Publius] Junius Philus, as given in Clinton, F. II., vol. iii. p. 112, from Cassiod. and Cic. ad Att. xii. 5. 3; cf. Obsequ. 25, and Sigonius, Comment. in Fast. p. 199), who was consul in B.C. 136 with Sex. Atilius Serranus. This date is too late. (2.) Lucius Cæcilius Metellus Calvus, who was consul in B.C. 142, with Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus. This was immediately after the accession of Simon, and as the Romans then renewed the league which they had made with Judas and Jonathan (1 Maccab. xiv. 18, 19), there may be a connection between this decree and the later embassy of Numenius (1 Maccab. xiv. 24; xv. 18). (3.) Cn. or L. Calpurnius Piso, who was consul in B.C. 139 with M. Popilius Lænas. This identification is in all probability correct, as the date exactly corresponds. There is, however, a difficulty about the praenomen of Calpurnius Piso. Cassiodorus (Chron.), as edited, gives Cn. Piso, whilst the Fasti Capitolini, which are defective, only record the name of Popilius, the fellow-consul of Calpurnius. Valerius Maximus (lib. i. 3), as quoted from the best (?) printed texts, also gives the same praenomen. This latter quotation is incorrect, as the passage in which the name of these consuls appears, seems not to be part of Valerius Maximus, but a portion of the abridgment of an epitomizer, which has been inserted in the text. This portion of the first book of Valerius Maximus, extending from cap. 1 to cap. 5, 'Milesia Ceres—suffecturam urbem,' was first inserted in the text by Aldus (ed. Ven. 1502) from a very ancient MS. of Valerius Maximus (Valerium antiquissimum, Ald. Præf.) at Vienna,* and not as Mai (Script. Vet. Nova Coll., vol. iii., Præf. p. xxi.) supposes, from a copy of the epitome of Julius Paris now lost. Aldus states that this portion was missing in all the MSS. he had seen in Italy, as appears also to be the case with the majority of MSS. in all the European libraries. Mr. Westcott (l. c.) examined eleven MSS. of Valerius, and found only one containing it (Mus. Brit. Burn. 209), and the present writer has examined all the MSS. of Valerius in the British Museum (22), and the inserted portion occurs only in two (Mus. Brit. Burn. 209, 15th cent.; and Harl. 2759, 15th cent.). In the former the name is given as L. [Lucio] Calpurnio (sic), and in the latter as Lucio Cabsurino (sic). Aldus gave the name as L. [Lucio] Catp., and Mai, in his edition of Julius Paris (Script. Vet., etc., vol. iii. lib. i. 3, 11), also gives the name L. [Lucio]. It has been questioned on good grounds whether this portion is really in the words of Valerius, or has been borrowed from his epitomizer Julius Paris, and the latter opinion seems to be preferable. It is, however, certain, that it must have originally formed part of the text, since it is not only found in the epitome of Paris (end of 4th or beginning of 5th cent.), but also in that of a somewhat later writer, Januarius Nepotianus (6th cent.), but in different words, which affords a sufficient proof that they both abstracted from an earlier prototype (see Kempf's ed. of Valerius, 1854, præf., p. 93). Mai, who first published the epitome of Paris, assigns the MS. to the 10th century, but it is doubtless much earlier, since the most ancient MS. existing of Valerius Maximus (the one formerly belonging to P. Daniel, and now in the Public Library at Berne, Kempf, p. 78) can be ascribed to the close of the 9th century; and it is in this MS. that a second hand (but nearly coeval with the original) has supplied the missing portion from the abbreviation of Maximus, whom he names C. Titus (or Titius) Probus—a name, it must be remarked, which occurs in the Vatican MS. published by Mai. There can be little doubt that from this early copy are derived the later transcripts which retain the missing portion. They are not numerous, probably not exceeding eight or nine. It is evident that this lacuna must have occurred, at a very early date, by the carelessness of the transcriber or by accident, and hence it is that the majority of the MSS. in all the European libraries, which are chiefly of the 14th or 15th centuries, omit it.†

* This information was supplied to Aldus by Cuspinian. It is highly probable that the very ancient MS. seen by Cuspinian at Vienna, with the additional portion at the beginning, is the MS. of P. Daniel now at Berne.

† There is a MS. in the British Museum (Add. 19, 835), of the 12th century, containing Excerpts of Valerius Maximus, which also omits the portion in question. These Excerpts were probably made by Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, who died in 1027 or 1031 (Opera omnia, ed. Car. Le Villiers, Paris 1608).

The reading Cu., as far as I have been able to ascertain, was first introduced into the text by Pighius (8vo, Antw. 1574). It is again repeated in the Frankfort edition of 1601, by Coler, who, whilst copying the text of Pighius, professes to collate it with the MS. of P. Daniel above alluded to. This reading has been followed by Torrenius (4to, Leid. 1726) and Kappius (8vo, Lips. 1782). It appears, however, that Coler omitted to collate the passage in question, for, thanks to the kindness of M. Chs. Ls. de Steigze, the principal librarian of the Public Library at Berne, through whom I have been able to examine the MS. itself, I find that the correct reading is L. Calpurnio, as was already given by Aldus in 1502, and it is more than likely that all the MSS. read Lucius.^{*} Sigonius (Comment. in Fast., p. 197) has justly said (but incorrectly quoted by Mr. Westcott), 'Cassiodorus in hunc annum prodit consulens Cn. Pisonem cum M. Popillio: M. POPILLIUM [read m. popillius, see Corpus Inscript. Lat. Vet., ed. Mommsen 1863, vol. i. p. 438, cf. p. 532] Capitolinum fragmentum: M. Popillium Lenatem Appianus et Epitoma: L. Calpurnium Valerius [read Julius Paris] libro primo. . . .'

It is to be regretted that the Fasti Capitolini are defective; and the authority of Cassiodorus, whose statements are known to be full of errors, can hardly be held as conclusive against that of the MSS. of Valerius. In any case, the authority of 1 Maccab. might be held as affording another argument in favour of the prænomen of Calpurnius being Lucius.—F. W. M.

2. (Λούκιος; Lucius), a kinsman (συγγενής) or fellow-countryman of St. Paul, to whom, as to Jason and Sosipater, St. Paul sent salutations (Rom. xvi. 21). The Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 46) make the first bishop of Cenchreæ to have been Lucius, and state that he was consecrated by St. Paul himself. Others identify him with Lucius of Cyrene (q. v.)—F. W. M.

3. OF CYRENE (Λούκιος ὁ Κυρηναῖος) was a native of the town of Africa from which he takes his name, and which was noted for the number of Jews there resident (cf. Acts ii. 10; vi. 9; xi. 20; Simon the Cyrenian, Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26; Jason of Cyrene, 2 Maccab. ii. 23). He is first mentioned in the N. T. with Barnabas, Simeon called Niger, Manaen, and Saul, who are entitled 'teachers and prophets in the church of Antioch' (Acts xiii. 1). It is very probable that he was one of the 'men of Cyrene' who 'were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen,' and who, when they had come to Antioch, preached 'the Lord Jesus' (Acts xi. 19, 20). He may also have been among the Cyrenians who assembled together on the day of Pentecost to hear the words of St. Peter (Acts ii.).

There is every reason to suppose that Lucius of Cyrene is the same person as Lucius the συγγενής of St. Paul [LUCIUS, 2]. He must not, however, be confounded with St. Luke (Λουκάς), who, though mentioned three times by St. Paul in his Epistles (Col. iv. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 11; Philem. 24), is nowhere called συγγενής. The name Luke (Lucas) is an abbreviated form of Lucanus. In the Colossians he is described as 'the beloved physician,' whilst he is designated as 'a fellow-labourer' by St. Paul in his Epistle to Philemon. Wetstein, who believes that Lucius of Cyrene and St. Luke are one and the same person, has ingeniously quoted a passage from Herodotus (iii. 131), in which 'two physicians' are mentioned, and both 'Cyrenians.' Various traditions make Lucius bishop of Cenchreæ (see LUCIUS, 2), of Cyrene, and of Laodicea in Syria (Winer, Realwörterbuch, s. v. Lucius).—F. W. M.

LUD (לוד; Λούδ, and Λυδολ; Lud, and Lydiu), the fourth son of Shem (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chron. i. 17). The names recorded in Gen. x. are intended to denote not simply individuals, but especially those nations which they founded, and to which they gave their names (ver. 31). Lud, therefore, must be regarded as the founder of a nation, like Elam, Asshur, and Aram. Nothing is said of this nation in the writings of Moses. The countries peopled by the other Shemitic nations are indicated with more or less clearness, but the Ludim are omitted. We are fortunately enabled to supply this omission from other sources. Josephus states 'those who are now called Lydians (Λυδοί), but anciently Ludim (Λούδοι), sprung from Lud' (Λούδα, Antiq. i. 6. 4; cf. Bochart, Opera, i. 83, and the authorities cited there). Lydia, however, lay on the west coast of Asia Minor, and was thus far removed from the other possessions of the Shemitic nations. Greek writers inform us that Lydia was originally peopled by a Pelasgic race called Mæonians (Homer, Il. ii. 866; x. 431), who received their name from Mæon, an ancient king (Bochart, l. c.) They also state that the name Lybians was derived from a king who ruled them at a later period (Herod. i. 7). About eight centuries B. C. a tribe of another race migrated from the east, and subdued the Mæonians. These were the Lydians. For some time after this conquest both nations are mentioned promiscuously, but the Lydians gradually obtained power, and gave their name to the country (Kalisch On Gen. x.; Dionysius, i. 30; Pliny, v. 30; cf. Strabo, xii. 572; xiv. 679). The best and most recent critics regard these Lydians as a Shemitic tribe, and consequently the descendants of Lud (Movers, Die Phœnizier, i. 475). This view is strengthened by the description of the character and habits of the Lydians. They were warlike (Herod. i. 79), skilled in horsemanship (id.), and accustomed to serve as mercenaries under foreign princes (vii. 71). Now, in Is. lxvi. 19, a warlike people called Lud is mentioned in connection with Tarshish and Pul; and again in Ezek. xxvii. 10, the prophet says of Tyre, 'They of Persia, and of Lud, and of Phut, were in thine army, thy men of war.' There can scarcely be a doubt that this is the Shemitic nation mentioned in Genesis, and which migrated to western Asia, and gave the province of Lydia its name. The identity has recently been called in question by Professor and Sir Henry Rawlinson, but their arguments do not seem sufficient to set aside the great mass of circumstantial evidence in its favour (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 160, 659, 667; cf. Kalisch, l. c.; Prichard, Physical History of Mankind, iv. 562, seq.; Niebuhr, Lectures on Anc. Hist., i. 87; Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 745).

Originally Lydia was a small province, but it

^{*} Kempf (p. 126, note), though allowing that all the MSS. of Valerius read Lucius, supposes that it is an error, and that we should read Cincus as in the Fasti. What Fasti?

extended at length, until, in the time of Croesus, it included all Asia Minor, as far as the river Halys, except Cilicia and Lycia. During the Roman age it was again reduced, and was bounded on the north by Mysia, on the east by Phrygia, and on the south by Caria (Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Geog.; and the authorities quoted there). The province is not mentioned in the N. T., but Paul traversed it, and visited some of its principal cities, as Thyatira, Sardis, and Philadelphia.

This Lud or Lydia must be carefully distinguished from the Hamitic Lud or Ludim. See next article.—J. L. P.

LUDIM (לודים, Gen. x. 13; לודיים, 1 Chron.

i. 11; Λουδιαι; Ludim; לוד, Ezek. xxx. 5; Λυδός, Lydi). Of Mizraim, the second son of Ham, we read (Gen. x. 13), that 'he begat Ludim, and Ananim, and Lehabim,' etc. These are all in the plural, and denote tribes or nations springing from the several sons (ver. 20). Jeremiah (xvi. 9), in predicting the downfall of Egypt (Mizraim), says, 'Let the mighty men come forth; the Ethiopians (Cush), and the Libyans (Put), and the Zydians (לודים, Ludim) that handle and bend the bow.' There can be no doubt that this warlike tribe is identical with the Mizraite Ludim of Genesis. Again, the prophet Ezekiel thus writes, 'And the sword shall come upon Egypt, . . .

Ethiopia (Cush), and Libya (Phut); and Lydia (לוד) the sing. of לודים, . . . shall fall with them by the sword' (xxx. 5). Lydia here should have been translated 'Lud' or 'Ludim,' for the same Mizraite people are unquestionably meant. They are distinct, however, from the Shemitic tribe of Lud mentioned in connection with Tarshish (Is. lxvi. 19), and Persia (Ezek. xxvii. 10), and which are treated of in the preceding article.

The country of Ludim has not been satisfactorily identified. Some have supposed that it lay south of Morocco, near the west coast of Africa, because Pliny (v. 1) mentions a river Laud in that region (Michaelis, Spicil. i. 259, and Suppl. 1417). Borchart attempts to prove that the Ludim were the Ethiopians, though it is generally supposed that Cush is the Biblical name of Ethiopia. He argues the point at great length, and displays both learning and ingenuity. But his arguments scarcely bear searching criticism. They are more ingenious than convincing (Opera, i. 263-274). Hitzig would identify the Ludim and the Libyans, which is still more improbable (Der Proph. Jesaja, lxvi. 19; and Jeremia xvi. 9). It seems that the Ludim were a tribe of Egyptians forming part of that great nation, though perhaps concentrated in some one section of the country, and retaining to some extent a distinct name, and certain distinctive peculiarities in laws and mode of life, like the Maronites or Druzes in modern Syria. This seems to be indicated in Jer. xvi. 9 and Ezek. xxx. 5, where the Ludim are included in the curse pronounced upon Egypt. The name appears to have entirely disappeared, and we do not meet with it in any classic author.—J. L. P.

LUECKE, GOTTFRIED CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, a celebrated German theologian, was born at Egeln, near Magdeburg, in 1792, and died, 1855, at Göttingen. In 1816 he went, after having passed his university career, chiefly in Halle and Göttingen, and having filled the office of Repetitor at the latter place for several years, to Berlin, where he became intimate with De Wette and Schleiermacher, and lectured on N. T. exegesis. In 1818 he was called to fill a chair at the newly founded university at Bonn, which, in 1827, he left for another professorship at Göttingen. His principal works are:—Commentatio de Ecclesia Christianorum Apostolica, Göttingen 1813, 4to; Ueber den Neutestamentlichen Canon des Eusebius von Caesarea, Berlin 1816, 8vo; Grundriss einer Neutestamentlichen Hermeneutik und ihrer Geschichte, Göttingen 1817; Commentar über die Schriften des Evangelisten Johannes, Bonn 1820-32, 4 vols.; Quæstiones ac vindiciæ Didymianæ, Göttingen 1829, etc., 4 pts. Besides these works he published, together with De Wette, a Synopsis of the Gospels, 1818, 8vo; he further edited with De Wette and Schleiermacher the Theologische Zeitschrift, and with Gieseler the Zeitschrift für gebildete Christen, and contributed several papers in the Theologische Studien und Kritiken, in the Göttinger Gelehrte Anzeigen, etc. Of his minor Gelegenheitschriften may be mentioned Strauss in der Zürcherkirche (Bas. 1839); Narratio de J. Laur. Moshemio; Monograph on Plunk, Schleiermacher, etc.—E. D.

LUHITH (לחית; Λουιθ; in Jer. 'Αλώθ; Alex. 'Αλωθ; Luih). In pronouncing the prophetic curse on Moab, both Isaiah and Jeremiah mention 'the ascent of Luhith' (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 5). It appears to have been some famous pass either on the way up to Moab from the great valley of Arabah, or across some of its deep and wild ravines. It is closely connected with Horonaim by Jeremiah, and with Zoar by Isaiah; perhaps, however, neither connection is to be understood geographically. Eusebius and Jerome state that Luhith is a village situated between Areopolis and Zoar (Onomast., s. v. Luih). Between these two places—the latter on the shore of the Dead Sea, near the mouth of Wady Kerak, and the former on the summit of the mountain-ridge—there is a steep and very difficult pass; but the name has not been discovered, and the exact place of ascent is unknown. The country in that neighbourhood has not been fully explored. De Saulcy's attempt to identify the site is of no importance (Journey, i. 296; English ed.)—J. L. P.

LUKE. The name Λουκᾱς is abbreviated from Λουκαῖος, Lucanus, or Λουκιῶς, Lucilius (Meyer); cf. Silas for Silvanus; Annas for Annanus; Zenas for Zenodorus; Winer, Gram. p. 115. The contraction of arōs into ās is said to be characteristic of the names of slaves (see Lobeck, De Substantiv. in ās exeuntibus; Wolf, Analect. iii. 49), and it has been inferred from this that St. Luke was of heathen descent (which may also be gathered from the implied contrast between those mentioned Col. iv. 12-14, and the οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, ver. 11), and a libertus. This latter idea has found confirmation in his profession of a physician (Col. iv. 14); the practice of medicine among the Romans having been in great measure confined to persons of servile rank (Middleton, De Medicorum apud Roman. degent. Conditione). To this, however, there were many exceptions (cf. Smith, Dict. of Antiq., 'Medicus'), and it is altogether an insufficient basis on which to erect a theory as to the evangelist's social rank. So much, however, we may probably safely infer from his profession, that he was a man of superior education and mental culture to the generality of the apostles, the fishermen and tax-gatherers of the Sea of Galilee.

All that can be with certainty known of St. Luke must be gathered from the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles of St. Paul. The result is but scanty. His name does not once occur in the Acts, and we can only infer his presence or absence from the sudden changes from the third to the first person, and vice versa, of which phenomenon, notwithstanding all that has of late been urged against it, this, which has been accepted since the time of Irenæus (cf. Contr. Hær., iii. 14), is the only satisfactory explanation. Rejecting the reading συνεστραμμένον δὲ ἡμῶν, Acts xi. 28 (which only rests on D., and Augustine, De Serm. Dom. ii. 17), which would bring St. Luke into connection with St. Paul at a much earlier period, as well as the identification of the evangelist with Lucius of Cyrene (Acts xiii. 1; Rom. xvi. 21), which was current in Origen's time (ad Rom. xvi. 39; cf. Lardner, Credibility, vi. 124; Marsh, Michaelis, iv. 234), which would make him a kinsman of St. Paul, we first find St. Luke in St. Paul's company at Troas, and sailing with him to Macedonia (Acts xvi. 10, 11). Of his previous history, and the time and manner of his conversion, we know nothing, but Ewald's supposition (Gesch. d. V. Isr., vi. 35, 448) is not at all improbable, that he was a physician residing in Troas, converted by St. Paul, and attaching himself to the apostle with all the ardour of a young convert. He may also, as Ewald thinks, have been one of the first uncircumcised Christians. He accompanied St. Paul as far as Philippi, but did not share in the imprisonment of his master and his companion Silas, nor, as the third person is resumed (xvii. 1), did he, it would seem, take any further part in the apostle's missionary journey. The first person appears again on St. Paul's third visit to Philippi, A. D. 58 (Acts xx. 5, 6), from which it has been gathered that St. Luke had spent the whole intervening time—a period, according to Wieseler, of seven or eight years—in Philippi or its neighbourhood. If any credit is to be given to the ancient opinion that St. Luke is referred to in 2 Cor. viii. 18, as 'the brother whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches' (a view adopted by the Church of England in the collect for St. Luke's day), as well as the early tradition embodied in the subscription to that epistle, that it was sent from Philippi 'by Titus and Lucas,' we shall have evidence of the evangelist's missionary zeal during this long space of time; the word 'gospel' being of course to be understood, not as Jerome and others erroneously interpret it, of St. Luke's written gospel, but of his publication of the glad tidings of Jesus Christ. The mistaken interpretation of the word 'gospel' in this place has led others to assign the composition of the gospel of St. Luke to this period; a view which derives some support from the Arabic version published by Erpenius, in which its writing is placed 'in a city of Macedonia twenty-two years after the Ascension,' A. D. 52. From their reunion at Philippi, St. Luke remained in constant attendance on St. Paul during his journey to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 6–xxi. 18), and disappearing from the narrative during the apostle's imprisonment at Jerusalem and Cæsarea, reappears again when he sets out for Rome (Acts xxvii. 1). He was shipwrecked with Paul (xxviii. 2), and travelled with him by Syracuse and Puteoli to Rome (vers. 12–16), where he appears to have continued as his fellow-labourer (συνεργός, Philem. 24; Col. iv. 4) till the close of his first imprisonment. The Second Epistle to Timothy (iv. 11) gives us the latest glimpse of the 'beloved physician,' and our authentic information regarding him beautifully closes with a testimony from the apostle's pen to his faithfulness amidst general defection.

The above sums up all we really know about St. Luke; but, as is often the case, in proportion to the scantiness of authentic information is the copiousness of tradition—increasing in definiteness, be it remarked—as it advances. His Gentile descent being taken for granted (cf. Col. iv. 11, 14), his birth-place was appropriately enough fixed at Antioch, 'the centre of the Gentile church, and the birthplace of the Christian name' (Euseb., H. E. iii. 4, τὸ μὲν γένος ὧν τῶν ἀπ' Ἀντιοχείας, Jerome, De Vir. Illust. 7; 'Antiochensis,' In Matt. Pref., 'natione Syrus Antiochenensis'); though it is to be observed that Chrysostom, when dwelling on the historical associations of the city, appears to know nothing of such a tradition. He was believed to have been a Jewish proselyte, ignorant of Hebrew ('licet plerique tradant Lucam Evangelistam, ut proselytum, Hebræas literas ignorasse,' Jerome, Quæst. in Gen. c. xli.), and probably—because he alone mentions their mission, but in contradiction to his own words (Luke i. 23)—one of the seventy disciples who, having left our Lord in offence (John vi. 60–66), was brought back to the faith by the ministry of St. Paul (Epiph., Hær. li. 11); one of the Greeks who desired to 'see Jesus,' John xii. 20, 21 (Lange), and the companion of Cleopas on the journey to Emmaus (Theophyl. Proem in Luc.). An idle legend of Greek origin, which first appears in the late and credulous historian Nicephorus Callistus (died 1450), Hist. Eccl. ii. 43, and was universally accepted in the middle ages, represents St. Luke as well acquainted with the art of painting, ἀκρως τὴν ζωγράφου τέχνην ἐξεπιστάμενος, and assigns to his hand the first portraits of our Lord, His mother, and His chief apostles.

Nothing is known of the place or manner of his death, and the traditions are inconsistent with one another. Gregory Naz. reckons him among the martyrs, and the untrustworthy Nicephorus gives us full details of the time, place, and mode of his martyrdom; viz., that he was crucified to a live olive-tree in Greece, in his eightieth year. According to others, he died a natural death after preaching (according to Epiphanius) in Dalmatia, Gallia, Italy, and Macedonia; was buried in Bithynia, whence his bones were translated by Constantius to Constantinople (Isid. Hispal., c. 82; Philostorg., vol. iii. c. xxix.). Here, as everywhere, as soon as we leave the solid ground of Holy Scripture, we are lost in a quagmire of shifting and baseless traditions, which scarcely deserve even to be enumerated.—E. V.

LUKE, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.

1. Author—Genuineness.—The universal tradition of Christendom, reaching up at least to the latter part of the 2d century, has assigned the third member of our gospel collection to Luke, the trusted companion and fellow-labourer, συνεργός, of St. Paul, who alone continued in attendance on his beloved master in his last imprisonment (Col. iv. 14; Phil. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 11). Its authorship has never been questioned until comparatively recent times, when the unsparing criticism of Germany—the main object of which appears to be the demolishing of every ancient belief to set up some new hypothesis in its stead—has been brought to bear upon it, without, however, effectually disturbing the old traditional statement. The investigations of Semler, Hilgenfeld, Ritschl, Baur, Schleiermacher, Ewald, and others, have failed to overthrow the harmonious assertion of the early church, that the third gospel, as we have it, is the genuine work of St. Luke. It is well known, that though the 'gospels' are referred to by Justin Martyr as a collection already used and accepted by the church (Apol. i. 66; Dial. c. Tryph., c. 10), and his works supply a very considerable number of quotations, enabling us to identify, beyond all reasonable doubt, these εὐαγγέλια with the first three gospels, we do not find them mentioned by the names of their authors till the end of the 2d century. In the Muratorian fragment, which can hardly be placed later than 170 A. D., we read, 'Tertium Evangelium secundum Lucam Lucas iste medicus post ascensum Christi cum eum Paulus quasi ut juris (τῷ δικαίῳ) studiosum ('itineris socium,' Bunsen) secum adsummisset nomine suo ex ordine ('opinione,' Credner) conscripsit (Dominum tamen nec ipse vidit in carne), et idem prout assequi potuit, ita et a nativitate Johannis inceptum dicere' (Westcott, Hist. of Can., p. 559). The testimony of Irenæus, circa 180, is equally definite, Λουκᾶς δὲ ὁ ἀκόλουθος Παύλου τὸ ὑπ' ἐκείνου κηρυσσόμενον εὐαγγέλιον ἐν βιβλίῳ κατέθετο (Contr. Hær. iii. 1. 1); while from his enumeration of the many particulars, plurima evangelii (Ib. iii. 14. 3), recorded by Luke alone, it is evident that the gospel he had was the same we now possess. Tatian's Diatesaron is an unimpeachable evidence of the existence of four gospels, and therefore of that by St. Luke, at a somewhat earlier period in the same century. The writings of Tertullian against Marcion, circa 207, abound with references to our gospel, which, with Irenæus, he asserts to have been written under the immediate guidance of St. Paul, Adv. Marc., iv. 2; iv. 5. In Eusebius we find both the Gospel and the Acts specified as θεόπνευστα βιβλία, while his knowledge of the sacred narrative is ascribed to information received from St. Paul, aided by his intercourse with the other apostles, τῆς τῶν ἄλλων ἀποστόλων ὁμιλίας ὠφελημένος (H. E., iii. 4 and 24). Eusebius indeed tells us, that in his day the erroneous view which interpreted εὐαγγέλιον (Rom. ii. 16, cf. 2 Cor. viii. 18) of a written document was generally received, and that in the words 'according to my gospel,' St. Paul was supposed to refer to the work of the evangelist. This is also mentioned by Jerome (De Vir. Illust. 7), and accepted by Origen (Euseb. H. E. vi. 25): one among many proofs of the want of the critical faculty among the fathers of that age.

Additional evidence of the early acceptance of St. Luke's Gospel may be derived from the vexata questio of its relation to the gospel of Marcion. This is not the place to discuss this subject, which has led critics to the most opposite conclusions; for a full account of which the reader may be referred to De Wette, Einleit. in N. T., pp. 119-137, as well as to the treatises of Ritschl, Baur, Hilgenfeld, Hahn, and Volckmar. It will be enough for our purpose to mention, that the Gnostic teacher Marcion, in pursuit of his professed object of restoring the purity of the gospel, which had been corrupted by Judaizing teachers, rejected all the books of the canon with the exception of ten epistles of St. Paul, and a gospel, which he called simply a gospel of Christ. We have the express testimony of Irenæus (Contr. Hær., i. 27. 2; iii. 12. 12, etc.), Tertullian (Cont. Marc., iv. 1, 2, 6), Origen (Cont. Cels., ii. 27), Epiphanius (Hær. xlii. 11), that the basis of Marcion's gospel was that of St. Luke, abridged and altered by him to suit his peculiar tenets (for the alterations and omissions—the chief being its curtailment by the first two chapters, see De Wette, pp. 123-132); though we cannot assert, as was done by his enemies among the orthodox, that all the variations are due to Marcion himself, many of them having no connection with his heretical views, and being rather various readings of great antiquity and high importance. Of late years, however, the opposite view, which was first broached by Semler, Griesbach, and Eichhorn, has been vigorously maintained among others by Ritschl and Baur, who have endeavoured to prove that the Gospel of St. Luke, as we have it, is interpolated, and that the portions Marcion is charged with having omitted were really unauthorised additions to the original document. Volckmar, in his exhaustive treatise Das Evang. Marcions, Leipz. 1852, has satisfactorily disposed of this theory, and has demonstrated that the Gospel of Luke, as we now have it, was the material on which Marcion worked; and therefore, that before he began to teach, the date of which may be fixed about 139 A. D., it was already known to and accepted by the church.

2. Sources.—The sources from which St. Luke derived his gospel are clearly indicated by him in the introduction (i. 1-4). He does not claim to have been eye-witness of our Lord's ministry, or to have any personal knowledge of the facts he records, but, as an honest compiler, to have gone to the best sources of information then accessible, and having accurately traced the whole course of the apostolic tradition from the very first, in its every detail (παρηκολούθηκόντι ἀνωθεν πάντων ἀκριβῶς), to have written an orderly narrative of the facts (πραγμάτων) already fully believed (πεπληροφορημένων) in the Christian church, and which Theophilus had already learnt, not from books, but from oral teaching (κατηχήσης; cf. Acts xvii. 25; Gal. vi. 5). These sources were partly the 'oral tradition' (παρέδοσαν) of those 'who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word'; and partly the written records (to which Ewald, vi. 40, on unexplained grounds, dogmatically assigns a non-Judean origin) which even then 'many' (πολλοί) had attempted to draw up; of which, though the evangelist's words do not necessarily bear that meaning, we may well suppose that he would avail himself. Though we thankfully believe that, as well in the selection of his materials as in the employment of them, St. Luke was acting under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, it will be remarked that he lays claim to no such supernatural guidance, but simply to the care and accuracy of an honest, painstaking, and well-informed editor, not so consciously under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit as to supersede the use of his own mental powers. His use of his sources is not mechanical; though often incorporating, apparently with little alteration, large portions of the 'oral tradition,' especially in the case of the words of our Lord, or those with whom He conversed, and adopting narratives already current (of which the first two chapters, with their harsh Hebraistic phraseology, immediately succeeding the comparatively pure Greek of the dedication, are an example), the free handling of his pen is everywhere to be recognised. The connecting links, and the passages of transition, evidence the hand of the author, which may again be recognised in the greater variety of his style, the more complex character of his sentences, and the care he bestows in smoothing away harshnesses, and imparting a more classical air to the synoptical portions.

Notwithstanding the almost unanimous consent of the fathers as to the Pauline origin of St. Luke's Gospel (Tert. adv. Marc. iv. 5, 'Luca digestum Paulo adscribere solent'; Iren. Cont. Hær. iii. 1; Origen apud Euseb. H. E. vi. 25; Euseb. H. E. iii. 4; Jerome, De Vir. Illust. 7), there is little or nothing in the gospel itself to favour such a hypothesis, and very much to contradict it. It is true that the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, 1 Cor. xi. 23-25, displays an almost verbal identity with Luke xxii. 19, 20; and as St. Paul affirms that he received his 'from the Lord,' it is highly probable that the evangelist has in this instance incorporated a fragment of the direct teaching of his master. But this is a solitary example (Luke xxiv. 34, comp. with 1 Cor. xv. 5, is too trilling to deserve mention), and it is impossible that the evangelist should have expressed himself as he has done in his preface, if he had derived the facts of his narrative from one who was neither 'an eye-witness' nor 'a minister of the word from the beginning.' Nor again in the general tone and character in the gospel, when impartially viewed, is there much that can be fairly considered to bear out the hypothesis of a Pauline origin. Those who have sifted the gospel with this object have, it is true, gathered a number of passages which are supposed to have a Pauline tendency (see Hilgenfeld, Evang., and the ingenious essay prefixed to this gospel in Dr. Wordsworth's Greek Testament), e.g., Luke iv. 25, seq.; ix. 52, seq.; x. 30, seq.; xvii. 16-18; and the parables of the 'Prodigal son,' the 'Unprofitable servant,' and the 'Pharisee and publican,' which have been instanced by De Wette as bringing out the apostle's teaching on justification by faith alone; but, as Dean Alford has ably shewn (Greek Test., i. 44, note b), such a list may be easily collected from the other gospels, while the entire absence of any definite statement of the doctrinal truths which come forward with the greatest prominence in the apostle's writings, and, with very scanty exceptions, of his peculiar theological phraseology, is of itself sufficient to prove how undue has been the weight assigned to Pauline influence in the composition of the gospel. It is certainly true that, in the words of Bishop Thirlwall (Schleiermacher on St. Luke, Introd., p. cxxviii.), 'St. Luke's Gospel contains numerous indications of that enlarged view of Christianity which gave to the gospel, as preached by St. Paul, a form and an extent very different from the original tradition of the Jews,' but no more can be legitimately inferred than that St. Luke was St. Paul's disciple, instructed by the apostle of the Gentiles, and naturally sharing in his view of the gospel as a message of salvation for all nations; not that his gospel was in any sense derived from him, or rested on the apostolic basis of St. Paul.

The question naturally arises whether the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark were among the διηγήσεις to which St. Luke refers. The answers to this have been various and contradictory—the same data leading critics to the most opposite conclusions. Meyer (Comment. ii. 217) is of opinion that St. Luke availed himself both of St. Matthew and St. Mark, though chiefly of the latter, as the 'primitive gospel'; while De Wette, on the other hand (Einleit., sec. 94, p. 185), considers St. Mark's Gospel the latest of the three, and based upon them as authorities. In the face of these and other discordant theories, of which a list may be seen (De Wette, Einleit., sec. 88, pp. 162-168), it will be wise not to attempt a categorical decision. A calm review of the evidence will, however, lead most unbiassed readers to the conclusion that all three wrote in perfect independence of one another; each, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, giving a distinct view of the great complex whole, the reflex of the writer's own individual impressions, and that least of all is St. Luke to be considered as a mere réducteur of the prior writings of his brother synoptists—a theory, the improbabilities and absurdities of which have been well pointed out by Dean Alford in the Prolegomena to his Greek Testament, i., pp. 2-6, 41.

3. Relation to St. Matthew and St. Mark.—Believing that no one of the three synoptical gospels is dependent on the others, and that the true explanation of this striking correspondence, not only in the broad outline of our Lord's life and work, and the incidents with which this outline is filled up, but also, to a considerable extent, in the parables and addresses recorded, and even in the language and forms of expression, is to be sought in the same apostolical oral tradition having formed the original basis of each, a very interesting point of inquiry presents itself in tracing the correspondence and divergence of the several narratives. In particular, a comparison of St. Luke with the other synoptists furnishes many striking and important results. With the general identity of the body of the history, we at once notice that there are two large portions peculiar to this evangelist, containing events or discourses recorded by him alone. These are the first two chapters, narrating the conception, birth, infancy, and early development of our Lord and His forerunner, and the long section (ix. 51-xviii. 14) devoted to our Lord's final journey to Jerusalem, and comprising some of His most beautiful parables. We have also other smaller sections supplying incidents passed over by Matthew and Mark—the questions of the people and the Baptist's replies (iii. 10-14); Simon and the woman that was a sinner (vii. 36-50); the raising of the widow's son (viii. 11-17); the story of Zaccheus (xix. 1-10); our Lord's weeping over Jerusalem (xix. 39-44); the journey to Emmaus (xxiv. 13-35). In other parts he follows a tradition at once so much fuller and so widely at variance with that of the others, as almost to suggest the idea that a different event is recorded (iv. 16-30, cf.; Matt. xiii. 54-58; Mark vi. 1-6; v. 1-11, cf.; Matt. iv. 13-22; Mark i. 16-20). Even where the language employed so closely corresponds as to remove all question of the identity of the events, fresh details are given, often of the greatest interest, ε. ς., προσευχομένου (iii. 21); σωματικῶ εἶδει (iii. 22); πλήρη πνεύμ. ἀγ. (iv. 1); ὅτι ἐμοὶ παραδεδόται, κ. τ. λ. (iv. 6); ἄχρι καιροῦ (iv. 13); δύναμις Κυρίου ἦν, κ. τ. λ. (v. 17); καταλιπὼν ἅπαντα, and the δοχή μεγ. (v. 28, 29); the comparison of old and new wine (v. 39); ἐπλήσθ' ἁνοίας (vi. 11); δύναμις παρ' αὐτοῦ ἐξήρχ' (vi. 19); the cures in the presence of John's disciples (vii. 21), and the incidental remarks (vers. 29, 30); many additional touches in the narratives of the Gadarene demoniac (viii. 26-30), and the transfiguration, especially the fact of His 'praying' (St. Luke records at least six instances of our Lord having prayed omitted by the other evangelists), and the subject of the conversation with Moses and Elijah (ix. 28-36); notices supplied (xx. 19; xxi. 37, 38), all tending to convince us that we are in the presence not of a mere copyist, but of a trustworthy and independent witness. St. Luke's account of the passion and resurrection is to a great extent his own, adding much of the deepest significance to the synoptical narrative, particularly the warning to Simon in the name of the twelve (xxii. 31-32); the bloody sweat (ver. 44); the sending to Herod (xxiii. 7-12); the words to the women (vers. 27-31); the prayer for forgiveness (ver. 34); the penitent thief (vers. 39-43); the walk to Emmaus (xxiv. 13-35); and the ascension (vers. 50-53).

It has been remarked that there is nothing in which St. Luke is more characteristically distinguished from both the Evangelists than in his selection of our Lord's parables. There are no less than eleven quite peculiar to him—(1.) The two debtors; (2.) Good Samaritan; (3.) Friend at midnight; (4.) Rich fool; (5.) Barren fig-tree; (6.) Lost silver; (7.) Prodigal son; (8.) Unjust steward; (9.) Rich man and Lazarus; (10.) Unjust judge; (11.) Pharisee and publican; and two others, the Great Supper, and the Pounds, which, with many points of similarity, differ very decidedly from those found in St. Matthew.

Of our Lord's miracles, six omitted by St. Matthew and St. Mark are recorded by St. Luke—(1.) Miraculous draught; (2.) The son of the widow of Nain; (3.) The woman with a spirit of infirmity; (4.) The man with a dropsy; (5.) The ten lepers; (6.) The healing of Malchus' ear. Of the seven not related by him, the most remarkable omission is that of the Syrophenician woman, for which a priori reasoning would have claimed a special place in the so-called Gospel of the Gentiles. We miss also the walking on the sea, the feeding of the four thousand, the cure of the blind men, and of the deaf and dumb, the stater in the fish's mouth, and the cursing of the fig-tree.

The chief omissions in narrative are the whole section, Matt. xiv.-xvi. 12, Mark vi. 45-viii. 26; Matt. xix. 2-12; xx. 1-16, 20-28; cf. Mark x. 35-45; the anointing, Matt. xxvi. 6-13, Mark xiv. 3-9.

With regard to coincidence of language, a most important remark was long since made by Bishop Marsh (Michaelis, v. 317), that when St. Matthew and St. Luke agree verbally in the common synoptical sections, St. Mark always agrees with them also; and that there is not a single instance in these sections of verbal agreement between St. Matthew and St. Luke alone. A close scrutiny will discover that the verbal agreement between St. Luke and St. Mark is greater than that between St. Luke and

St. Matthew, while the mutual dependence of the second and third Evangelists on the same source is rendered still more probable by the observation of Reuss, that they agree both in excess and defect when compared with St. Matthew: that when St. Mark has elements wanting in St. Matthew, St. Luke usually has them also; while when St. Matthew supplies more than St. Mark, St. Luke follows the latter; and that where St. Mark fails altogether, St. Luke's narrative often represents a different παράδοσις from that of St. Matthew.

4. Character and General Purpose.—The chief characteristic of St. Luke's Gospel which distinguishes it from those of the other synoptists, especially St. Matthew, is its universality. The message he delivers is not, as it has sometimes been mistakenly described, for the Gentiles as such, as distinguished from the Jews, but for men. As we read his record, we seem to see him anticipating the time when all nations should hear the gospel message, when all distinctions of race or class should be done away, and all claims based on a fancied self-righteousness annulled, and the glad tidings should be heard and received by all who were united in the bonds of a common humanity, and felt their need of a common Saviour, 'the light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of His people Israel.' It is this character which has given it a right to the title of the Pauline gospel, and enables us to understand why Marcion selected it as the only true exponent of Christ's gospel. This universalism, however, is rather interwoven with the gospel than to be specified in definite instances; and yet we cannot but feel how completely it is in accordance with it that St. Luke records the enrolment of the Saviour of the world as a citizen of the world-embracing Roman empire—that he traces his genealogy back to the head of the human race—that his first recorded sermon (iv. 16-27) gives proof of God's wide-reaching mercy, as displayed in the widow of Sarepta and Naaman—that in the mission of the twelve, the limitation to the 'cities of Israel' should have no place, while he alone records the mission of the seventy (a number symbolical of the Gentile world)—that in the sermon on the mount all references to the Law should be omitted, while all claims to superior holiness or national prerogative are cut away by his gracious dealings with, and kindly mention of, the despised Samaritans (ix. 52, ff.; x. 30, ff.; xvii. 11, ff.).

And as with the race in general, so with its individual members. St. Luke delights to bear witness that none are shut out from God's mercy—nay, that the outcast and the lost are the especial objects of His care and search. As proofs of this, we may refer to the narratives of the woman that was a sinner, the Samaritan leper, Zaccheus, and the penitent thief; and the parables of the lost sheep and lost silver, the Pharisee and publican, the rich man and Lazarus, and, above all, to that 'which has probably exercised most influence on the mind of Christendom in all periods' (Maurice, Unity of the Gospel, p. 274), the prodigal son.

Most naturally also is it in St. Luke that we find the most frequent allusions to that which has been one of the most striking distinctions between the old and modern world—the position of woman as a fellow-heir of the kingdom of heaven, sharing in the same responsibilities and hopes, and that woman comes forward most prominently (the Syrophenician, as already noticed, is a single marked exception) as the object of our Lord's sympathy and love. Commencing with the Virgin Mary as a type of the purity and lowly obedience which is the true glory of womanhood, we meet in succession with Anna the prophetess, the pattern of holy widowhood (cf. 1 Tim. v. 5); the woman that was a sinner; the widow of Nain; the ministering women (viii. 2, 3); Mary and Martha; the 'daughter of Abraham' (xiii. 11); and close the list with the words of exquisite tenderness and sympathy to the 'daughters of Jerusalem' (xxiii. 28).

This universal character is one, the roots of which lie deep in St. Luke's conception of the nature and work of Christ. With him, more than in the other gospels, Jesus is 'the second man, the Lord from heaven' (Lange), and if in his pages we see more of His divine nature, and have in the more detailed reports of His Conception and Ascension clearer proofs that He was indeed the Son of the Highest, it is here too, in 'the life-giving sympathy and intercourse with the inner man, in the human fellowship grounded on not denying the divine condescension and compassion' (Maurice, u. s.), that we recognise the perfect ideal man.

St. Luke, it has been truly remarked, is the gospel of contrasts. Starting with the contrast between the doubt of Zacharias and the trustful obedience of Mary, we find in almost every page proofs of the twofold power of Christ's word and work foretold by Simeon (ii. 34). To select a few of the more striking examples. He alone presents to our view Simon and the sinful woman, Martha and Mary, the thankful and thankless lepers, the tears and hosannas on the brow of Olivet; he alone adds the 'woes' to the 'blessings' in the sermon on the mount, and carries on in the parables of the rich man and Lazarus, the pharisee and publican, and the good Samaritan, that series of strong contrasts which finds so appropriate a close in the penitent and blaspheming malefactors.

Once more, St. Luke is the hymn writer of the N. T. 'Taught by thee, the church prolongs Her hymns of high thanksgiving still' (Keble, Christian Year). But for his record the Magnificat, Benedictus, and Nunc Dimittis, would have been lost to us; and it is he who has preserved to us the Ave Maria, identified with the religious life of so large a part of Christendom, and the Gloria in Excelsis, which forms the culminating point of its most solemn ritual.

And now to turn from the internal to the external characteristics of St. Luke's Gospel. These we shall find no less marked and distinct. His narrative is, as he promised it should be (καθεξής, i. 3), an orderly one: but the order is one rather of subject than of time. As to the other synoptists, though maintaining the principle of chronological succession in the main outline of his narrative, 'he is ever ready to sacrifice mere chronology to that order of events which was the fittest to develop his purpose according to the object proposed by the inspiring Spirit, grouping his incidents according to another and deeper order than that of mere time' (Maurice, u. s.) It is true that he furnishes us with the three most precise dates in the whole gospel narrative (ii. 2; iii. 1, 23—each one, be it remarked, the subject of vehement controversy), but in spite of the attempts made by Wieseler and others to force a strict chronological character upon his gospel, an unprejudiced perusal will convince us that his narrative is loose and fragmentary, especially in the section ix. 49—xviii. 14, and his notes of time vague and destitute of precision, even where the other synoptists are more definite (v. 12 cf. Matt. viii. 1; viii. 4 cf. Matt. xiii. 1; viii. 22 cf. Mark iv. 35, etc.)

In his narrative we miss the graphic power of St. Mark, though in this he is superior to St. Matthew, e. g., vii. 1-10 cf. Matt. viii. 5-13; viii. 41-56 cf. Matt. ix. 18-26. His object is rather to record the facts of our Lord's life than his discourses, while, as Olshausen remarks (i. 19, Clark's ed.), 'He has the peculiar power of exhibiting with great clearness and truth our Lord's conversations, with all the incidents that gave rise to them; the remarks of the bystanders, and their results.'

We may also notice here the passing reflections, or, as Bishop Ellicott terms them (Hist. Lect. p. 28), 'psychological comments,' called up by the events or actors which appear in his gospel, interpolated by him as obiter dicta in the body of the narrative. We may instance ii. 50, 51; iii. 15; vi. 11; vii. 29, 30, 39; xvi. 14; xx. 20; xxii. 3; xxiii. 12.

5. Style and Language.—St. Luke's style is more finished than that of St. Matthew or St. Mark. There is more of composition in his sentences. His writing displays greater variety, and the structure is more complex. His diction is substantially the same, but purer, and, except in the first two chapters, less Hebraized, as remarked by Jerome (Comment. in Es.): 'Lucam tradunt veteres . . . magis Græcæ literas scisse quam Hebræas. Unde et sermo ejus . . . complur est et secularum redolet eloquentiam' (cf. ad Damas. Ep. 20). It deserves special notice how, in the midst of close verbal similarity, especially in the report of the words of our Lord and others, slight alterations are made by him either by the substitution of another word or phrase (e. g., Luke xx. 6 cf. Matt. xxi. 26, Mark xi. 32; Luke vii. 25, Mark xi. 8; Luke ix. 14, Mark vi. 39, 40; Luke xx. 28, 29, Mark xii. 20, 22; Luke viii. 25, Mark viii. 27), the supply (Luke xx. 45, Mark xii. 38; Luke vii. 8, Matt. viii. 9), or the omission of a word (Luke ix. 25, Matt. xvi. 26, Mark viii. 36), by which harsh constructions are removed, and a more classical air given to the whole composition.

The Hebraistic character is more perceptible in the hymns and speeches incorporated by him than in the narrative itself. The following are some of the chief Hebraisms that have been noticed—(1.) ἐγένετο ἐν τῷ, with the accusative and infinitive, corresponding to לְיָהוָה, twenty-three times, not once in Matt., only twice in Mark; (2.) the same idiom, without ἐγένετο, e. g., ix. 34, 36; x. 35; xi. 37; (3.) ἐγένετο ὡς, or ὡς alone of time, the Hebrew כִּי, e. g., ii. 15; v. 4, only once apiece in Matt. and Mark; (4.) ὁ θεὸς, used for GOD = יְהוָה, five times, once in Mark; (5.) οἶκος, for family = מִשְׁכָּן; (6.) ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν = מֵעַתָּה, four times, not once in the other gospels; (7.) ἀδικία in the genitive as an epithet, e. g., οἰκονόμος τῆς ἀδικίας, κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας; (8.) προσέθετο πένψαι, xx. 11, 12.

On the other hand, we find certain classical words and phrases peculiar to St. Luke taking the place of others less familiar to his Gentile readers, e. g., ἐπιστάτης for βασιβί, six times; νομικοὶ for γραμματεῖς, six times; νάλ, ἀληθῶς or ἐπ' ἀληθείας for ἀμήν, which only occurs seven times to thirty in Matt., and fourteen in Mark; ἄπτεν λύχνον for καλεῖν λ., four times; λίμνη of the Lake of Genesaret for θάλασσα, five times; παρὰλελυμένος for παρὰλυτικός; κλινίδιον for κράββατος; φόρος for κῆνος.

The style of St. Luke has many peculiarities both in construction and in diction; indeed, it has been calculated that the number of words used only by him exceeds the aggregate of the other three gospels. Full particulars of these are given by Credner (Einleit.) (copied by Davidson, Introd. to N. T.) and Reuss (Geschicht. d. H. Schrift.) The following, the result of independent examination, are some of the most noteworthy. Of peculiar constructions we may remark—(1.) the infinitive with the genitive of the article (Winer, Gr. Gr., i. 340) to indicate design or result, e.g., Luke ii. 27; v. 7; xxi. 22; xxiv. 29; i. 9; i. 57; ii. 21. (2.) The substantive verb with the participle instead of the finite verb, iv. 31; v. 10; vi. 12; vii. 8; xxiii. 12 (Winer, 365-67). (3.) The neuter participle with the article for a substantive, iv. 16; viii. 34; xxii. 22; xxiv. 14. (4.) τῷ, to substantivise a sentence or clause, especially in indirect questions, i. 63; vii. 11; ix. 46, etc. (5.) εἰπεῖν πρὸς, sixty-seven times; λέγειν πρὸς, ten times; λαλεῖν πρὸς, 4 times, the first being used once by Matt., and the other not at all by him or Mark. (6.) Participles are copiously used to give vividness to the narrative, ἀναστὰς, seventeen times; στραφεὶς, seven times; πεσών, etc. (7.) ἀνὴρ used with a substantive, e.g., ἀμαρτωλός, v. 8; xix. 7; and προφήτης, xxiv. 19.

Of the words peculiar to, or occurring much more frequently in, St. Luke, some of the most remarkable are, the use of Κύριος in the narrative as a synonym for Ἰησοῦς, which occurs fourteen times (e.g., vii. 13; x. 1; xiii. 15, etc.), and nowhere else in the synoptical gospels, save in the addition to St. Mark, xvi. 19, 20; σωτήρ, σωτηρία, σωτήριον, not found in the other gospels, except the first two once each in John; χάρις, eight times in gospel, sixteen in the Acts, and only thrice in John, χαρίζομαι, χαριτώνω; εὐαγγελίζομαι, very frequent, while εὐαγγέλιον does not occur at all; ὑποστρέφω, twenty-one times in the gospel, ten in the Acts, and only once in Mark; ὑπάρχω, seven times in gospel, twenty-six in Acts, but nowhere in the other gospels, and τὰ ὑπάρχοντα, eight times in gospel to three in Matt. alone; ἄρας, twenty times in gospel, sixteen in Acts, to thrice in Matt. and four times in Mark; Ἱερουσαλήμ, instead of the Ἱεροσόλυμα of the other gospels; ἐνώπιον, twenty-two times in gospel, fourteen times in Acts, once besides in St. John; σύν, twenty-four times in gospel, fifty-one in Acts, and only ten times in the other gospels; the particle τε, which hardly appears in the other gospels, is very frequent in St. Luke's writings. The words ἀνένιζω, ἀποσπας, βουλή, βρέφος, δέομαι, δέησις, δοχή, δράχμη, θάμβος, θεμέλιον, λαῖσις, καθότι, καθόλου, καθεξῆς, κακοῦργος, κόραξ, λεῖος, λύτρωα, λύτρωσις, οἰκόνομος-λα-έω, παιδεύω, παύω, πλέω, πλήθος, πλήθω, πλήρ, πρόσωπα, σιγῶα, σκωπῶα, τινιβάζομαι, χίρρα, ᾧσει, καθώς, are almost, or quite, peculiar to him; he is very partial to καὶ αὐτός and καὶ αὐτοί, εἰ, δέ, μή, γε, and abounds in verbs compounded with prepositions, where the other evangelists use the simple verb.

Some omissions are to be noted: ἀληθής does not occur once, ἀληθινός only once, εὐαγγέλιον, διάκοπος, δαιμονιζόμενος, not once; δαιμονισθεὶς only once: and ὥστε, which is found fifteen times in Matt., and thirteen in Mark, occurs only thrice in the whole gospel.

A few Latin words are used by St. Luke—ἀσπάριον, xii. 6; θηνάριος, vii. 41; λεγάω, viii. 30; μόδιον, xi. 33; σουδάριον, xix. 20; Acts xix. 12, but no Hebrew or Syriac forms, except σέκερα, i. 15.

6. Quotations from the O. T.—It is a striking confirmation of the view propounded above of the character of St. Luke's Gospel, and the object of its composition, that the references to the O. T., the authority of which with any except the Jews would be but small, are so few—only twenty-four in the one, against sixty-five in the other—when compared with their abundance in St. Matthew. Only eight out of the whole number are peculiar to our evangelist (marked with an asterisk in the annexed list), which occur in the portions where he appears to have followed more or less completely a παράδοσις of his own; the history of the birth and childhood of our Lord, the visit to Nazareth (c. iv.), and that of the passion. The rest are found in the common synoptical sections. We may also remark that, with the most trifling exceptions, St. Luke never quotes the O. T. himself, nor speaks on his own authority of events occurring in fulfilment of prophecy, and that his citations are only found in the sayings of our Lord and others. The following list is tolerably complete, exclusive of the hymns which are little more than a cento of phrases from the O. T.

* i. 17, Mal. iv. 6	x. 27, Deut. vi. 5
* 25, Gen. xxx. 23	Lev. xix. 18
* ii. 23, Exod. xiii. 2	xiii. 27, Ps. vi. 8
* 24, Lev. v. 11	35, Ps. cxvii. 26

8, Deut. vi. 13	xx. 17, Ps. cxvii. 22
10-11, Ps. xc. 11-12	28, Deut. xxv. 5
12, Deut. vi. 16	37, Exod. iii. 6
* 18-19, Is. lxi. 1-2	42-43, Ps. cix. 1
Is. lviii. 6	* xxii. 37, Is. liii. 12
vii. 27, Mal. iii. 1	* xxiii. 30, Hos. x. 8
viii. 10, Is. vi. 9	* 46, Ps. xxx. 5

7. Time and place of the Composition.—In the complete silence of Scripture, our only sources for determining the above points are tradition and internal evidence. The statements of the former, though sufficiently definite, are inconsistent and untrustworthy. Jerome (Præf. in Matth.) asserts that it was composed 'in Achaia and the regions of Bœotia,' an opinion which appears to have been generally received in the 4th century (Gregory Nazianz., 'Εν Ἀχαΐᾳ), and has been accepted by Lardner (Credibility), who fixes its date 63 or 64 A.D., after the release of St. Paul. An Arabic version, published by Erpenius, places its composition 'in a city of Macedonia, twenty-two years after the ascension,' 52 A.D.; a view to which Hilgenfeld and Wordsworth (Gr. Test., i. p. 170) give in their adherence. A still earlier date, thirteen years after the ascension, is assigned by the subscription in some ancient MSS. Other statements as to the place are Alexandria Troas, Alexandria in Egypt (the Peschito and Persian versions, Abulfeda, accepted by Mill, Grabe, and Wetstein), Rome (Ewald vi. 40, Olshausen), and Cæsarea (Bertholdt, Schott, Thiersch, Alford, Abp. Thomson).

Amidst this uncertainty, it will be well to see if there is any internal evidence which will help us in determining these points. We are here met at the outset by those who are determined to see in every clear prophecy a vaticinium post eventum, and who find in the predictions of the overthrow of Jerusalem (xiii. 34, 35; xix. 43, 44; xxi. 20-24), and the persecutions of our Lord's followers (xii. 52, 53; xxi. 12), and the nearness of the παρουσία (xxi. 25-33), a clear proof that the gospel was composed after 70 A. D. This has come to be regarded as a settled point by a certain school of criticism (Ewald v. 134; De Wette, Einleit., p. 298; Credner, Einleit.; Reuss, Gesch. d. Heil. Schr., 195; Meyer; Renan, Vie de Jesus, xvi.; Nicolas, Études, N. T., etc.), though there is no small diversity among its representatives as to the time and place of its publication of the gospel and the sources from which it was derived. Those, on the other hand, who, brought up in a sounder and more reverent school, see no a priori impossibility in a future event being foretold by the Son of God, will be led by the same data to a very different conclusion, and will discover sufficient grounds for dating the gospel not later than A.D. 63. It is certain that the gospel was written before the Acts of the Apostles (Acts i. 1). This latter could not have been composed before 63 A. D., when the writer leaves St. Paul in 'his own hired house' at Rome; nor probably long after, since, otherwise, the issue of the apostle's imprisonment and appeal to Cæsar must naturally have been recorded by him. How long the composition of the gospel preceded that of the Acts it is impossible to determine; but we may remark that the different tradition followed in the reports of the ascension in the two books, renders it probable that the interval was not very small, or, at any rate, that the two were not contemporaneous. If we follow the old tradition given above, we may find reason for supposing that the interval between St. Luke's being left at Philippi (Acts xvi. 12; xvii. 1) and his joining the apostle there again (xx. 5), was employed in writing and publishing his gospel. This view is accepted by Alford, Proleg. p. 47, and is ably maintained by Dr. Wordsworth, Gr. Test. i. 168-170, though he weakens his argument by referring εὐαγγέλιον (2 Cor. viii. 18) to a written gospel, a later sense never found in the N. T. Another and more plausible view, adopted by Thiersch, which has found very wide acceptance, is that the gospel was written under the guidance and superintendence of St. Paul during his imprisonment at Cæsarea, A.D. 58-60. Olshausen, among others, places it a few years later, during St. Paul's captivity at Rome, where he may have made the acquaintance of Theophilus, if, as Ewald (vi. 40) maintains, the latter was a native of Rome.

8. For whom written.—On this point we have certain evidence. St. Luke himself tells us that the object he had in view in compiling his gospel was that a certain 'Theophilus' 'might know the certainty of those things wherein he had been (orally) instructed.' Nothing more is known of this Theophilus, and it is idle to repeat the vague conjectures in which critics have indulged; some even denying his personal existence altogether, and arguing, from the meaning of the name, that it stands merely as the representative of a class (see THEOPHILUS). One or two inferences may, however, be made with tolerable certainty from St. Luke's words. He was doubtless a Christian, and, from his name and the character of the gospel, a Gentile convert; while the epithet κράτιστος, generally employed as a title of honour (Acts xxiii. 26; xxiv. 3; xxvi. 25), indicates that he was a person of official dignity. The topographical details, so plentifully given by St. Luke in his Gospel and the Acts, for Palestine, Asia Minor, and Greece, but which cease when the writer comes to speak of places with which an inhabitant of Italy might be supposed to be familiar—a line of argument well developed by Archbishop Thomson (Smith's Dict. of Bible, ii. 155)—lead to the belief that he was an Italian, and perhaps, as Ewald holds, a native of Rome. But though the gospel is inscribed to him, we must not consider that it was written for him alone, but that Theophilus stands rather as the representative of the whole Christian world; not, as we have already seen, of the Gentiles, as such, to the exclusion of the Jews, but the whole race of man, whom St. Luke had in his eye; and for whom, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the work was adapted 'as the gospel of the nations (τοῖς ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνῶν πεποιηκέντα, Orig. apud Euseb. vi. 25), full of mercy and hope assured to the whole world by the love of a suffering Saviour' (Westcott, Study of Gospel, p. 218).

9. Contents of the Gospel.—After the brief preface—the value of which it is difficult to over-estimate as throwing light on the history of the composition of the gospels in general, and the true theory of scriptural inspiration—the narrative of the gospel may be distinguished into four portions: 1. The time preceding our Lord's public life, including the conception and birth of John the Baptist, and of Christ, His circumcision, presentation in the temple, and the single incident recorded of His childhood, ii. 41-51, comprised in the first two chapters. On the authenticity of these two chapters, which has been vehemently attacked, Meyer's note, and Volckmar's work on Marcion's gospel (from which they were absent) may be consulted. The whole of this portion is in form, and to a considerable extent in substance, peculiar to our evangelist. 2. A large number of originally detached and independent narratives, comprising our Lord's baptism, temptation, and Galilean ministry; almost the whole being common to Luke with the other synoptists (iii. 1-ix. 49). 3. A large section, sometimes but improperly termed the gnomology, containing narratives of events, and reports of discourses belonging to the period from the close of our Lord's direct Galilean ministry to His visit to Jericho a few days before His royal entrance into Jerusalem, and mostly occurring during the actual journey (ix. 50-xviii. 14). The whole of this, in its present form, is peculiar to St. Luke. 4. The last days of Christ; His entry into Jerusalem, discourses in the temple, His sufferings and death, His resurrection and ascension, common to St. Luke and the other evangelists in substance; though there are considerable differences in detail in the narratives of the passion and resurrection (especially the journey to Emmaus), and that of the ascension is entirely St. Luke's own (xviii. 15-xxiv. 53).

Commentaries.—In addition to the commentaries on the four gospels, the following works, specially devoted to St. Luke, may be specified: Ambrose, Expos. Evang. Luc.; Fr. Lambert, Comm. in diva Luc. Ev. 1524; Jo. Agricola, Comm. in Luc., 1525; Erasmus, Sarcerius, in Luc. Ev. justa schol., 1539. Commentaries by Hofmeister, 1562; Logenhagen, from the writings of Augustine, 1574; Soaris, 1574; Stella, 1575 (a favourite commentary with the Romish Church, which has gone through many editions); Fr. Toletus, 1612; Winckelman, 1601; and Piscator, Analys. logic. Ev. secund. Luc. 1608; Car. Segaar., Obs. philol. et theol. in cap. i.-ix., 1766; Morus, Praelect. in Ev. Ev. d. Luc., 1830; Baumgarten Crusius, Comment., 1845; Kuinoel, Comment. in Ev. Luc., ed. 4, 1843; Oosterzee in Lange's Bibel-uerk, translated in Clarke's For. Theol. Lib.—E. V.

LUNATIC (σεληνιαζόμενοι). This term occurs only twice in the N. T., viz., Matt. iv. 24, and xvii. 15. From the latter passage it may be inferred that the disease with which such were afflicted was a species of epilepsy (comp. Mark ix. 17; Luke ix. 39). Though in Matt. iv. 24 the σεληνιαζόμενοι are distinguished from the δαιμονιζόμενοι, it appears from the other passages that the affliction of the former was regarded as the effect of demoniac influence. Perhaps the point of distinction lay in the periodicity of the attacks in the one case, and the continuity of the disease in the other. As this periodicity in the case of epilepsy was supposed to be determined by the changes of the moon (see Wetstein in loc.), those thus afflicted were called σεληνιαζόμενοι, lunatic, or moonstruck. In the classical writers this term is applied, not to such as are now usually called lunatics, but to epileptic patients (see Bloomfield's note on Matt. iv. 24).—W. L. A.

LUTHER, MARTIN, the great German Reformer, whose world-fame renders it superfluous to give here more than the barest outline of his history, was born at Eisleben 10th November 1483; became a monk of the Augustinian order at Erfurt in 1505; was appointed professor of dialectic and physics at Wittenberg in 1508; became D.D. in 1512; published his Theses against Indulgences in 1517; burned the Pope's Bull in 1520; and after a life of incessant labour to promote the cause of the Reformation and evangelical religion, died at Wittenberg 18th February 1546. Luther is in an important sense the father of modern Biblical exegesis, for not only by precept and example did he maintain that the Bible in the original tongues is the ultimate authority in all religious questions, and that as such it is to be expounded to the community, but by his assertion of the right of private judgment in the interpretation of the Bible, and his advocacy of a grammatical and philological method of interpretation in preference to one which would submit the inspired word to the influence of preconceived dogmatical theories, he boldly opened the path which alone a true exegesis can pursue, and in the steady pursuit of which all the successes of subsequent investigation into the meaning of Scripture have been secured. Luther's own contributions to Biblical literature, besides his immortal translation of the Scriptures into German [GERMAN VERSIONS] are, in chronological order, as follows:—In Ep. ad Galatas Comment., 4to 1519; Enarrationes epistolarum et evangeliorum, 1521; Comment. in Ep. ad Galatas ab auctore recog., 1524; Deuteronomium Moysis ex Heb. castigatum cum annot., 1524; Annot. in Eccles.

Salomonis, 1532; Breves enarrationes Esaia proph., 1534; Enarr. Ps. xlv. ex pralectionibus Collect., do.; Enarr. in Pr. Joel ex pralect., in Pr. Amos, in Pr. Abdiam, ex pralect., 1536; Comment. in ep. ad Gal. denuo diligenter recogn. 1538; Enarr. in Cant. Cantic., do.; in aliquot capp. Matthaei (i.-vi., viii.-xviii.), do.; Enarr. in Ps. li., do.; Enarr. in Pss. graduum, 1540; Enarr. Ps. xc., 1541; Comm. in Micham Pr., 1542; Enarr. in Hosam Pr., 1545; In Ps. ii., 1546; Com. in Joel Pr., 1547; Enarr. in Genesim, 1563. An edition of Luther's exegetical works by Elspenger, Schmid, and Irmischer has been commenced, of which 20 vols. have appeared, Erlang. 1829-49. English translations of his commentaries on the Galatians (by Middleton), on the Psalms (by Cole), and on Genesis (by Cole), have appeared. The best edition of his collected works is that by Walch, 24 vols. 4to, Halle 1737-53.—W. L. A.

LUZ (לֹז, 'almond tree'; Οὐλαμολύς, combining two words; Λουζά and Λυζα), a very ancient city of Canaan, better known by the name which Jacob gave it—Bethel [BETHEL]. It would seem from the sacred narrative that the term Beth-el, 'House of God,' the place of Jacob's pillar, of the Israelitish sanctuary, and of Jeroboam's idol-temple, was not in Luz. On his way from Beersheba to Haran, Jacob 'arrived at a place (בֵּיתֶל), and stayed there over night, for the sun had set; and he took one of the stones of the place, and put it under his head, and lay down in that place' (Gen. xxviii. 11). 'The place' was certainly in the open country. But the city of Luz must have been close to it, for we read, 'He called the name of that place Bethel, but the name of the town (שֵׁם הָעִיר) was originally Luz' (ver. 19).

The same distinction between Beth-el and Luz is afterwards observed. On his return from Padan-aram Jacob came again 'to Luz, that is Bethel. . . . And he built there an altar, and called the place El-beth-el' (xxxv. 6, 7). The altar could not have been in Luz. It seems probable that at and after this period buildings began to be erected around the sanctuary, and a village was formed distinct from Luz. On the occupation of Palestine by the Israelites, Bethel and Luz are spoken of as separate places. Thus, in describing the southern border of Ephraim, Joshua says, 'The lot of the children of Joseph went forth from Jordan by Jericho . . . to the wilderness that goeth up from Jericho by Mount Bethel, and goeth out from Bethel to Luz' (xvi. 1, 2). Luz thus lay west of Bethel, and the latter appears to have been situated on a mount. Keil's rendering of this passage is not satisfactory. He would interpret 'from Bethel' as meaning 'from the mountains of Bethel,' not from the city or sanctuary (see, however, Comment. on Josh., ad loc.)

Others regard the phrase Bethel-Luzah (בֵּיתֶל לֹזָה) as a composite name (Winer, R. W., s. v. Bethel; Clericus, ad loc.) This, however, is scarcely admissible, and is unnecessary. It seems probable that the two places were so close to each other that their suburbs met, and eventually the Canaanitish name Luz was superseded by the more distinguished Hebrew Beth-el. We hear no more of Luz after the conquest of the city by the Ephraimites (Judg. i. 24, 25). The city was betrayed into their hands by one of the inhabitants, who was spared by the conquerors, and founded another Luz.

2. A city 'in the land of the Hittites' whose origin is thus recorded—'The man (who had betrayed the ancient Luz to the Ephraimites) went into the land of the Hittites, and built a city, and called the name thereof Luz, which is the name thereof unto this day (Judg. i. 26). Rosenmüller would identify it with the Lusa (Λουσα), which Eusebius locates three miles from Neapolis; but Winer naturally asks how could that district have been called 'the land of the Hittites' in the time of the Judges (Onomast., s. v.; Winer, R. W., s. v. Luz)? The Hittites appear to have retired before the Israelites to northern Syria, and settled in the mountains and on the banks of the Orontes [HITTITES]. Probably Luz was situated somewhere in that region.—J. L. P.

Luz (לז) occurs only once in the O. T., namely, in Gen. xxx. 37 (a passage already adduced in the article LIBNEH), where it indicates one of the kinds of rod from which Jacob peeled the bark, and which he placed in the water-troughs of the cattle. Luz is translated hazel in the A. V., as well as in several others; in some it is rendered by words equivalent to 'walnut,' but 'almond' appears to be its true meaning. For in the Arabic we have لوز lous, which is indeed the same word, and which denotes the almond. Thus Abu'l Fadli, as quoted by Celsius (Hierobot. i. 254), says, 'Lous est arbor nota, et magna, foliis molliibus. Species duæ, hortensis et silvestris. Hortensis quoque duæ sunt species, dulcis et amara;' where reference is evidently made to the sweet and bitter almond. Other Arab authors also describe the almond under the name of lous. But this name was well known to the Hebrews as indicating the almond; for R. Saadias, in Ibn Esra's Comment., as quoted by Celsius (p. 253), remarks: 'Lus est amygdalus, quia ita eam appellat Arabes; nam hæ duæ lingue, et Syriaca, ejusdem sunt familie.' Almonds have been always produced in Syria and Palestine, and extend from thence into Afghanistan. But as there is another word by which the almond was known to the Hebrews, we shall reserve our further remarks for that head [SHAKAD].—J. F. R.

LYCAONIA (Λυκαονία), a province of Asia Minor, having Cappadocia on the east, Galatia on the north, Phrygia on the west, and Isauria and Cilicia on the south. It extends in length about twenty geographical miles from east to west, and about thirteen in breadth. It was an undulating plain, involved among mountains, which were noted for the concurrence of wild asses. The soil was so strongly impregnated with salt that few of the brooks supplied drinkable water, so that good water was sold for money. But sheep thrived on the pasturage, and were reared with great advantage (Strabo, xii. p. 568; Pliny, Hist. Nat. viii. 69). It was a Roman province when visited by Paul (Acts xiv. 6), and its chief towns were Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, of which the first was the capital. 'The speech of Lycaonia' (Acts xiv. 11) is supposed by some to have been the ancient Assyrian language, also spoken by the Cappadocians (Jablonsky, Disquis. de Lingua Lycaonica, Opusc. iii. 3, seq.); but it is more usually conceived to have been a corrupt Greek, intermingled with many Syriac words (Guhling, Dissert. de Lingua Lycaon.)—J. K.

LYCIA (Λυκία), a province in the south-west of Asia Minor, having Pamphylia on the east, Phrygia on the north, Caria on the west, and the Mediterranean on the south. Great part of the country, however, consists of a peninsula projecting south into the Mediterranean. It is mountainous, and is watered by numerous small rivers which flow from the mountains. Its inhabitants were believed to be descendants of Cretans, who came thither under Sarpedon, brother of Minos. One of their kings was Bellerophon, celebrated in mythology. The Lycians were a warlike people, powerful on the sea, and attached to their independence, which they successfully maintained against Croesus, king of Lydia, and were afterwards allowed by the Persians to retain their own kings as satraps. Lycia is named in 1 Maccab. xv. 23, as one of the countries to which the Roman senate sent its missive in favour of the Jews. The victory of the Romans over Antiochus (B. C. 189) gave Lycia rank as a free state, which it retained till the time of Claudius, when it was made a province of the Roman empire (Suet., Claud. 25; Vespas. 8). Lycia contained many towns, two of which are mentioned in the N. T.; Patara (Acts xxi. 1, 2); Myra (Acts xxvii. 5); and one, Phaselis, in the Apocrypha (1 Maccab. xv. 23).—J. K.

LYDDA. [Lod.]

LYDIA, a woman of Thyatira, 'a seller of purple,' who dwelt in the city of Philippi in Macedonia (Acts xvi. 14, 15). The commentators are not agreed whether 'Lydia' should be regarded as an appellative, or a derivative from the country to which the woman belonged, Thyatira, her native place, being in Lydia. There are examples of this latter sense; but the preceding word δούκων seems here to support the former, and the name was a common one. Lydia was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte, as the phrase 'who worshipped God' (σεβομένην τὸν Θεόν) imports. She was converted by the preaching of Paul; and after she and her household had been baptised, she pressed the use of her house so earnestly upon him and his associates, that they were constrained to accept the invitation. The Lydians were famous for the art of dyeing purple vests, and Lydia, as 'a seller of purple,' is supposed to have been a dealer in vests so dyed, rather than in the dye itself (see Kuinoel on Acts xvi. 14).—J. LYRA, NICHOLAS DE, or, when Latinized, LYRANUS. This celebrated commentator and fore-runner of the Reformation, was born about 1270, of Jewish parents, at Lyre, a small town in Normandy, in the diocese of Eurecca, from which he took his surname. Having embraced Christianity when young, he entered the order of the Franciscans at Verneuil in 1291, whence he was sent to the Franciscan convent at Paris to complete his studies. Here he applied himself with great diligence and success to his studies, was admitted to the degree of Doctor, and became a most distinguished lecturer on the Bible. His great learning, refined taste, and eminent worth, raised him to the principal offices of his order, and secured him the friendship of the most illustrious persons of his age. So highly was he esteemed by Queen Jane, Countess of Burgundy, and the wife of Philip V., called the Long, that she appointed him one of her executors in 1325. He died at Paris October 23, 1340. He wrote (1) a treatise in defence of Christianity, and against Judaism, entitled Tractatus fratris Nicolai de Lyra de Messia ejusque adventu, una cum responsione ad Judaeorum argumenta quatuordecim contra veritatem Evangeliorum, which he finished in 1309, and is directed against some Rabbis who made use of the N. T. to assail Christianity. It is generally appended to his commentary, and is also given in the polemical work entitled the Hebraemastix of Hieronymus de Sancta-fide, Frankfurt 1602, p. 148, ff. (2.) Postilla perpetua in universa Biblia, printed at first at Rome 1471-72, 5 vols. folio. It is this work which has immortalised De Lyra, and conferred upon its author the title of Doctor planus et utilis. The great merit of this commentary consists in its embodying the sober-spirited and ingenious explanations of Rashi, whose mode of interpretation he regarded as his model, as he frankly states, 'Similiter intendo non solum dicta doctorum Catholicorum, sed etiam Hebraeorum maxime Rabbi Salomonis, qui inter doctores Hebraeos locutus est rationalibus, ad declarationem sensus literalis inducere.' De Lyra even adopts the well-known Jewish four modes of interpretation denominated פורדם = סוד, mystical; דרש, allegorical; רמז, spiritual; פשט, literal, which he thus expresses in verses in the same prologue (i. e., the first), from which the former quotation is made.

Moralis quid agas, quo tendas anagogia.

He gives, however, the preference to the literal sense. 'All of them,' says he in the second prologue, 'presuppose the literal sense as the foundation. As a building declining from the foundation is likely to fall, so the mystic exposition which deviates from the literal sense must be reckoned unbecoming and unsuitable.' Even in the interpretation of the N. T., where Rashi failed him, acquaintance with the Rabbinical writings and Jewish antiquities enabled him to illustrate largely allusion to the manners and customs of the Hebrews. How much Luther and the Reformation were indebted to De Lyra, may be seen from a comparison of the respective commentaries, and from the couplet of the Reformer's enemies.

Si Lyra non lyrasset,
Lutherus non saltasset.

That De Lyra was of Jewish extraction, is, among others, most emphatically declared by Chajim Ibn Musa, who composed, in 1456, a refutation of his polemical treatise, entitled ספר מן ורומה The Book of the Shield and the Spears, in which he says,

בעבור היהודים היו מפורדים להשיבו כי היה (ניקולא)
נצרי חדש מזרע היהודים ויהודי היה לה שנים כמו
שואמרים הנצרים. De Lyra's statement that he had little intercourse with the Jews, at the end of his polemical treatise, and his modest plea in the prologue to his commentary for indulgence, 'because,' he says, 'I am not so well skilled in the Hebrew or Latin language as to prevent me from failing in many particulars,' which are urged by Graetz and others against his Jewish origin, must be rejected in the face of the ancient testimonies to the contrary. LYSANIAS (Αυσανίας) is mentioned by St. Luke, in chap. iii. 1, as tetrarch of Abilene on the eastern slope of the Anti-lebanon, near Damascus. Amidst the obscurity which surrounds this name, conjectures have been indulged in, two of which we will here notice. According to Eusebius (whom others have followed, such as Bede and Adrichomius, see Corn. a Lapid. in Luc. iii. 1), Lysanias was a son of Herod the Great. This opinion (the untenableness of which is shewn by Valesius, on Euseb., Hist. Eccl. i. 9, and by Scaliger, Animadv. on Euseb. Chron. p. 178) has no other foundation than the fact that the evangelist mentions Lysanias with Herod Antipas and Philip; we dismiss it, therefore, and proceed to notice another opinion which has excited more serious discussion, especially in recent times. Josephus (Antiq. xiv. 13. 3, and Bell. Jud. i. 13. 1) mentions a Lysanias, the son of Ptolemy, the son of Menneus; and in other passages, also, he speaks of 'Abila of Lysanias' (Antiq. xix. 5. 1) and 'the tetrarchy of Lysanias' (xviii. 6. 10), and, more fully still, of 'Abilene, the tetrarchy of Lysanias' (xx. 7. 1). Now Lysanias, the son of Ptolemy, was put to death by Marcus Antonius at the instigation of Cleopatra (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 4. 1; Dion. Cass. xlix. 32). This took place B.C. 34, or about sixty-four years before the period which St. Luke refers to in the passage before us (iii. 1). To the older commentators, such as Casaubon (On Baronius, Ann. xxxi., Num. 4), Scaliger (loc. cit.), and others (see Corn. a Lap. and Grotius, in loc.), this difference of dates presented no difficulty. Allowing historical credit to St. Luke (on which subject see Dr. Mill, Pantheistic Princip., pt. ii. p. 16, seq.), no less than to Josephus, they at once concluded that two different princes of the same name, and possibly of the same family, were referred to by the two writers. (See also Kuinoel, on Luke iii. 1; Krebsius, Observ., pp. 110-113; and Robinson, Biblioth. Sac., v. 81.) This reasonable solution, however, was unsatisfactory to the restless critics of Germany. Strauss and others (whose names are mentioned by Bleek, Synopt. Erkl., i. 156, and Meyer, Komment., ii. 289) charge the evangelist with 'a gross chronological error;' a charge which they found on the assumption that the Lysanias of Chalcis, mentioned by Josephus, is identical with the Lysanias of Abilene, whom St. Luke mentions. This assumption is supported by an hypothesis which is incapable of proof; that Abilene, being contiguous to Chalcis, was united to the latter under the rule of Lysanias, the son of Ptolemy. It must, however, be borne in mind that Josephus nowhere speaks of Abilene in connection with this Lysanias; nor, indeed, does he mention it at all until ten years after the notice by St. Luke. He calls Antony's victim simply ruler of Chalcis. Moreover, it is of importance to observe, that the tetrarchical division of Palestine and neighbouring districts was not made until after the death of Herod the Great; so that, in his haste to inculpate the evangelist, Strauss, in effect, attributes to the historian, whom he invidiously opposes to St. Luke as a better authority, an amount of inaccurate statement which, if true, would destroy all reliance on his history; for we have already seen that Josephus more than once speaks of a 'tetrarchy of Lysanias;' whereas there were no 'tetrarchies' until more than thirty years after the death of Ptolemy's son, Lysanias. It is, therefore, a juster criticism to conclude (against Strauss, and with the earlier commentators) that in such passages as we have quoted above, wherein the historian speaks of 'Abila of Lysanias,' and 'The tetrarchy of Lysanias,' that a later Lysanias is certainly meant; and that Josephus is not only accurate himself, but a voucher also for the veracity of St. Luke. But there is yet stronger evidence to be found in Josephus of the untenableness of Strauss' objection and theory. In his Jewish Wars (ii. 12. 8) the historian tells us, that the emperor Claudius 'removed Agrippa [the second] from Chalcis [the kingdom, be it remembered, of Strauss' Lysanias] to a greater kingdom, giving him in addition the kingdom of Lysanias,' (ἐκ δὲ τῆς Χαλκίδος Ἀγρίππαν εἰς μείζονα βασιλείαν μετατίθει . . . προσέθηκε δὲ τὴν τε Λυσανίου βασιλείαν). Ebrard exposes the absurdity of Strauss' argument, by drawing from these words of Josephus the following conclusion—inevitable, indeed, on the terms of Strauss—that Agrippa was deprived of Chalcis, receiving in exchange a larger kingdom, and also Chalcis! (See Ebrard's Gospel Hist. [Clark], pp. 145, 146). The effect of this reductio ad absurdum is well put by Dr. Lee (Inspiration [1 ed.], p. 394, note), 'Hence, therefore, Josephus does mention of a later Lysanias [on the denial of which Strauss has founded his assault on St. Luke]; and by doing so, fully corroborates the fact of the evangelist's intimate acquaintance with the tangled details of Jewish history in his day.' Many eminent writers have expressly accepted Ebrard's conclusion, including Meyer (loc. cit.) and Bleek (loc. cit.) Patritius concludes an elaborate examination of the entire case with the discovery, that 'the later Lysanias, whom Luke mentions, was known to Josephus also; and that, so far from any difficulty accruing out of Josephus to the evangelist's chronology, as alleged by objectors to his veracity, the historian's statements rather confirm and strengthen it' (De Evangelii, iii. 42, 25). It is interesting, also, to remark that, if the sacred writer gains illustration from the Jewish historian in this matter, he also repays him the favour, by helping to clear up what would otherwise be unintelligible in his statements; for instance, when Josephus (Antiq. xvii. 17. 4) mentions 'Batanea, with Trachonitis and Auranitis, and a certain part of what was called 'the house of Zenodorus,' as paying a certain tribute to Philip' (σὺν τῇ μέρει οἴκου τοῦ Ζηνοδώρου λεγομένου); and when it is remembered that 'the house of Zenodorus' included other territory besides Abilene (comp. Antiq. xv. 10. 3, with Bell. Jud. i. 20. 4); we cannot but admit the force of the opinion advanced by Grotius (as quoted by Dr. Hudson, on the Antiq., xvii. 17. 4), that 'when Josephus says, some part of the house, or possession, of Zenodorus was allotted to Philip, he thereby declares that the larger part of it belonged to another. This other was Lysanias, whom Luke mentions' (see also Krebsius, Observatt., p. 112). It is not irrelevant to state that other writers, besides Strauss and his party, have held the identity of St. Luke's Lysanias with Josephus' son of Ptolemy, and have also believed that Josephus mentioned but one Lysanias. But (unlike Strauss) they resorted to a great shift rather than assail the veracity of the holy evangelist. Valesius (on Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., i. 10), and, more recently, Paulus (Comment. in loc.), suggested an alteration of St. Luke's text, either by an erasure of τετραρχούντος after 'Ἀβιληνῆς, or retaining the participle and making it agree with Φίλιππου as its subject (getting rid of Λυσανίου as a leading word, by reducing it to a mere genitive of designation by its transposition with τῆς—q. d., τῆς Λυσανίου 'Ἀβιληνῆς τετραρχούντος), as if Philip had been called by the evangelist 'Tetrarch of Ituræa, Trachonitis, and the Abilene of Lysanias.' This expedient, however, of saving St. Luke's veracity by the mutilation of his words is untenable, not having any support from MS. authority. In conclusion, it is worth adding, that in modern times a coin has been discovered bearing the inscription Λυσανίου τετράρχου καὶ ἀρχιπρεσβ., and Pococke also found an inscription on the remains of a Doric temple, called Nebi Abd, the ancient Abila, fifteen English miles from Damascus, which makes mention of Lysanias, tetrarch of Abilene. Both the coin and the inscription refer to a period subsequent to the death of Herod (Pococke's Description of the East, vol. ii., pt. 1, pp. 115, 116; and Sestini, Lettere ed. Dissertationi numismatiche, tom. vi., p. 101, tab. 2, as quoted by Wieseler, Chronolog. Synops. 183). These discoveries, therefore, certainly lend confirmation to the view we have taken, that the Lysanias whom Josephus mentions in connection with events in the reigns of Caius and Claudius is in fact identical with the Lysanias of St. Luke's Gospel (see Davidson's Introd. N. T., p. 218). — P. H.

LYSIAS (Λυσίας). 1. A Syrian 'nobleman of the blood royal' whom Antiochus Epiphanes, when setting out for Persia, appointed guardian of his son, and regent of that part of his kingdom which extended from the Euphrates to the borders of Egypt (1 Maccab. iii. 32; 2 Maccab. x. 11; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 2; Appian, De reb. Syr., 46). Acting under the special orders of the king, Lysias collected a large force for the purpose of carrying on a war of extermination against the Jews. This army, under the command of the generals Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias, was surprised and put to flight by Judas Maccabæus near to Emmaus (1 Maccab. iii. 38—iv. 18; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 3, 4). In the following year, B.C. 165, Lysias himself invaded Judæa with a still larger army, and joined battle with Judas in the neighbourhood of Bethsura. The Syrians were again defeated, and so decisively that Judas was able to accomplish his great purpose, the purification of the Temple, and the re-establishment of divine worship at Jerusalem (1 Maccab. iv. 28-61; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 5-7). Lysias retires to Antioch, and while preparing for a fresh campaign, the death of Epiphanes leaves him in virtual possession of the supreme power. Shortly afterwards (in the year probably B.C. 163), with an army equal in number to the former two combined, with three hundred war chariots and two-and-thirty elephants, and accompanied by the young king Antiochus Eupator, he again enters Judæa from the side of Idumæa. Having taken the fortified city of Bethsura, he advances to Jerusalem and lays siege to the temple. Meeting here with a stouter resistance than he had anticipated, and hearing that Philip, a rival claimant to the guardianship of the king, was returning from Persia, he hastily concludes a peace with the Jews, and sets out for Antioch. On reaching this city he finds it in the possession of his rival. In the engagement which followed, Philip was defeated and slain. Another and more formidable opponent, however, soon appeared, in the person of Demetrius Soter, first cousin of the king, who, escaping from Rome, lands at Tripolis, and lays claim to the throne. The people rise in his favour, and Antiochus and Lysias are seized and put to death (1 Maccab. vi.-vii. 2; 2 Maccab. xiii.-xiv. 2; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 9. 10; Appian, De reb. Syr., 47). In the second book of Maccabees an account is given at some length of an invasion of Judæa by Lysias, made before the final invasion but after the death of Epiphanes (2 Maccab. xi.) It is scarcely possible to reconcile this with the more trustworthy narratives of the first book, and it is clear from 2 Maccab. ix. 28-x. 10, that the writer is not following a strictly chronological order in this part of his history. Internal evidence seems to us to favour the opinion that this narrative has been compiled from separate and partial accounts of the two invasions referred to in 1 Maccab. iv.-vi., the writer too hastily inferring that they described the same event.

2. Claudius Lysias, the military tribune who commanded the Roman troops in Jerusalem during the latter part of the procuratorship of Felix (Acts xxi. 31-38; xxii. 24-30; xxiii. 17-30; xxiv. 7, 22). Nothing more is known of him than what is stated in these passages. From his name, and from Acts xxii. 28, it may be inferred that he was probably a Greek.—S. N.

LYSIMACHUS. 1. 'The son of Ptolemæus of Jerusalem,' Λυσίμαχος Πτολεμαίου τὸν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ. He is commonly supposed to be the translator into Greek of the Book of Esther (see the close of the LXX. version). The Apocryphal 'rest of the Book of Esther,' A. V., says, 'In the fourth year of the reign of Ptolemæus and Cleopatra, Dositheus, who said he was a priest and Levite, and Ptolemæus his son, brought this epistle of Phurim, which they said was the same, and that Lysimachus, the son of Ptolemæus that was at Jerusalem, had interpreted it (xi. 1).

2. A brother of the Menelaus whom Antiochus appointed high-priest (cir. B.C. 171). Menelaus left him temporarily 'in his stead in the priesthood,' and encouraged him to commit many sacrileges. Thus he roused the indignation of the common people, who rose against him and killed him (2 Maccab. iv. 29, 39). The Vulgate erroneously makes him the successor of Menelaus.—J. G. C.

LYSTRA (Λύστρα), a city of Lycænia, in Asia Minor, mentioned in connection with Derbe. When Paul and Barnabas were persecuted at Iconium 'they fled unto Lystra and Derbe, and unto the region that lieth round about' (Acts xiv. 6). These two towns must have been close to each other. The site of Iconium is known [ICONIUM], and the boundaries of Lycænia are also known [LYCAONIA]. Lystra and Derbe stood on the great road leading from Cilicia to Iconium, and consequently south of the latter, and on the northern side of the Taurus range which separated Cilicia from Lycænia. Derbe lay next Cilicia, for when Paul was on his way from Cilicia he reached Derbe first (Acts xvi. 1); and when returning at another time from Derbe to Iconium he passed through Lystra (xiv. 21). The relative situation of the two is thus clear. Lystra is mentioned by Strabo and Ptolemy, but its position is not defined. Leake suggests that it stood at the western extremity of the plain of Lycænia, about twenty miles south of Iconium. That site, however, is far removed from the public road, and it is uncertain whether there be ruins there (Travels, p. 103). South-east from Iconium, near the centre of the plain, stands a lofty isolated mountain called Kara-dagh, and on its eastern declivity are extensive ruins. To these the name Bin-bir-Kilisi (the 'Thousand-and-one Churches') is now given on account of the great number of ecclesiastical edifices among them. Here Mr. Hamilton would locate Lystra, and the identity may be admitted. Another traveller ascended the mountain, and says, 'On looking down I perceived churches on all sides of the mountain scattered about in various positions. . . . Including those on the plain, there are about two dozen in tolerable preservation, and the remains of perhaps forty may be traced altogether' (Falkner, in Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul, i. 202). Some ruins a few miles eastward, on the line of the ancient road, are supposed to mark the site of Derbe.

At Lystra, Paul, having miraculously cured a cripple, was about to receive divine honours along with Barnabas. Afterwards, however, at the instigation of Jews from Iconium, he was stoned and left for dead (Acts xiv. 8-19). The healing power which he had been able to exert for the relief of others, was now put forth by God on his own behalf, and he suddenly rose up, went into the city, and next day visited Derbe. From thence he returned again to Lystra on his way to Iconium (vers. 20, 21). Timothy appears to have been a native of Lystra. He was perhaps converted during Paul's first visit, and on his second visit he took him with him on his missionary tour (xvi. 1-4). From this fact we can understand the pointed reference of Paul in 2 Tim. iii. 10, 11, 'But thou hast fully known (παρηκολούθησας) my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, patience, persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured: but out of them all the Lord delivered me.' Timothy had apparently been an eye-witness both of the miracle performed by, and that performed on, Paul at Lystra (Alford and Ellicott, ad loc.)—J. L. P.

GAIUS

GAIUS (Γάιος), the Grecised form of the Latin Caius, the name of several persons mentioned in the N. T.

1. A Macedonian who had accompanied St. Paul to Ephesus, and who was seized by the mob when the uproar was made by Demetrius (Acts xix. 29). Nothing more is known of him.

2. A native of Derbe who, along with Timothy and others, accompanied St. Paul from Asia on the occasion of his second visit to Europe (Acts xx. 4). This Gaius is often confounded with the former; but the one is expressly called a Macedonian, the other was from Derbe (see Meyer's or Alford's note on Acts xx. 4).

3. A Christian famed for his hospitality, resident in Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 15).

4. A Christian to whom St. John's third epistle is addressed, also noted for his hospitality to the Christians. Whether he was identical with any of the above is uncertain. Lücke thinks he was the same as No. 2, but for this he assigns no reason. Wolf identifies him with No. 3. According to the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46), he was made bishop of Pergamos by St. John.—W. L. A.

GOTHIC VERSION. The Gothic version is the work of Ulfila, bishop of the Goths, who was born in 313, and died 383. Whether he was the first or second bishop ordained to labour among that rude people, is uncertain. The most probable opinion is, that he was consecrated to his office by certain Arian bishops in council, at Philippopolis in Thrace, in the year 343. But the accounts of his life are confused, and, that of Philostorgius in particular, unreliable. The most trustworthy statement is his disciple's Auxentius—which Waitz has followed—though it is not certain in some particulars.

This apostolic missionary left an enduring and precious monument of his zeal in his version of the Bible, a work for which he was well qualified. According to Philostorgius, he translated the entire Bible except the books of Kings, omitting the latter lest they might add fuel to the military propensities of his people, already excessive. There is no good reason for doubting this statement, though Knittel has vainly endeavoured to confute it; and Mr. Horne, anxious to find an accusation against Gibbon, calls it an idle tale repeated by the historian—asserting that Mai discovered fragments of the books of Kings, Ezra, and Nehemiah, in the re-script MS. of Milan, marked G 8a. This, however, is an error, as no trace of the Kings has been discovered. The version was made from the Greek throughout, i.e. the LXX in the Old Testament, and the original in the New. Ulfila also invented a Gothic alphabet, the letters of which were borrowed from the Greek and Latin, five of them from the latter. By this means he put his countrymen into a position for understanding the Scriptures, the source of divine truth, and deriving their knowledge of divine things from the fountain. The benefit conferred upon them by these works is incalculable. The man who prepared the way for the reception of Christianity by a numerous race, bridging over the gulf between the new religion and a rude heathen spirit, was a benefactor whose memory they might well cherish with pride. The crown of his missionary life was the translation of the sacred books.

The time when he was engaged in making this version cannot be precisely determined. It seems to have been after 370, when Fritigern's conversion led to that of large numbers among the Goths. Ulfila was then about sixty years old, mature in knowledge and piety, with large experience of human nature—intimately acquainted both with the wants and capabilities of his nation.

The version is of no use in the interpretation of the Bible; but it is a valuable document in the criticism of the text, i.e. the text of the New Testament only, because the Old Testament part was made from the LXX., and is now lost with the exception of some insignificant fragments. The greater portion of the New Testament is extant. No part of the Acts, Epistle to the Hebrews, Apocalypse, or general epistles, has yet been discovered.

The following is a list of the extant portions:—

Of the Old Testament there have been preserved Ezra ii. 8-42, mostly parts of verses; and Nehemiah v. 13-18, vi. 14-19, vii. 1-3, ix. 15, only six words of the verse. In addition to these fragments, a considerable number of verses and parts of verses—belonging to most of the Old Testament books—have been collected by Massmann out of the New Testament version.*

For the gospels we are indebted to the celebrated Silver MS. of Upsala, whose history is a curious one. It was discovered in the abbey of Werden in Westphalia, at the commencement of the 13th century, whence it was brought to Prague, and fell as booty into the hands of the Swedes when they got possession of Little Prague, A.D. 1648. After being for some time in the library of Queen Christina, it suddenly disappeared, and was found in the Netherlands in the possession of Isaac Vossius. How this scholar got it is matter of conjecture; the more charitable opinion is that the queen presented it to him, not that he appropriated it by stealth. Sweden, however, soon regained the treasure, for Count Magnus Gabriel de la Gardie purchased it from Vossius for 400 Swedish dollars, and gave it as a present to the University of Upsala in 1669, where it has remained since that time.

This remarkable MS. bears internal evidence of the country where it was written. It was made in Italy, as

* Ulfilas, die heiligen Schriften alten und neuen Bundes, etc., p. 1, etc.

Hug and others have shown, not later than the beginning of the 6th century, probably at the end of the 5th. The name Silver MS. (codex argenteus) refers to the letters, which are large uncial characters of silver, on purple-coloured vellum. The initial lines of the gospels and the first line of every section are in gold letters. Below are the canons of Eusebius. The order of the gospels is peculiar:—Matthew, John, Luke, Mark. As to the way in which the letters were made, opinions differ. Michaelis supposes that the deep impression of the strokes shows the letters to have been either imprinted with a warm iron, or cut with a graver and afterwards coloured. This is improbable. John ab Ihre thinks that they were impressed by carved or cast stamps, as bookbinders put titles on the backs of books in gold or silver; and refers to the perfect uniformity of the letters, their indentations on each page, and the traces of paste sometimes observable between the silver and parchment.* It is unlikely that the letters were written with a pen or reed. The MS. is defective, having but 187 folios, whereas it had at first 330. It is a mistake to say that it consists of 188 folios.

1. No proof is required to show that this version was made from the Greek text. If it were, we should point to mistakes arising from a manifest misreading of the original, such as, τῶν κειμένων of the Gothic (Matt. xxvii. 52) for τῶν κεκοιμημένων; τροφή (Luke vii. 25) for τρυφή; πεπώρκεν (John xvi. 6) for πεπλήρωκεν; προσδεχόμενον (Luke i. 10) for προσεχόμενον; συνήτησαν (Luke ix. 18) for συήσαν; μερίδας (Luke xix. 25) for μνάς, as if the latter were an abbreviation; in Mark vii. 3, πυκνὴ instead of πυγμῇ; in Philip. iv. 8, ἀγια instead of ἀγνά; in Mark ix. 18, ρίπτει for ῥήσσει; in Luke iii. 14, ἀρχεσθε for ἀρκείσθε. Again, the article sa, so, thata, is commonly put where it is in the Greek, though the Gothic does not need it, as in John vii. 16, ἡ ἐμὴ διδασχὴ is rendered so meina laistrins. Still further, the translator strives to exhibit the etymological sense of words by rendering ὁλοκαυτωμάτων, alabruntim, Mark xii. 33; ἐγκαλῖνα, inninjitha, John x. 22; σκηνοπηγία, klehrastakeins, John vii. 2; ἀχειροτονήτων, unkhanduntarhtia, Mark xiv. 58. Ἐλαχιστότερον, in Ephes. iii. 8 is well imitated by the comparative undarlairjins "less than the least."†

2. Eichhorn and Hug assert that the Constantinopolitan or Lucian recension is the basis of the version; the former critic adding that it is strongly mixed with the Hesychian recension also. These recensions are imaginary. The proof that Hesychius and Lucian, in their respective spheres, undertook revisions of the New Testament MSS. is wanting. Lucian revised the LXX; and it does not appear that his critical labour extended to the New Testament. Hence the lists of examples which Hug and Eichhorn give in proof of their opinion are liable to mislead. Assuming the existence of a Constantinopolitan recension, we affirm that the version as a whole does not present its characteristic readings. The Asiatic-Byzantine text is not the basis. The text of the version agrees more nearly with D of the Gospels and Acts, than any other document; and D belongs, according to Griesbach, to the Western recension—not the Constantinopolitan. We admit, however, that the Greek copies in Asia and Thrace began to pass out of their ancient form in the course of the 4th century, settling into what is called the Constantinopolitan in the 5th and 6th centuries.

It is best to look at the point apart from recension-schemes. Are the readings which the Gothic represents those of the oldest and best authorities, or those of later and inferior ones? Or does the version show that the Greek text from which it was made was in a transition state, passing from its oldest known form into a more corrupt one; in other words, does it represent a mixed Greek text, one agreeing with the oldest critical authorities, but, at the same time, interspersed with later or so-called Constantinopolitan readings? These are the questions with which the critic has to do—questions of a difficult nature, and demanding, towards their right solution, an extensive collation of MSS. with the Gothic text.

* See the Præfatio to his Ulfilas Illustratus, p. 3, etc., ed. Büsching.

3. A difference of diction has been observed in the various fragments of the version which have been preserved. To what is this owing? Two causes are assigned. Some suppose that Ulfila consulted Latin as well as Greek copies while he made his translation; others, that the work was altered and partially adapted to the Latin by later hands. The latter view is adopted by Gabelentz, Loebe, and Krafft, who think that the version was subjected to a revision, in which Gothic words were exchanged for others more usual, or for others that seemed to give the sense better, after the original had been diligently examined and Latin copies in Italy compared. This explains, it is said, the traces of two recensions, noticed by critics in such parts of the version as exist in more MSS. than one. In the Gospel of Matthew is found the evidence of two such recensions—an older and a younger; the former adhering more closely to the Greek text, the latter altered in many places, but so that the original reading is still in the margin. The Gospel of Luke presents the greatest diversity. It agrees more frequently with the Latin, besides employing forms and words that occur very seldom, or never, in the other Gospels. It has many readings and marginal glosses, proceeding from revisers, or from copyists who had compared other MSS. Some of these readings have got into the text from the margin. The Pauline Epistles show more traces of a later hand. New forms of words and sentences indicate that they were the object of continued study among the Goths in Italy and Spain.*

It is impossible not to admire the ingenuity with which Loebe pursues this topic, and collects numerous particulars to support it. But he has not proved his position. It is pushed too far. The problem still remains, Why did Ulfila ignore the Latin version? Is it probable that he would? We cannot think so, and would therefore unite the two views.† Ulfila consulted the old Latin version; and that work furnished subsequent individuals with marginal readings, several of which found their way into the text, and with various corrections more consonant with the original. But such revision and alteration must have been comparatively slight. The traces of recensions in the four Gospels, as well as the Pauline Epistles, are not strongly marked. Ulfila should not be confined to the same phrases or constructions. If he has translated the same Greek word variously, what supposition more natural than that his orthography varied when he was reducing a new language to form? But while admitting the fact that the Gothic received additions from the Latin, and that collation gave rise to marginal notes which were afterwards inserted in the text, the separation of the additions from the genuine text cannot be effected as easily as Hug thinks, because he seems to have neglected—after the example of Gabelentz and Loebe—an important point, the probability that Ulfila consulted the old Latin.

Nor has this critic good ground for believing that Ulfila had nothing but a MS. or MSS. presenting the genuine Constantinopolitan form of the text. On the contrary, that recension or family is scarcely so early as the middle of the 4th century, the age of B and N, even though these two MSS. were written in Africa. The form of the Greek text, commonly called Constantinopolitan, did not appear before the 5th century at the earliest. We are inclined to believe that the copies current in Asia Minor, Greece, and Constantinople, when Ulfila flourished, were not much inferior to those of Alexandria; for an earlier and later Constantinopolitan family may be distinguished, the latter representing a more corrupt form of the text.

These observations tend to show that most of the readings which the Gothic has in common with the old Latin were not the addition of scribes, but should be assigned to the MS. or MSS. which Ulfila used as the basis of his version, together with the Latin itself. They are original. Some readings are certainly posterior to Ulfila. No valid proof of the statement, that the Gothic was extensively altered from the old Latin, has been produced; such as undervalue the Greek MSS. current at Constantinople and in Greece during the 4th century, may think so; others will refuse assent. The heterogeneous character attributed to the Gothic does not arise so much from its reception of Latin readings by subsequent copyists, as from the nature of the MSS. employed by Ulfila. Long additions from the Latin are easily detected where they are confined almost entirely to it and the Gothic, besides their internal improbability. Thus it is easy to see that the addition after πᾶν ὅς ἐποιεῖ in Luke ix. 43—viz. "Peter said to him, Lord, why could not we cast him out? but Jesus said, Because this kind does not go out except by prayers and fastings,"—comes from the old Latin. But such additions are not common.

We have now answered the question, Does the version abound in readings found in the mass of the later copies? which is almost as pertinent as another, Does it abound in readings found in the oldest copies? since both admit of a similar reply. The version is not characterised by an overwhelming abundance of late readings, any more than are D of the Gospels, or f of the same—i.e. the Bressian MS. of the old Latin. It does not present the purest readings throughout, but a mixed text, or a transition state of the Greek text passing out of the N, B, C, a, b, c, form into another and less genuine one. Yet it is far from what is called the Constantinopolitan recension of Griesbach, having greater affinity to the oldest than the youngest text of the New Testament. It often agrees with D, E, F, G, and the old Latin, especially the Italian or revised form of the latter. Next to them, it coincides with N, B, C, A—more with A than C, and with C than N, B, or Z in Matthew. This is tantamount to the assertion, that its text is a little younger than that of N, B, C, A, and somewhat inferior. The difference, however, is not great.

(a) It has most resemblance to D (the Gospels and the Epistles), as well as the old Latin, especially d, e, f, g (the Gospels and the Epistles). Thus, in Matthew xi. 16, it has ἐν ἀγορᾷ, which is not original, but ἐν ταῖς ἀγοραῖς. In 2 Cor. ii. 3, it has ἡμῶν after ἐγγράφα. In Ephes. ii. 12, ἐν is prefixed to τῷ καιρῷ; 2 Cor. xi. 3, εὖ after ἐξηπατήσεν; Gal. iii. 2, ἐν ἡμῶν; Gal. vi. 15, ἐστιν for λαχρεῖ; Ephes. iv. 16, μερῶν not μελῶν; Ephes. iv. 19, ἀπληκίστες; Ephes. iv. 28, ταῖς ἰδίαις χερσίν; Philip. iii. 3, θεῷ; ἀποστολῇ, 2 Cor. i. 12, for ἀγιοστῇ the older and better reading; in Matt. v. 22, ἐκ is added to τῷ ἀδελφῷ αὐτοῦ; ἐνοστῆτος, Col. iii. 14, instead of τελειοτῆτος.

(b) It often agrees with the oldest and best MSS., supported by the ancient Latin and other versions. Thus, in Mark i. 2, for ἐν τοῖς προφήταις, it has ἐν τῷ Ἡσαῖα τῷ προφήτῃ, with N, B, D, L, Δ, the old Latin, the Vulgate, Coptic, Syriac, and other versions; in Matt. xi. 2, διὰ for δυσ, with N, B, C*, D, P, Z, Δ, the Peshito, Philo-xenian, etc.; in Gal. iv. 26, it omits πάντων before ἡμῶν, with N, B, C*, D, E, F, G, the old Latin, Vulgate, Coptic, two Syriac versions, etc.; in Romans vii. 6, it has ἀποθανόντες with N, A, B, C, K, L, and various versions, not the Latin ones; in Romans x. 1, it omits ἐστιν before εἰς, with N, A, B, D, E, F, G, the old Latin, Syriac, and Coptic versions; in Romans xiii. 1, it has αἱ before οὐσας with out ἐξουσία, with N, A, B, D*, F, G, the old Latin (guc), Vulgate, and other versions; in 1 Thes. v. 3, it has ὅταν without γάρ, with N, A, F, G, d, e, f, g, the Syriac version; in Matt. v. 47 it has το αὐτο with N, B, D, M, U, Z, and several versions; 2 Cor. viii. 8, τῆς ἑτέρων σπουδῆς, with N, B, C, G, the Vulgate, etc.; in Matt. xi. 16, τοῖς ἑτέροις with N, B, C, D, E, F, Z, and others, also most copies of the old Latin.

(c) Its readings are often junior ones, as in Mark i. 5, πάντες after ἐβαπτίζοντο; Mark xi. 2, λυσάντες αὐτὸν ἀγαγετέ; Mark xi. 10, the insertion of ἐν ὀνόματι; the doxology of the Lord's prayer, except Amen, in Matt. vi. 13; Matt. viii. 13, the addition of αὐτοῦ το παῖς; the addition in Mark vi. 11, "Verily I say unto you," etc. etc.; ἔλεγε δὲ in Mark vi. 4, instead of καὶ ἔλεγεν. It has τὴν κληρονομίαν in Romans xi. 1, instead of τὸν λαόν. The former is evidently a later and Latin reading, being found only in F, G, g, Ambros. Hilar. Ambrosiast. and Sedulius.

(d) It has readings differing from D (Gospels) and the old Latin, inferior to theirs and incorrect. In Luke vi. 20, τῷ πνεύματι is added to πτύχῳ, contrary to most copies of the old Latin as well as D. In the same verse it has τῶν οὐρανῶν for τοῦ θεοῦ, manifestly derived from Matthew. In Luke vi. 23 it has τοῖς οὐρανῶν, the plural, instead of the singular. In Luke viii. 47 αὐτῷ is inserted after ἀπηγγέλει.

(e) Latin additions are, et spiritui sancto, Luke i. 3, which is in b and g'; in Luke ix. 50, nemo est enim qui non faciat virtutem in nomine meo, which is in a b c e l; in Mark xiv. 65, gaburjaba, i.e. cum voluntate or libenter, "they smote him with the palms of their hands with good will." The marginal remarks or glosses found in MSS. consist of additions, as—

To kaithivisk is added vilthi, Mark i. 6, both meaning wild.

Of Synonymous words, as bakos for mela, Mark xii. 24.

Of a different rendering of the Greek text, as nimith, Galat. ii. 6, which is better than the textual andsitith, for λαμβάνει.

Sometimes they refer to two Latin readings. Thus, in Ephes. ii. 3, viltjans is in the text and lustuns in the margin, alluding to the two Latin readings voluntates and voluptates.

These glosses are sometimes taken into the text, as in Luke xix. 7, In gard.

A comparison of two MSS. containing the same parts of the New Testament, as A and B, shows more variations in orthography than in other particulars. Thus, in 2 Corinth. ii. 2, niba in A; nibai in B; ii. 6, andabet in A, which is wrong, andabeit in B; ii. 14, aviluth A, avilud B; xiii. 1, gastandith A, gastandai B; Gal. vi. 1, andsaiwands A, atsaiwands B; Colos. iii. 5, vinna A, vinnon B; 1 Tim. i. 3, galeithands A, galeithans B; 2 Tim. iii. 2, frijondans A, frijondans B.

(f) It has been supposed that Ulfila himself added certain marks of punctuation, because they are found to be the same both in the Silver MS. and the Ambrosian copies. This would facilitate the reading and understanding of his version by his countrymen. But there is good reason for doubting the correctness of this opinion. The marks consist of a dot and two dots (:). The former is commonly at the end of a sentence; the latter is said to denote the end of a series of sentences, or a paragraph. The Silver MS. of the Gospels seems, at first sight, to favour this explanation, but it will not stand the test of inspection. In the majority of instances it may be said to hold good; in not a few it is at fault. Thus, in John viii. 52, a dot occurs after prafeteis, the prophets, where no sentence ends; and also after qithis, sayest. Two dots are not found between John viii. 21 and x. 15. A paragraph begins at x. 15, with a single dot preceding. The Ambrosian MSS. show more clearly that the single and double dots occur arbitrarily. No dot appears between 1 Tim. iv. 8, 9. In 1 Tim. iv. 12 a dot occurs after καταφρονεῖτο which does not finish a sentence; two dots after ἐν λόγῳ;

and two after each of the nouns that follow. In the next verse no dot is put after διδασκαλία, the end of the sentence. Whole chapters are without either the single or double dot, as Romans ix. in the Ambrosian MS. A. The seventh chapter of the same epistle has not the double; nor does the single one occur in that chapter after its being appended to the word nis-stia in the 13th verse. Hence it is hardly credible that the translator himself placed dots so arbitrarily. They belong to the copyists; and as they are of two kinds only, no argument for Ulfila-authorship can be based on their similarity in the copies.

(g) Though the version is usually literal and exact, the author sometimes renders a generic word more specific. So in John vii. 12, where δυνατός is translated sumjeins, equivalent to ἀλόγητος. The same is in f, which has wnraz. Perhaps, however, Ulfila followed the Latin here. Hug incorrectly supposes that one or other of the translators made the mistake of substituting one Greek word for another.

(h) Sometimes Ulfila uses additional words and clauses to make the narrative more striking as well as emphatic. Thus, in Matthew ix. 8, siddatrickjandans is inserted after ohtedum; "when the people saw it they were afraid and wondered." This is especially the case in narratives of miracles.

It is universally admitted, that the version is faithful to the original, and admirably executed. The author had complete mastery over the Gothic tongue; and though he was not equally conversant with the Greek, he seldom failed to give the sense of the original. His ability and judiciousness are indisputable. The task he had to perform was very difficult: to transfuse the ideas and terms of a new religion into a new language, so as to make them intelligible to his Gothic countrymen. Whether his peculiar creed be perceptible in the mode of rendering is doubtful. It is certainly less observable than the Calvinism of the authorised English version. Castiglione refers to one passage in which Ulfila's Arianism is said to peep out, i.e. Philip ii. 6, where ἴσα θεῷ is rendered galeiko gutha, like or similar to God, not equal; an opinion endorsed by Gabelentz, Loebe, and De Wette. But Massmann denies the fact, asserting that his creed has never influenced his version, and that the passage in the Epistle to the Philippians is corrupt.* If the term galeiko be genuine, the probability is that it was not selected on purpose, because Ulfila denied the Son's likeness as well as his equality to the Father. Rejecting homoionianism as well as homoousianism, he asserted that the Son was not similis to the Father. The point is of no importance, even if Castiglione be correct; the general fidelity of the translation is unaffected by a single word, while Ulfila's integrity and honesty cannot be questioned. No version of the New Testament can be theologically colourless.

The best editions of Ulfila's version are Uppström's Codex Argenteus (1854); to which should be added Decem Cod. Argent. reditiva folia (1857); and the same author's Codices Gotici Ambrosiani (1868). These contain all known fragments of the Gothic version, and are edited most accurately.

Next in value is Stamm's, 'Ulfilas, oder die uns erhaltenen Denkmäler der Gotthischer Sprache,' etc., third edition by Heyne (1865). This has the Skeireins, a sort of catena on John's Gospel, or rather a polemical book against Marcellus, Sabellius, and others, based on the gospel, first published by Massmann, who thinks that the entire work consisted of about a hundred leaves, and that it was written by Ulfila about 351 A.D. Small as the fragment now is, it supplies some missing verses in the Gospels, such as Matt. iii. 11; v. 8; John i. 29; iii. 3-5, 29-32; v. 21-23, 35-38.

Next in importance is Massmann's 'Ulfilas, die heiligen Schriften alten und neuen Bundes in Gotthischer Sprache.'

* Ulfilas, die heiligen Schriften alten und neuen Bundes in Gotthische Sprache, Einleitung, p. 23.

The edition of Gabelentz and Loebe, 'Ulfilas Veteris et novi Testamenti versionis Gothica fragmenta qua supersunt' (1843-1846), may still be consulted with advantage, because it is a scholarly book. Older editions, such as Zahn's 'Ulfilas' Gothische Bibelübersetzung' (1805), are wholly superseded by the preceding ones. None, indeed, prior to that of Gabelentz and Loebe, incorporated all the known fragments; since Castiglione, who edited most of the epistolary ones from rescript MSS. at Milan, had not completed his labours in that department till 1839. The editions of Gabelentz and Loebe, Massmann, and Stamm, contain a Gothic grammar and glossary. Stamm's is the best in this respect.—S. D.

JUDICATURE. In the patriarchal times the office of judge was naturally vested in the head of the house; and in his hands was the power even of capital punishment (Gen. xxxviii. 24-26). When the people of Israel became an organised nation the judicial power rested with the chief of the state, and was by him delegated to inferior officers. Thus Moses at first had this duty exclusively on his own shoulders, but by the advice of his father-in-law, both for his own relief and for the expediting of justice, he afterwards selected certain upright, wise, and skilful men, whom he appointed to act as judges under him. The number of these was seventy-two, and they were set over the larger and the smaller divisions of the people, so as probably to form a gradation of courts in which an appeal lay from the lower to the higher. Moses reserved in his own hands the adjudication of the weightier cases (Exod. xviii. 13-26; Deut. i. 9-18).

When Israel was settled in Canaan an arrangement took effect for which provision had been made in the law. In all places large enough to have walls and gates judges were appointed, who were to judge the people with just judgment and decide impartially between man and man. The persons selected were doubtless from among the elders of the place (Deut. xix. 12; xxi. 19; xxii. 18; Job xxix. 7-17), and with them were associated, probably for advice, some members of the Levitical order. Above these local judges stood a supreme judge, to whom difficult cases or disputed decisions were to be referred. Failing him, or at the option of the parties, the matter might be decided by the high-priest, with probably other priests as his assessors, forming a college of justice (Deut. xvii. 8-13). Of these supreme judges a series of thirteen ruled Israel between the time of Joshua and that of Saul. [JUDGES.] Under the monarchy the king was supreme judge (1 Sam. viii. 5; 2 Sam. xv. 2-4; 1 Kings iii. 16, etc.); but it would appear that he too had the aid of a company of assessors (Ps. cxxii. 5). In the reign of Jehoshaphat a more systematic and complete organisation of the judicial order seems to have been instituted; judges were placed in all the walled towns of Judah, and a central court of appeal, and for the adjudication of the weightier matters, was established at Jerusalem, composed of persons selected from among the priests, the Levites, and the chiefs of the families of Israel (2 Chron. xix. 5-11). This scheme, which had been disturbed by the captivity, was restored by Ezra (Ezra vii. 25). An appeal probably lay from the central court to the high-priest, but this is not quite certain. At a later date arose the court of the Sanhedrim, mentioned for the first time under Hyrcanus II. (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 9. 3), which became the supreme tribunal of the Jews. Two lesser councils (synedria), are said by the Talmudical writers to have existed at Jerusalem, and in every town of 120 inhabitants one similar to these was found (Otho, Lex. Rabbin. Philolog. p. 723). It is probably to these lesser courts that our Lord alludes when he speaks of the judgment as distinguished from and subordinate to the council (Matt. v. 22). They were also intended in Matt. x. 17; Mark xiii. 9. [SANHEDRIM.]

The place where justice was administered was in the earlier times the gate of the town, by which publicity was secured (comp. Gen. xxiii. 10; Ruth iv. 1; 2 Kings vii. 3, etc.); hence the specification of 'gates' in Deut. xvi. 18. It would appear that it was usual to hear cases in the morning (Jer. xxi. 12); according to the Talmud, capital causes could not be heard during the night, they must be begun and ended within the day, nor could sentence be executed on the same day on which it was pronounced (Mishna, Tr. Sanhedrim, iv. 1). The Talmud also says that a capital trial could not be conducted on the eve of the Sabbath or of a feast-day, because in case of its ending with the condemnation of the accused the sentence could not be executed next day without violating the Sabbath, nor could it be deferred, כִּסְנֵי עֵינָי הָרִין, propter afflictionem (i.e. suspensionem) judicii (Gemara quoted by Cocceius, Duo Tituli Thalmud. Sanhedrim et Maccoth, etc., p. 36). In the early times judicial procedure was usually summary; each person pleaded his own cause (comp. Deut. i. 16; xxv. 1; 1 Kings iii. 16-28); the judge decided after hearing witnesses examined on oath [WITNESS; OATH]; and the sentence was usually carried into execution forthwith (Deut. xxv. 2; Josh. vii. 19-25), save when by appeal the case might be carried to a superior court.

The judge was bound by the most solemn sanctions to do equal justice between man and man, and to administer the law without respect of persons (Deut. i. 16, 17; xvi. 19; xxvii. 19, etc.). He was forbidden to receive gifts, to show favour to the rich, or pervert justice through pity for the poor, and to allow the opinion or will of the multitude to sway his decision (Deut. xvi. 19; Lev. xix. 15; Exod. xxiii. 2). As acting for God and under his authority, judges were to have regard only to what was right and just before Him (Deut. i. 17; xix. 17; 2 Chron. xix. 6). LICE (KINNIM), PLAGUE OF. Much light is thrown on this subject in Sir SAMUEL BAKER's most interesting work, The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia, page 122. His opinion is, that the insects thus inflicted upon the population were not lice, but ticks (Exodus viii. 16). The same work affords interesting illustrations of the manners and customs of patriarchal times. See, for example, page 126.
